The substance of the decisions lately delivered by Judge Betts, of the United States' District Court, in the cases of ships seized by Federal cruisers, has been published, in order that the parties interested may be able to make an immediate appeal to a Supreme Court if they are so inclined. These judgments deserve something more than passing attention from our statesmen, jurists, and merchants. Three causes are alleged for the condemnation of the Peterhoff:—"First, That the said ship Peterhoff was knowingly on the voyage aforesaid laden in whole or in part with articles contraband of war, and had them in the act of transportation at sea." Now, we should like once for all to know whether or not contraband of war being on board a vessel bound for a lawful port affords any legal ground for condemnation? If it does, then our shippers must be careful, for example, not to include in their cargoes any medicine, if the vessel is intended to touch or to discharge at any port which the Federal Government may adjudge to be in convenient proximity to a blockaded port. If not, if any cargo is lawful on a lawful voyage, then, although contraband of war being found on board may perhaps be cited as collateral evidence of destination, it cannot be a ground of condemnation. The second reason given for the condemnation of the Peterhoff is, "That her voyage with the said cargo was not truly destined for the port of Matamoras, a neutral port, and for purposes of trade and commerce within the authority and intendment of public law; but on the contrary was destined for some other port or place, and in aid and for the use of the enemy, and in violation of the law of nations." Now be it observed that the Court could not even make a guess for what blockaded port or place the vessel was bound. According to her papers she was proceeding to Matamoras, and granting the whole of her cargo was destined for the use of the enemy she might still have been going to that port to discharge it. If so her condemnation is unlawful, for contraband of war intended for the use of a belligerent may be conveyed from a neutral port to a neutral port without let or hinderance. The third reason assigned for the condemnation is, "That the ship's papers were simulated and false as to her real destination." This charge of simulated papers was repeated in the cases of the Springbok, the Sally Magee, and other prizes. In all these instances the ships' papers were as regular as it was possible to make them, and therefore the conclusion is inevitable, that regular papers are no protection. If there is any pretext for condemning a vessel they are set aside as false. As to the facts connected with the Peterhoff, there was no contraband of war in her cargo; she was destined for Matamoras, and was carrying her Majesty's mails to that port, and her papers were regularly endorsed by the British and Mexican authorities; but irrespective of the innocence of the ship, the terms of the judgment are inadmissible. If this judgment is allowed to stand our merchants must give up their trade with British and other neutral ports in the neighbourhood of the Confederate coast.

We reprint from the Mobile Register a narrative of the siege and fall of Vicksburg, written by "One of the Garrison." We have not reproduced the concluding paragraph of the article, which is a severe, and as we think altogether unwarranted condemnation of the strategy of General Pemberton. Certainly there is nothing in the narrative of "One of the Garrison" to call for or justify such strictures. The exclamation of General McPherson when riding over the fortifications, "Good Heavens! are these the boasted fortifications of Vicksburg?" It was the rebels alone and not the works that kept us out of the town," very well illustrates the peculiar tactics of the opposing forces. The Confederates rely mainly on the sword, the Federals regard the spade as their most useful weapon.

President Davis has issued an address to the Confederate army, in which he says, "You know what the enemy means by success. His malignant rage aims at nothing less than the extermination of yourselves, your wives and children, to destroy what he cannot plunder, to partition our homes as the spoils of victory, to incite servile insurrection, and to debauch an inferior race, hitherto contented, by promising the indulgence of the vilest passions as the price of treachery. Conscious of their inability to prevail by legitimate means, and not daring to make peace lest they should be hurled from power, the men now ruling in Washington refuse even to confer on the subject of ending outrages disgracing the age, or to listen to any suggestion for conducting the war according to civilized usages. No alternative is left you but victory or subjugation, and the utter ruin of yourselves, your families, and your country." Does any one think the Confederate President misrepresents the object of the war party in the North? Does any one suppose that it is the intention to restore the Union by committing such crimes as have never disgraced savage warfare? If any one is so deluded, we refer him to the organ of the Republicans, the New York Tribune of the 31st of July. The Washington correspondent of that journal writes that one of the first acts of the next Congress will be to amend the Confiscation law, "so as to deprive armed rebels of their property perpetually." He says that Congress and the President have hitherto misconstrued the meaning of that clause in the Constitution that, "no attainer of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the lifetime of the person attainted," and he avers that this does not "refer to the length of time for which such forfeiture shall be made, but to the time when such forfeiture shall be made. That the words mean that after the guilty party is dead there shall be no procedure against him or his property, but that while still living his property may be confiscated by the State for all time to come." This is a latitude of construction which neither a "Star Chamber," an Inquisition, or any other tool of despotism has ever ventured on; but we needed not this candid avowal to convince us that the men of the South are fighting not only for Independence and for their own lives and property, but for the lives and property of their wives and children. After thus showing under what pretext the South is to be plundered, the Tribune proceeds to whet the appetite of its readers by setting forth the vastness of the booty. It observes, "The actual value of property in the Rebel States is $4,708,252,215—exclusive of slaves, about three and a half billions—not including Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, or Missouri, though there is enough property in these States owned by rebels actually engaged in arms against us to offset the property owned by Unionists in original seceded States." Delaware, Maryland, and Kentucky are not to escape, and the way in which the value of the slaves is referred to is a sly hint that the "cursed niggers" not killed in the war, or roasted in the North, will be worth money when their masters and protectors are slaughtered. The Tribune having assured the Republican adherents that they were contending for substantial booty, and not for any such profitless results as emancipation or reunion, points out as a further encouragement to persevere, that the negro may be the food for powder that is to purchase them the much coveted plunder. "He who says, 'Do not arm the freedman,' sends out at the same breath the beloved child of his bosom to fight in his place." So the negro is to do the fighting, and the abolitionist is to take the property of the South in perpetuity. To entertain such a design is an atrocity without parallel, and to proclaim it is an infamy that only the friends of Butler and Federal Generals of the Butler brand could perpetrate.

Many are the indications that the North writhes under the despotism of the Republican faction. In one State we hear of an armed collision between the Democrats and the supporters of the Administration, and of some of the forces raised under the pretext of conquering the South being sent to fight against the friends of liberty and constitutional government in Iowa. In Ohio and elsewhere there is resistance to the draft. In another part of our impression we publish a protest against the usurpation and tyranny of the Washington Government, which has been widely circulated in New Jersey. People who so well know their grievances will seek to redress them at the first opportunity. In Maine the Democratic State Convention has denounced the course of the Lincoln Administration. If peace with the South is long postponed it is likely to be preceded by war in the North.

Referring to the surrender of Brashear City "to a gun-boat," our New Orleans correspondent confirms the statement we made last week, that the place had been previously evacuated by the Confederates. The enormous quantity of Federal military stores had been conveyed across Berwick Bay, and secured by the Confederates.

Much has been said and written about the heavy blow sustained by the South in the loss of Vicksburg and Port Hudson, but we have heard little or nothing about the cost of these strongholds to the North. The New Orleans Era, of July 24th, devotes six columns and a-half of small type to a partial list of casualties at Port Hudson.

Neither this nor any other list that we have seen gives any account of the killed and wounded negroes. Moreover there is no record of the white troops who have died from disease, or of those who are in hospitals disabled by sickness. Adding these items together, it will appear that 12,000 men is a moderate estimate of the Federal loss before Port Hudson. It is admitted that Grant's army was 125,000 strong when he commenced his campaign, and that he had not quite 80,000 effective troops when Vicksburg surrendered. Such victories to an invader are substantially defeats. Greenbacks may be issued ad lib., but the supply of men is limited.

"Our power and influence must spread over the whole continent of North America. There is no room here for the populations of the Old World save as our loyal subjects." So says the New York Herald, but we incline to think that in North America there is room enough for the Confederate States, for a Western Confederation, for British dominion in Canada, for a monarchy in Mexico, as well as for the United States. The Federals are speculating upon our relations with France being affected by the movements in Mexico. So far from this being the case the proceedings of the Emperor Napoleon are exceedingly popular in this country. We have much to gain and nothing to lose by the increase of French influence in America. Except the organs of the Federal Government, all English newspapers cordially approve the establishment of a Mexican Monarchy.

The Rev. James L. Vallandigham has published a letter in the Philadelphia Age in reference to his late arbitrary arrest. He says the reasons suggested for it are that he denied a false and slanderous charge against his brother, or that he had had a private quarrel with a republican neighbour, or that he was accustomed every Sabbath "to pray that the Lord would bring this war to a speedy close, and grant us again prosperity and peace." Mr. Vallandigham adds, "But though I may not be able just now certainly and positively to give the cause, I will state a few facts that may throw some light on the subject. 1st, My name is Vallandigham; 2nd, I am a Democrat; 3rd, At the commencement of the war I announced to my people that in war as well as in peace I was resolved to preach only the Gospel—determined not to know anything among them save Jesus Christ and Him crucified—and I have strictly adhered to the determination." Preaching the Gospel instead of cursing the South is, no doubt, a grave offence, but the worst crime was praying for peace, which is equivalent to praying that the supporters of the Administration might get no more fat contracts.

The Northern journals publish a full and interesting description of the new Empire of Mexico. From the census of 1850, they give the area of the country at 829,916 square miles, and the population at the same date, as 7,661,520; and they add, "The average population to the square mile was about nine and one-fifth. It has not materially changed for the last dozen years." That Mexico, the most prolific country in the world, should stand still—in fact, should retrograde—during twelve years, proves the great need of the late intervention.

"Personne," the correspondent of the Charleston Courier, gives an account of the fight on James Island on the 16th July, and says that the black prisoners allege that as soon as the fight began their white officers deserted them. They also stated that the reason they fought was that the Federal officers assured them if they were captured they would not be sold, but hung. No doubt Mr. Lincoln would be very glad indeed if the Confederates would treat coloured prisoners as traitors, and not as runaway slaves.

Captain Cutts, who acted as Judge-Advocate before the Vallandigham Court-martial, is now defendant in a court-martial ordered on his account. He is charged with using offensive and violent language towards Captain Hutton, a brother officer; refusing to retract; making false statements against another officer; and with the disgusting and disreputable offence of outraging the feelings of the wife of Captain Hutton, by peeping through the keyhole of her dressing-room. The Boston Courier mildly censures Captain Cutts by saying that he "appears in a very unfavourable light." Mr. Lincoln certainly has the knack of selecting dirty tools to do his dirty work.

The Confederate steamer Florida, reported off the English coast, put into the port of St. George's, Bermuda, for coaling and repairs to her machinery, on the 24th July. We learn from the Bermudian that she was saluted on her arrival by the forts and batteries. One of her officers, Assistant-Pymaster J. L. Lynch, who died on the 13th July, of consumption, was buried on shore. The funeral was attended by the officers, a portion of the crew, and a number of the inhabitants.

The bubble of Unionism in Louisiana has exploded. The persons who petitioned Mr. Lincoln for re-admission were a self-constituted committee of Federal office-seekers. A letter from New Orleans, published in the New York Daily News, says that the citizens of Louisiana have determined upon a separation with a fixedness of purpose that no persuasion or misfortune can alter, that they have declared their independence of the Federal Government, and that they will maintain that declaration even if it cost a fifty years' war.

The New York Times, either ignorantly or designedly, asserts that the United States' grain crop for 1863 will be immense, and that the need of Europe will make it anxious to maintain peace with the North. It happens that for the last ten years Europe has never been so independent of a trans-Atlantic supply of grain as at present. So prolific are the cereal crops, not only in England and France, but also in the grain-exporting countries, that the price of wheat has rapidly fallen, and no serious inconvenience would be felt if the American supply was entirely cut off. On the other hand, the report of the Department of Agriculture at Washington admits that the general appearance of the wheat is one-tenth below the average. Moreover, we know that the Federal armies have been recruited with Western agriculturists, and that, consequently, a much less breadth of land has been sown. Still the yield will be large enough for the demand, for the cotton States will not require any cereals from the West, and Europe will not purchase American grain except in a limited quantity and at a heavy decline. It is not impossible that the experience of the present autumn may do much to disgust Western farmers with the war, and teach them the folly of allowing themselves to be used as the catspaw of New England.

Besides scalping Indians the Federals have found a new amusement, which they designate "shooting at skeddaddling conscripts." The New York World gives us an account of this sport at the Conscript camp on Grapevine Point, Connecticut. A number of drafted men attempted to run the guard and escape from the camp. They seized the sentinel, threw him down, and then ran. The sentinel started to his feet and gave the alarm. The whole guard, fifteen in number, thus aroused, fired on the deserters. John McCarten, of Toronto, Canada, a substitute for a Newhaven man, while trying to escape, was struck by a ball in the breast, which glanced to his arm, cutting severely the muscles and shattering the bone. He was taken to the Knight Hospital, where his wound was found to be so severe that amputation of the arm was deemed necessary. In another place nine out of a squad of eleven recruits made their escape. They were all substitutes. The Hartford Times tells us of a man named Turner who had enlisted in four regiments before his game was stopped. The high bounty is an irresistible temptation to desert. Moreover the dealers in substitutes encourage desertion. The Boston Post says that the substitute agents in that city make from $75 to $1,000 per day.

A pretty and rather sensational story is being circulated in New York about the perfidy of England. It is asserted that our ministers being puzzled what to do with ticket-of-leave men, not liking to keep them at home, or to throw them on our colonies, have hit upon the expedient of sending them to the United States. Two felons have been arrested in New York, who aver that they were released from Portsmouth jail before the expiration of their terms, and were asked whether they would go to Australia or Canada. They elected the latter place, and Sir George Grey paid their passage to New York, promising them to send them a remittance to enable them to continue their journey. The remittance was not forthcoming, and so the ex-convicts resumed their old trade of thieving, preferring that to enlisting in the Federal army. This very probable tale is fully believed, and the British authorities are soundly abused. The New York Times suggests that the convicts should be shipped back to England to Sir George Grey, and charitably adds, "We could hardly be supposed to weep much if they were at once to garotte him." Garotters are not so foolish or ungrateful as to injure their best friend.

A correspondent of the New York Herald remarks: "I believe it is generally admitted that the rebels took as good care of our wounded as of their own at Charleston; but they are sadly deficient in surgeons if that is the case. . . . The rebels admit that they are very short of competent surgeons and of hospital stores and medicines." If there is a lack of hospital stores, it is owing to the brutal order of Mr. Lincoln which makes medicines contraband of war.

Our Turin correspondent sends us a literal translation of an address to President Lincoln from Garibaldi. The supreme absurdity of the document is surpassed by the odious blasphemy of associating the name of the Saviour with that of a convicted thief and a midnight assassin. It seems, however, that no one can defend the Lincoln Government without being profane and blasphemous. The tone of disdain with which the press of Italy treats this ridiculous effusion is a good sign for the peaceful progress of the country. Demagogism is evidently at a discount.

The New York World says, "Hon. William H. Seward, Secretary of State, son and son-in-law, and a daughter and son of President Lincoln, went down to Old Point Comfort, on Sunday, in the steamer Ella. Monday morning they visited Admiral Lee on board the flagship Minnesota, and were received with the usual salute. After spending a couple of hours there they proceeded to the Brooklyn, and afterwards to Fortress Monroe, the water battery firing a salute of fifteen guns." These proceedings and Mr. Lincoln riding out with a body guard will deprive Mr. Bright of the pleasure of contrasting the beautiful simplicity of United States' officials with the military parade of European Governments.

We learn from our Southern exchanges that one of the gun-boats building on the Tombigbee River was successfully launched in the first week in July.

ENGLAND.

The Foreign Enlistment Act of 59 George III., c. 69, under which it will be remembered that proceedings were taken against the Alexandra, has now been put in force by the Russian Government against one Alfred Styles, who described himself as a Lieutenant in the Garibaldian army. This individual was brought up last week on a warrant before one of the Metropolitan magistrates to answer the charge of "unlawfully attempting to procure certain persons to enlist and be employed as soldiers in the service and aid of certain foreign people, to wit, the 'Poles,' who are now in arms against and opposed to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia." From the evidence adduced, it appeared that advertisements had been inserted in the Daily Telegraph to this effect,—"An engagement is open for several young men to proceed abroad. Applications by letter only, enclosing references as to respectability and present employment, to be addressed to L. Z., 36, Seething-lane, Great Tower-street, E.C." An application was duly made by John Gregory, a schoolmaster out of employ, who, being in search of a situation both peaceful and pedagogic, was sufficiently amazed at receiving in answer a circular, the purport of which was that it was intended to form a regiment of volunteers, composed of gentlemen, sons of tradesmen, clerks, and others of respectability, to fight in aid of the Poles against the tyrannical and despotic rule of Russia. It was further stated that an English General of great experience in the Crimea and in Italy would be appointed to the command, and that the National Government would pay all expenses. A description roll was inclosed with spaces for information as to "name and address," "age," "height," "occupation," "constitution," and whether "married or single." Secrecy was enjoined on the applicant, with a caution against joining any crowd outside the office door, and thereby exciting suspicion. At the personal interview between the schoolmaster and the Polish recruiting officer, the latter said that 250 men had already joined the regiment, and that fifty more were wanted; that the pay would be the same as in the Polish army, whatever that might be; that if matters came to the worst the British Consul would send the men home, and that there was a prospect of plenty of prize-money, and the advantage of seeing the greater part of Europe. The vessel was to start in a fortnight, and the volunteers were to be drilled on board. The worthy schoolmaster, after filling up the blank forms and assisting Lieutenant Styles in certain correspondence, communicated with the Russian agents, a course which seems to have been followed by another witness, who had not the smallest objection to being considered a military spy. Eventually the Lieutenant was remanded, and being unable to find bail was locked up.

A regular panic has seized our Australian colonists. The Governments of the various States of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania, have already, by a petition issued by the conference appointed for the purpose, exhibited the unanimous feeling of the colonists on the subject of transporting criminals to Western Australia, as proposed in the report of the Royal Commission on Convicts and Secondary Punishments. The idea is obviously quite at variance with all their preconceived notions on the rights of the settlements, the interests both of the colonies and the mother country, and of the object and method of legitimate emigration. Consequent on the petition already mentioned, an enormous mass of articles and letters has appeared in the daily journals, and now another petition is in course of signature by all the leading people resident in England who are connected with Australia and New Zealand. In that petition it is represented that the scheme will at once bring into collision the Imperial and colonial authorities, and embitter the relations of England and the colonies beyond hope of reconciliation. An inundation of the more happy settlements by runaways, conditional pardon men, and expatriés is anticipated, the result of which would be not merely the demoralization of the colonists, but also the burdening their establishments with great additional cost in gaols, courts of law, and police.

The correspondence of Sir Henry Spelman, editor of the "Concilia and Glossarium Archæologicum," has been sold by auction. There were autograph letters from Nicolas Claude Fabri de Peiresc, who was born in 1580, from William Camden, Archbishop Ussher, and John Bradshawe, President of the Council convoked for the trial of Charles I. Other rare MSS. were also sold, among which was the sign manual of Richard III., as king of England, to a warrant commanding the restitution of dower to Anne Lye, the price obtained for which was £11. There was also a letter from Lord Byron to Hobhouse, dated Athens, February 28, 1811, in which, speaking of Hanson's desire to sell Newstead, Lord Byron says, "I will not, and I beg you in my name to say, No, no, no! If he must sell, sell Rochdale. . . . My mother sends me a pack of State scandal and newspaper extracts which one sees in every seaport town—Hanson, a damnable account of my affairs, though I can't tell if he speaks truth or not, his letter being quite facetious; a pretty time for joking, when a man is in Greece, and his property involved."

A successor to the late Sir Cresswell Cresswell, in the office of Judge Ordinary of the Probate and Divorce Court, has been selected in the person of Sir James Wilde, one of the Barons of the Exchequer. The new Judge is a man of considerable legal attainments, and remarkable for his amiable disposition and polished manners. It is, however, a matter of grave doubt whether his physical strength will prove sufficient to endure the toils of an office, the business of which exceeds in a twofold degree that of any other Judgeship. Probably in case of failure on his part to perform his functions, the Probate Jurisdiction will be severed from the Divorce Court, and a new Judgeship established.

Ireland exhibits some curious statistical results in the matter of education. The census shows that in 1861, of persons above the age of five years only 65 per cent. of the males, and 58 of the females could read. Consequently, out of the whole population of 5,798,967, two millions were unable to read, exclusively of more than half a million children under five years. In the same year nearly half a million persons were receiving instruction in the schools and colleges in Ireland. Unsatisfactory as the results may be, there is an improvement on the figures of the year 1841, when the art of reading was confined to 54 per cent. of the males, and 41 per cent. of the females above five years of age. Connaught is still in a desperate condition, having only advanced in scholarship in twenty years from 36 to 49 per cent. in the males; and Munster is but a shade better, with an improvement from 48 to 60 per cent. in the same time. It was also found that in 1861 more than one million of persons spoke Irish, but all of these except 163,275 spoke English also; and in this respect, too, Connaught heads the list, and Munster is second, the former county out of a population of less than a million having 77,818 Irish-speaking inhabitants. We may add as a set-off that longevity keeps pace with ignorance, and that 742 persons were existing in Ireland, in 1861, above the age of 100 years, 278 of whom were men, and 464 women.

On Friday, August 14, died Field-Marshal Lord Clyde, aged 70 years. Colin Campbell was born near Glasgow, on the 20th of October, 1792, and entered the army in 1808. His first experience of war was the retreat of Sir John Moore, and the fight at Corunna. Thence he went to join the Walcheren expedition in 1809, with the result to him of a fever, which never left his constitution for thirty years. Afterwards he returned to Spain, and was present at Barossa, and the defence of Tarifa. Through the battle of Vittoria he passed uninjured, but at the head of a forlorn hope at St. Sebastian he was twice wounded, and also received a bullet in the thigh at the passage of the Bidassoa. In 1814, with sabre, bayonet and bullet wounds, and yet only a captain, he went with the 60th Rifles to America, and thereby missed the Waterloo campaign. His next service was against the Blacks in Demerara, in 1823, as Brigade-major. Later he went to China as Lieut.-Colonel of the 98th, and thence to India. At the outbreak of the great Sikh war Colin Campbell was appointed to the command of the Third Division, and wherever the fight was hottest and the crisis of battle impended, there he and his men were found. At Chillianwallah he turned into a splendid but costly victory what might otherwise have been a disastrous rout, and at Goojerat he showed himself the best of tacticians. But his proudest days were yet to come, and when the Russian war broke out, and England rang with the heroism of the storming of the heights of Alma, no man and no body of soldiery were so much the object of pride and admiration as Sir Colin Campbell and the glorious Brigade of Highlanders. Indeed, enthusiasm for him and his men knew no bounds after the action at Balaclava, and the repulse of the Cossack Cavalry by the 93rd Regiment in line and not in square, and without the loss of a soldier. Throughout that terrible winter the Highland Brigade, which took no part in the struggle and victory at Inkermann, covered the right flank of the British army, for Lord Raglan understood and appreciated the energy and experience of Sir Colin Campbell. When the command of the army became vacant by the death of Lord Raglan and the retirement of Sir James Simpson, there probably was not a man in England who did not feel convinced that Sir Colin Campbell was the only man and the best man for the post. Yet for reasons best known to the Government, the clue to which might possibly be found in the delicate requirements of the French Alliance, General Codrington, of the Guards, who had never seen a shot fired in anger before the battle of the Alma, was appointed to the command, over the head of the hero of the Peninsula and the Punjab. Sir Colin returned to England in disgust, and was only induced to resume his command by the personal wish of that Lady whose word with such a soldier was more than law. At the close of the war, Sir Colin was gazetted Lieutenant-General, and doubtless considered his honours and military career consummated. However, he was a man whom a Government might afford to neglect and despise in days of peace and routine, but whom alone officials could implicitly trust in the time of real peril. Consequently, when our Indian Empire was shook to its foundations by the Sepoy mutiny, Sir Colin Campbell was chosen to head the army in Bengal. His method of war was, under the exigency of circumstances, akin to perfection. It was not his business to sacrifice his men or imperil his ultimate success by "sensational" marches or battles. He experienced not a single check, and he left not an enemy behind him in his march. Above all, he never lost a man more than was necessary. Indeed, in this respect, he gave a lesson to his successors important at all times and at all places, but nowhere so important as in India. He taught that the value of the British soldier is incalculable, and that his life and health are the grand objects of a general. No man loved the English soldier so well; and what Lord Herbert was to the soldier in peace, that was Colin Campbell to him in war. On his return from India Sir Colin was appointed Colonel of the Coldstream Guards, and subsequently made Field-Marshal, and raised to the Peerage, with the title of Lord Clyde. In person he was of good height, and of a very well-knit hardy frame. His eye was keen and of great power; his mouth the emblem of resolution. In his old age his hair was grey, short, crisp, and curly; and his appearance was that of a stern, worn, and grand old warrior.

An extraordinary instance of Sabbatarianism run mad has just startled easy-going Englishmen, not of the Exeter Hall school, and, therefore, quite incapable of appreciating the feeling of the religious people of Scotland on the point. The channel fleet, under Rear-Admiral Daeres, C.B., has lately visited the Firth of Forth, and it seems that shortly before the arrival of the fleet, and while the ships were lying off Sunderland, the Sabbath Alliance of Scotland deemed it necessary to address, through a man called James Blackadder, its chairman, a letter to the Admiral, bringing under his notice the great importance of issuing such an order as would prevent the general public from being received on the Sabbath as visitors on board of the ships, and thereby avoid a great amount of desecration. In answer to this cool requisition, the Admiral wrote to say that on board her Majesty's ships on Sundays, Divine service was regularly performed, and no irregularity permitted that would desecrate that or any other day; that he saw no necessity for preventing the public from simply visiting the ships after the hours of Divine service; and the Admiral further intimated that he was acting according to orders. Now, any reasonable being would have been content to put up with so complete and well-merited a snub, but not so the Sabbath Alliance of Scotland, nor James Blackadder, nor the great Dr. Begg, who subsequently, with dueunction, detailed the negotiations to the Commission of the Free Church General Assembly. It is truly wonderful, but not less a fact, that these worthies took it for granted that the Admiral had misunderstood the orders of the Admiralty. Thereupon a communication was addressed to the Duke of Somerset as First Lord of the Admiralty, which only elicited a reply more curt and more unpalatable than that of the Admiral. But a dark hint is thrown out by Dr. Begg that matters did not end here, and that some application or other was made to test how far the Duke of Somerset understood his orders, and, that in consequence, a further snub has been administered to the Alliance by the head of the Government. However this may be, the great Dr. Begg made a terrific harangue to the General Assembly, in which, after stating the circumstances of the affair, he says that from the language of Admiral Daeres it seems that on board the fleet, "the worship—whatever worship there was—seems to have been hurried over at a very early part of the day, because the newspapers inform us that these ships were thrown open at 11 o'clock—that is to say, that they were thrown open to the public at the very time when the ordinary worship of the Sabbath commences." Dr. Begg then proceeded to call the Government ringleaders in inducing the people to violate the Lord's-day, and as such, liable to incur the sin thereof. We have no doubt of the zeal and honesty of Dr. Begg and his coterie, but we would suggest that he add one more important Christian element to his character, and that is charity. Scotch people, and particularly Free Church people, are no doubt very religious and very good, but why should Dr. Begg imagine that they monopolise virtue, and that all other men are sinners? What possible right has he to insinuate that on board her Majesty's ships "worship is hurried over," or that there is no worship at all? Above all, what an absurdity it is to object to worship because it is finished before 11 o'clock. Dr. Begg expressly objects to "canonical hours." What peculiar sanctity can he attach to 11 o'clock? Surely he cannot be ignorant that her Majesty's men do get up in decent time in the morning, and that to them 9 o'clock is much the same as 11 o'clock would probably be to the audience which enjoys the discourses of the reverend minister. Moreover, did Dr. Begg ever call at a friend's house on a Sabbath, and has an officer or seaman no right to see a friend on that day? Like all careless logicians Dr. Begg assumes the minor premiss, and declares that Divine law and also human law have been violated, a figure of rhetoric perhaps in his mouth, but at least a palpable absurdity so far as human law is concerned. We cannot stop to discuss the impertinent conceit which prompted the Alliance to imagine that it understood the orders of Admiral Daeres, and even those of the First Lord of the Admiralty better than they themselves did; but we would suggest that such zeal would ruin the best of causes, and that if the Sabbath Alliance wishes to be powerful it should above all things be careful not to appear absolutely ridiculous.

THE CONTINENT.

Nothing certain is yet known as to the character of the rejoinders which the three Powers have addressed to St. Petersburg. It was anticipated that the Imperial fêtes would have been signalized by some declaration of the French Emperor's intentions, but they passed without sign a circumstance which tends to corroborate the statement generally received, that the notes which have before this time been placed in the hands of Prince Gortschakoff bear a very pacific character. In the present state of popular feeling in France any announcement of an intention to put up with the Russian replies would have produced a very unpleasant effect; whilst a notification of war would have created immense enthusiasm. That nothing was said is a sign, we may take it, that the French Government has accepted the necessities of its position, and with all its desire to assist the Poles has given way to the pacific determination of England and Austria. These two Powers, although professing, and no doubt sincerely, a great desire to aid Poland, would rather see her annihilated than force on a European war from which they have nothing to gain and everything to lose; and the Emperor without them can hardly go to war. He knows that they would watch him with the utmost jealousy, and that although he only carried out what they threatened and fell back from, he might in a very short time find them his active opponents. The Poles have nothing to hope from Europe. France is the only nation which has the will to go to their assistance, and the neighbours of France are so afraid of her aggrandisement that they would willingly sacrifice half-a-dozen nationalities in order to preserve peace.

It is said that Mouravieff has been so successful in Lithuania that the Czar intends to confide the kingdom of Poland to his tender mercies. The rumour is hardly credible. Mouravieff is, no doubt, a very energetic man, and would probably in a short time reduce Poland to order; but the dose would be rather too much for Europe to swallow. It would be a defiance of Western opinion, which might draw even England into war.

There is no war intelligence. The Russians seem to have trampled out the movement in Lithuania and the other provinces which technically form part of the Russian empire. If the impression, generally entertained, that the Western Powers have resolved to content themselves with the promises of Prince Gortschakoff prove correct, we may expect to hear that all serious insurrection is at an end, even in Congress Poland. The struggle is too unequal. It has only been maintained by prodigies of valour, by sacrifices almost beyond example—all lavished in the hope of bringing about intervention. That hope dispelled, the supplies of money, munitions, and men from Posen and Galicia will cease, and the fight will only be continued by small bands, who have no other purpose than to sell their lives as dearly as possible.

The Emperor of Russia has visited Finland, and is said to have been enthusiastically received. The enthusiasm is a very doubtful matter. The truth is that the Fins are not enthusiastic for Russia or for Sweden, but they are very anxious for themselves. In the last war they suffered severely from the visits of the English cruisers, and if war should break out now, they would probably have to bear the brunt. Sweden would most likely be an ally of France. Her object would be the reconquest of Finland, and although the result might be favourable to Finnish prosperity, the cost would be heavy for the Fins, whilst there is no little risk that after all Finland would remain a province of the Russian Empire. Neutrality is what the Fins would like, but that neither Russia nor Sweden will allow them; and although they are not enthusiastic even for the Emperor who has convoked their diet, they doubtless in the instinct of self-preservation pray every day for the suppression of the Polish insurrection, which threatens to bring upon them such terrible havoc.

Prince Roman Czartoryski, who possesses large estates in Posen, has been arrested by the Russian authorities, and his family have the management of the insurrection. The Prince in visiting Poland courted the fate which has befallen him.

The Fürstentag, or Congress of Princes at Frankfort, is the great subject of political interest. The bold initiative of the Emperor of Austria has been so far crowned with success. The influence of Austria is immensely augmented throughout Germany, and the ambitious designs of Prussia are completely checkmated. The Emperor arrived at Frankfort on Saturday, and was received by the Imperial city, which apparently saw its old glories revive, with the greatest enthusiasm. He lodges in the Palace of Prince Thurn and Taxis—the hereditary Postmaster of Southern Germany—which has for a long time been the home of the Diet. The other sovereigns and the delegates of the Free towns arrived on the same or the following day, and on the morning of Monday the deliberations began. The first resolution was the adoption of a collective invitation to the King of Prussia to attend the Congress, which the King of Saxony will convey to William the First. The Emperor developed his plan, of the character of which, and of the course of the proceedings, we have yet no reliable information. The indications which journals supposed to enjoy official inspiration give are by no means concordant. The full details of the plan will no doubt be published in a few days, and it would be a waste of time to discuss as revelations what are only guesses. The Congress, adjourned over the Tuesday, resumed on Wednesday.

The greater part of the German Sovereigns are present at the Congress. The only exceptions of importance are the Kings of Prussia and Denmark. The latter can, of course, have no desire to see the organization of the Confederacy improved, as he would probably be the first sufferer by the change. The reasons for the refusal of the King of Prussia are given in a circular to the Prussian diplomatic agents, which, whilst recognising the necessity of a revision of the Federal constitution, points out the difficulty of bringing a matter so deeply concerning the interests of Germany to discussion and adoption by a conference of Princes without previous preparation by plenipotentiaries of the Governments, and hints at the reaction upon public opinion if such a conference should break up without results. The Prussian Government is, however, willing to take part in a conference of plenipotentiaries upon the subject. These reasons for refusal will not satisfy Germany or Prussia. The Prussians themselves regret that their King did not attend the Congress; they see clearly the loss of influence the step entails. Prussia is isolated. She has no other supporter than Denmark—a support which, in the opinion of all German patriots, will be her severest condemnation. It seems that the King at first intended to go to Frankfort, but that his evil genius, Herr von Bismarck, dissuaded him. The collective invitation is a graceful step. It gives Prussia an opportunity of yet taking her place; it proves that the Congress is anxious, above all things, for her co-operation, and that Austria has no desire to deprive her of her legitimate influence: but if refused, it puts the Prussian Government terribly in the wrong, and will dispel any delusion which may still prevail, that Prussia, in the profession of a desire for Federal reform had any other object than the promotion of her own aggrandising views.

The Emperor's fête has been celebrated with the customary enthusiasm. The intense heat which has raged in Paris induced the Emperor, out of consideration for the men, to dispense with the usual review; but there were magnificent illuminations and other attractions for the holiday makers, composed, in large part, of visitors by the excursion trains from the provinces and foreigners. All the Parisians who can manage it have fled from the heat.

The Emperor has gone to the camp at Chalons. There is a rumour to the effect that he will meet the Emperor of Austria at Baden.

The Ionian Parliament has been dissolved, and a new one called for the express purpose of "consulting in the most formal and authentic manner the wishes of the inhabitants as to their future destiny."

The condition of Greece continues most deplorable. The origin of the evil is graphically portrayed in a speech delivered by the Minister of the Interior in a recent sitting of the National Assembly:—"The melancholy condition of the provinces is the consequence of the parties in the National Assembly. The Government took the reins of administration in a very critical moment, without money, without an army, in the hope of finding support in an agreement of parties; but, on the contrary, they have only shown themselves the more antagonistic, and the demands of the deputies upon the ministry rise every day. Out of the large numbers which daily reach the ministry, only three have put any question as to the condition of the country; all the rest demand appointments, dismissals, and removals of officials. Under such circumstances the Government can do nothing but issue orders; but neither soldiers, nor eparchs, nor monarchs obey. This determines me to give in my resignation to the National Assembly." The people refuse to pay the taxes; the soldiers refuse all obedience, and their commanders rob the treasury as much as they can. They charge for the pay of 1,000 men when they have only 250. Every patriot pillages his country as much as he can.

The Spanish Cortes have been dissolved.

Almost the last act of Sir James Hudson, whose retirement has been the subject of a lively controversy in the English press—the question being whether he voluntarily retired or was driven to resign to make room for Lord Russell's relative, Mr. Elliott—was the signature of a treaty of commerce between Italy and England. The Italian papers announced that subscriptions have been opened for a testimonial to Sir James, who has received the Grand Cross of the Bath.

The party of action is again busy. This time the object is Venetia. Its organs openly avow its plans, and accuse the Government of cowardice, and even treachery, because it does not hurl the young kingdom to its destruction against the Quadrilateral. The Two Sicilies are still in a most disturbed state. "Brigandage" has revived upon the mainland in the provinces most distant from the Roman frontier. The Government is at its wits' end to meet it; as fast as one band is extinguished another springs up. The Chambers just before the close of the session armed it with great and arbitrary powers. Cruelty, however, has been tried too much. The people are with the brigands. Conciliation is the only possible remedy for the evil, which is making the greatest ravages.

The telegraph sometimes makes most ridiculous announcements. Here is one from Brussels:—"Intelligence received here from Rimini states that the first instalment of a loan for the establishment of better means of communication throughout the Republic of San Marino is about to be paid. The loan has been negotiated in Paris by the Chargé d'Affaires of the Republic, with the banking-house of J. Pic and Co." The Republic of San Marino is little more than a geographical square mile in extent. Its revenue is about £1,500 sterling; and its debt rather more than £200. This new loan, of which the first instalment has been paid, and for which the Capitani reggenti have had to go all the way to Paris, may amount, perhaps, to the large sum of £1000. It is not creditable to the intelligence or the care of the editors of the English daily papers, that they should admit such paltry telegraphic news to a prominent place in their columns.

MEXICO.

The Archduke Maximilian has not yet accepted the throne of Mexico. The Austrian press is by no means flattered by the offer, and rather counsels its rejection. It is understood that the Austrian Government takes no part in the matter. The question is left entirely to the Archduke's decision; he is to make his own terms and take himself the profits or the loss. It has been announced that the French Government has revoked the measures of General Forey sequestering the property of those persons who had opposed him, and prohibiting the exportation of specie. It is said that Doblado and Comonfort have given in their adhesion to the French intervention, a statement which requires confirmation, and that Juarez has applied to Washington for assistance.

JAPAN.

The Japanese Government has paid the indemnities demanded for the outrages on British subjects, but has not surrendered the culprits, assigning, and no doubt truthfully, as the reason, that it is unable to do so. The question is not settled. There is little hope that war with its long train of further wars will be avoided.

PARIS TOPICS.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

PARIS, August 18.

THE great heats which drove your correspondent, as well as every one who still had energy enough to move, out of Paris are over. The political as well as the physical atmosphere has cooled down to a very pleasant temperature. It may be that the warmer clothing which the evening air now renders necessary has reminded those Parisians who are ready to shout for anything in hot weather of the furs which a Russian winter renders indispensable; any how, the general impression in Paris is that, for the time, for this year at least, the war in favour of Poland is abandoned. The attitude of the English Parliament has no doubt contributed to this, but there are other causes which have had even greater weight. The Polish emigration is split into two factions, which hate each other as only exiles can hate; the one representing the high-handed aristocracy which was the last representative in Europe of those feudal lords whom French historians—not in disaccord with those of other countries—represent as the most abominable of tyrants, and the democratic party dyed in the deepest red of republicanism. Up to the present time the movement has been directed by the Aristocrats, represented by Czartoryski, men of great wealth and extensive influence, who have spared no money in furthering it, and their persons only because the cause is too dear to them to risk its failure with their lives. But this party has singularly failed, and now Mierolawski and the ultras claim their turn. The victories gained against Russian detachments by the insurgents, if victories they were, were Pyrrhic triumphs of which the aggregate amounts to a defeat. I need not say that the advent of the revolutionary party has been accompanied with a sensible cooling of the affections of the ruling Powers which had seemed to favour the movement. But there is another cause for the change which has come over the French dream. Not only England holds back, and revolution puts itself forward; Austria, the ally on whose co-operation, in default of perfidious Albion, the certainty of a short and successful campaign was based, has in the last three weeks begun to alter her tone. The ill-judged proclamation of the so-called National Government, claiming the whole of ancient Poland—which was, in fact, an appeal to a general war—and the recollection of the Italian campaign, begun with a limited object which it did not attain, but which resulted in greater changes than its author ever intended or could have wished, alarmed the great Conservative Power. If in one case the ally of France went far beyond the aim of the secret conventions which preceded the breaking out of hostilities, in the other he might be unable to secure even the integrity of his present territory, much less an augmentation. Austria has a bloodless game to play in Germany, and she is playing it with the consummate ability which an adversary's faults ensure, and she will throw away none of her chances by embarking in an adventure which becomes every day more doubtful.

The peace party, that is, all the monied interests, although they have not yet plucked up courage to improve the quotations of stock, find many things in the news of the last few days to countenance their hopes. The Emperor was very civil to Madame de Budberg, the Russian Ambassadress, at the ball at St. Cloud on Friday. Poland had dropped out of the contata sang at the opera on Saturday, and on Sunday it was known that M. Drouyn de Lhuys was to absent himself for some days. It seems certain that the Western Powers have decided on giving Russia the benefit of the winter to secure the pacification of Poland, and monied men are too good Christians not to leave the spring to take care of itself.

It is still thought very uncertain whether the Arch-duke Maximilian, whom the Charivari represented a year ago as taking lessons on the guitar to fit him for the Mexican throne, finds himself a sufficient proficient to venture on such a stage. The Moniteur of yesterday contains a leader to announce the revocation of General Forey's order for the confiscation of the property of recalcitrants. At the same time the blockade of all the ports not in the hands of the French (and they are rather a long list), has been ordered for the purpose of depriving the insurrection of its pecuniary resources.

The expedition to Mexico is not—never has been, popular in France, but there are many who begin to recognise its utility. At a comparatively small cost of blood and treasure, the Emperor has fixed a limit to the pretensions of American Democracy. It is felt on all hands that to secure his conquest, to prevent Mexico becoming another Spain, his next step must be favourable to the Confederate States. A monarchical Mexico would be a neighbour whom the old United States could not brook, and notwithstanding the patience of the old bull-dog, and the hatred with which he is avowedly regarded in the North, there is little doubt that the new comer would seem to the politicians of Washington a safer object of attack than the hereditary foe on the other frontier. From this day forward it must therefore be the object of the French Government to favour the consolidation of an agricultural and, because agricultural, not an aggressive, Power, on the frontiers of a State which must for many years remain under French protection. Accordingly, in the semi-official papers there have appeared articles reviewing the last events in America, and showing that the recent successes of the Northern arms have had no other result than the spilling of more blood, without having any effect on the ultimate decision of the contest. The conference of the German Sovereigns at Frankfurt fills all the papers now; but so soon as this is over, and the Polish question, as now seems probable, receives a diplomatic solution, or is at least set aside for the winter, you may expect to see appeals to public opinion here in favour of a recognition of the Confederate States. Among the nominations in the Legion of Honour which appeared on the 15th, may be remarked the name of M. Paul, the French consul at Richmond, who is promoted to the rank of officer. This may be considered significant.

The Emperor has gone to the camp of Chalons with the little Prince, but he is to return to St. Cloud on Sunday. The Empress then leaves for Biarritz, but it is said that he will remain another week here, during which time his promised visit to Cherbourg will probably take place.

GARIBALDI AND PRESIDENT LINCOLN. (From our Own Correspondent.)

TURIN, August 14th.

Garibaldi, having nothing else to do, has addressed a letter to Abraham Lincoln, "the Liberator of the Slaves of the American Republic," which appeared, on the 11th instant, in the Diritto, an ultra-Radical paper, published in this city. The world needed not the evidence of this letter to prove that Garibaldi is a man of little judgment and of no political sagacity. Perhaps you will find space for the following literal translation of this document:—

If amidst the roar of your titanic battles, our voice can reach you, O Lincoln, allow us, the free sons of Columbus, to send you a word of greeting and admiration for the great work you have undertaken.

You, the inheritor of Christ and Brown's idea, you will pass down to posterity with the name of Liberator, a name more enviable than any crown or human treasure.

A whole race of men yoked to the collar of slavery by selfishness, is, through you, and at the price of the noblest American blood, restored to the dignity of man, to civilization, and love.

America, the teacher of liberty to our fathers, inaugurates again the solemn era of human progress; and while she astonishes the world with her gigantic daring, makes us sadly think how this old Europe, also convulsed by the great cause of liberty, can find neither intellect nor heart to emulate her.

While the parasites of despotism sing the Bacchanalian Ode and revel at the fall of a free people, let the free religiously rejoice at the fall of slavery—two mysterious parallels of history, the spoliation of Mexico and Lincoln's proclamation. We hail thee, Abraham Lincoln, the pilot of liberty! You, also, who for the last two years have fought and died around his regenerating standard, hail! Thou redeemed race, hail! The free men of Italy kiss the glorious scars of thy chains.

G. GARIBALDI.

That General Garibaldi was no Julius Cæsar we knew long ago, but that he would impudently associate the name of Christ with that of John Brown—a thief and a murderer; that, after the late orgies of New York, he would publicly belie history, by declaring that the policy of Abraham Lincoln restores the whole slave race of America to "man's dignity, civilization, and love;" and that he would pervert facts by assuming that America (i.e. the North) "astonishes the world with her gigantic daring," while it is a matter of notoriety she has had little to register on her escutcheon during these two years but plundering of towns, shooting of inoffensive citizens, and popular riots, is somewhat surprising.

The Gazzetta di Torino, a paper very much in favour of the Union, says:—

Though we are for the Union and the abolition of slavery, we object to signing the address, because we do not believe America "astonishes the world with her gigantic daring;"

because we denounce the false insinuations about the "parasites of despotism who sing the Bacchanalian Ode," and "the mysterious parallels of history," and President Lincoln as "the pilot of liberty."

The Discussione, a Liberal paper of the Conservative party, reproduced the address on the 12th inst., and to-day comments on it as follows:—

We should have contented ourselves with publishing the address, thinking it too insignificant to deserve a serious examination, but since the Turin correspondent of the Unita Italiana writes that we would, perhaps, comment upon it, according to our slavish sympathies, we think fit to make the following observations:—

1. John Brown was convicted of theft and murder, and as such condemned to be hanged by the legitimate authorities of the country, the Federal Government of that epoch performing the arrest of and disarming the whole gang. We believe the junction of Christ's and Brown's names to be impious and blasphemous.

2. The friends of order and liberty, under whatever form it reveals itself, we are far from being the friends of slavery; but it is erroneous to suppose that Lincoln restores the negroes to dignity, civilization, and love. His proclamation of emancipation is only a military measure, inasmuch as it declares free the negroes of rebel planters, while it maintains in slavery the negroes of the loyal ones. The war is professedly waged by the North for the maintenance of the Union and the Constitution; and these same Union and Constitution sanction slavery; therefore, he who wishes for the re-establishment of the Union, wishes also for the conservation of slavery.

3. We, who have really at heart the welfare of that unfortunate race, desire a gradual emancipation, for we are convinced—and all credible economists think as we do—that the black race of America would find their own destruction in a violent enfranchisement, either because of the excesses they would commit through ignorance, or of the want of proper means to provide for their immediate necessities. As for the rest, the late popular orgies in New York, and the massacres at Alexandria and Port Hudson, prove sufficiently to us what kind of love the North entertains for the poor negroes.

4. It is not true that America "astonishes the world with her gigantic daring." On the contrary, the North has given so far a very pitiful spectacle of herself, both in the defeats she has sustained, in the frequent violations of her constitution she has bowed to, and in the acts of vandalism, pillage, and incendiarism she has committed. Garibaldi, accustomed as he is to exaggeration in expression, has in this instance gone beyond his usual length, unless, indeed, he meant to be bitterly ironical.

5. We deplore the fatuity of the signers of the address in believing Lincoln to be the pilot of liberty. A policy which displays itself by devastation and bomb shells cannot be called liberty's policy, even when exercised in the name of wise institutions; and we emphatically declare we would never trust Italy's ship to such a pilot.

These are the only two papers in the whole kingdom that have so far paid any attention to Garibaldi's address to President Lincoln, and their comments are creditable to the common sense and free spirit of the country.

THE NEW JERSEY PROTEST.

The subjoined protest against the usurpation and tyranny of the Lincoln Government has been widely circulated in New Jersey:—

FREEMEN, AWAKE!

"Who would be free, himself must strike the blow."

First.—The only solid foundation for all government is the consent of the governed. Governments exist for the benefit of the people, and not the people for the benefit of governments.

A government which fails to promote the interests and secure the affections of its people does not deserve to stand.

These principles are the foundation of the Federal Union; to deny them is to undermine our own political structure, to slander the title by which we have a place among the nations of the earth.

Second.—The people of the Southern States have of their own consent established a separate government, sustained it for more than two years with remarkable unanimity and devotion, under circumstances of great difficulty and trial.

We cannot, consistently with our traditions and our principles, deny to that people the right of self-government, or oppose by force the existence of the government they have set up. If we cannot conquer them by the arts and arms of peace, we have no right to conquer them at all.

To speak of a "Union" by force, is simply absurd; a piece of Puritanical hypocrisy.

Third.—The glory of a nation is: To establish justice, unity, peace, and concord; to ensure domestic tranquillity; to promote the general welfare; to secure the blessings of liberty and civilization; to cultivate the highest standards of morals and religion.

Territorial possessions may distract and weaken; wealth will enervate and corrupt; avarice, fanaticism, and revenge must debase; and ambition generally destroys.

Fourth.—When the present Administration was elected to office, among all the nations of the earth there was not one greater than the United States of America; not one more prosperous and happy; not one which conferred superior blessings on mankind. The people were proud of their Government and loved it; they would not have exchanged it for any other on the face of the globe; they hoped to transmit the jewel, with untarnished lustre, to remotest generations.

Fifth.—Within the last two years this Government has suffered a grievous change, a most disastrous and humiliating eclipse. It has become a filthy hybrid; a monster, smeared with the bloody sacrifice of its own children; a detestable compound of crimes and vices; a despotism which cannot fitly be described in decorous language, "the sum of all villainies; a league with hell and a covenant with death."

The Administration is ignorant, conceited, and vulgar; cunning, insincere, and unscrupulous; fierce, sanguinary, and cruel; full of all subtlety and all mischief; of all hypocrisy and deceit. It is without truth or honesty, without manliness or decency. Its avarice is insatiable; its corruption unbounded; for gain it will do anything, however infamous, oppressive, and wasteful, and does not scruple to barter the whole country for profit. It is a bully, a braggart, and a coward; it domineers by terror over weakness; it shrinks from truth and daylight; it deals in pimps, spies, and informers, and fears an enemy in every shadow. With bands of armed men it strikes down the liberty of the citizen at the dead of night, when he is surprised, solitary, and defenceless; wages war on women and young children. It is barbarous and wanton, for it desolates peaceful and inoffensive lands with fire and flood; it destroys cities, towns, villages, and solitary dwellings; it plunders wherever its emissaries prowl, destroying what cannot be taken away. It does not spare the sacred monuments of art, science, and literature; respects not the grave; has no pity for the shrieks and entreaties of helplessness and purity, and the instruments of its crimes are only less detestable than the crimes themselves, and the criminals.

In everything, and in the most stupendous proportions, is this Administration abominable; the stench thereof rises towards heaven as the stench of Sodom and Gomorrah. It is a foe to all goodness, and whosoever should destroy it would confer a blessing on mankind.

Sixth.—The Southern people are fighting for our liberties, as well as for their own. No greater calamity could happen to us than their overthrow; the destruction of the one would speedily be followed by the subjugation of the other.

Seventh.—Should the Confederate army capture Washington and exterminate the herd of thieves, Pharisees, and cut-throats which pasture there, defiling our temple of liberty, we should regard it as a special interposition of Divine Providence in behalf of justice, judgment, and mercy.

Eighth.—No portion of this Union is entitled to public sympathy, or assistance, or protection from Southern defensive invasion, so long as it continues to be a party to the present aggressive war. There cannot be innocent accomplices in crimes at which humanity stands aghast.

Ninth.—"The thirty pieces of silver," the price of blood and the general ruin, is not entitled to protection. Let those who have grown fat on the misfortunes of the land, defend their own plunder, fight a little, steal and bellow less.

Tenth.—So long as the present war continues and despotism prevails, we shall have no disposition to oppose a Confederate army, whether on our borders or in our midst—rather would we hail them as friends and deliverers.

Eleventh.—We arraign Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, and the men of his council, before the bar of public opinion and national justice, for the following high crimes, felonies, and misdemeanors:—

For the country they have betrayed; for the oaths they have violated; for the Constitution they have trampled underfoot; for the laws they have perverted or annulled; for the power they have abused and usurped; for the Union they have destroyed; for the precious hopes they have blasted; for the liberties they have taken away; for the rivers of blood they have shed; for the armies they have slaughtered; for the manifold, excessive, and widespread defraudings, robberies, plunderings, desolations, wastes, and cruelties they have perpetrated.

We arraign them for converting this once great, prosperous, free, and happy land into a land of discord, strife, and despotism—of ruin, misery, and shame.

Twelfth.—These pernicious criminals we propose to try by authority of all the laws their despotism has left us, by that very law of necessity and self-preservation which they maliciously, traitorously, and falsely have invoked, promulgated, and enforced. And we shall appeal for justice to that universal sentiment which passes judgment on all such as are enemies to the human race.

Thirteenth.—Fellow citizens: in the name of the Thirteen Colonies we say to you—"Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God."

SPRIT OF '76.

4th July, 1863.

THE SIEGE AND FALL OF VICKSBURG.

The following interesting account of the siege and fall of Vicksburg is communicated by "One of the Garrison" to the Mobile Register of July 19.

On Sunday, the 17th of May, the Confederate army fell back from their position east of Big Black, their breastworks having been stormed by the enemy on that morning, and about 8 o'clock on Sunday night reached the city of Vicksburg, where they were immediately reorganized and placed in the following positions: General Smith's division on the extreme left, Major-General Forney in the centre, Major-General Stephenson on the right, and Brigadier-General Bowen's division of Missourians held in reserve. At about 2 o'clock on Monday afternoon the enemy's skirmishers came in sight and opened fire on our line of works without doing any damage whatever to the Confederate army; by 7 o'clock that night they had placed several batteries in position about 300 yards from the breastworks, but abstained from firing. On Tuesday morning before daylight they opened fire from their batteries, our guns responding immediately and with fine effect, compelling the enemy to shift their batteries several times. At the same time the enemy endeavoured to throw forward a body of sharpshooters, but were prevented by the fire of our men from so doing. The artillery duel and sharpshooting continued for about three hours, when General Pemberton rode up and ordered our men to cease firing, as he desired no artillery duels. In obedience to the order our men ceased firing, and the result was that next morning the enemy, emboldened by our silence, approached 100 yards nearer than they were the day before, without any opposition. On Tuesday the enemy made their first assault on the line of works held by Brigadier-General Shoup's Brigade of Louisianians. They marched up in one solid column, our men withholding their fire until the enemy had approached within thirty yards of the lines, when they opened a terrific volley of musketry. The enemy wavered a moment, then marched forward; they were again met by another volley, when they broke and fled under cover of the hills. This was the only attempt made on that day to force our lines, and the attempt was evidently made more with the intention of "feeling" our lines than with any serious idea of storming them.

The days intervening from the 19th to the 22nd were spent in one continued bombardment and sharpshooting during the day; in the night they generally ceased firing. On the morning of the 22nd the enemy opened a terrific fire with their Parrott guns, and continued it till about eleven o'clock, when the bombardment ceased, and heavy columns of the enemy could be seen forming in line of battle. Our forces were all ready for them, and eager for their advance. At about a quarter to twelve the columns of the Federal army advanced all along the lines in splendid order, and with a loud cheer dashed up to the works. They were gallantly responded to by our brave boys, and the first charge repulsed. On the extreme right of our lines the nature of the ground prevented the enemy from making any heavy attack, but on the right of the centre, the centre, and the left of the centre, the assault was desperately made and gallantly met—but once did our lines break, and that was in Lee's Brigade; the enemy gained a temporary footing on the rifle pits; but Lee quickly rallied his men, and after a desperate hand-to-hand fight drove them out and re-occupied the lines. The engagement at this point and the right of the line, held by Brigadier-General L. Herbert, was of a terrible nature, the Federals having thrown their best troops on these works. Five times did they charge, and each time were repulsed. The last charge on the right of Brigadier-General Herbert's lines was made by an Irish regiment, (the 17th Wisconsin), carrying the green flag of Erin. They came at a double quick up the hill, each man in the front rank furnished with ladders to reach the works. Three times they essayed to plant their ladders, but were prevented by the obstinate resistance offered by the consolidated 21st and 23rd Louisiana regiments. At the third charge they came within ten yards of the line, but two volleys of buck-shot from the shot guns of our forces compelled them to make a precipitate retreat from the front of our works. At about 2 o'clock they made their last charge, and were again repulsed, when they retired, and did not attempt any further demonstration that day. The loss of the enemy on that occasion is estimated, by competent parties, at not less than from 8,000 to 10,000, while our loss was between 800 and 1,000 in killed and wounded. To describe the battle would be an impossibility, the cannonading appeared like one continued peal of thunder, and the sharp crack of thousands of rifles lent a grandeur to the scene that defies description. That day was no doubt the heaviest and most desperate assault on a line of breastworks that has ever been attempted during this war. No higher praise can be given to our troops for repulsing the enemy than the acknowledgment that the enemy fought with a valour worthy of a better cause, and the frank acknowledgment of General Grant that the troops that kept him out of Vicksburg for forty-seven days on one-quarter rations were the bravest troops he ever saw, and men that could have kept him out as long as they had provisions. On the 22nd, we lost some noble men, among whom were Colonel Herrick, of the 21st Louisiana, Captain Gomez, of the same regiment, and other gallant and chivalrous Southern men.

From the commencement of the siege to the 26th of May, the enemy had only fired during the day, but from Tuesday, the 26th, they kept up one continued fire night and day. The mortars on the peninsula opposite Vicksburg opened fire on the 25th of May, and continued an unceasing fire until the surrender of the city. Each day new batteries were erected, and a larger amount of guns brought to bear upon the town. It was estimated that as many as 6,000 mortar shells alone were thrown into Vicksburg every twenty-four hours, and on the line in the rear of the city as many as 4,000 per day.

After the grand attack on the 22nd of May, the enemy evidently perceived the hopelessness of taking Vicksburg by storm; they then commenced mining our works.

The writer here criticises the generalship of the commander, and thinks by a liberal use of ammunition the enemy might have been kept a greater distance from the lines.

From the 22nd of May to the 25th of June, no attempt was made of any serious nature with the exception of the attack by the turreted iron-clad gunboat Cincinnati, to silence one of our land batteries. The engagement lasted about fifteen minutes, when the Cincinnati commenced sinking, having been pierced several times by the Brook gun, known as "Whistling Dick." This was a spirited and exciting engagement, and the result appeared wholly unexpected by the Federals, as they confidently anticipated the destruction of the battery by their vaulted iron-clad. During the engagement a number of the enemy congregated on the bank of the river opposite Vicksburg, while Sherman, with his entire corps, rested on their arms, waiting for the destruction of the works, when he would "enter Vicksburg without any trouble." As soon as it became evident that the boat was sinking, she was run ashore and set on fire. She now lies a dismantled wreck immediately above the city on the Mississippi shore.

From the commencement of the siege to the 26th of June, our loss in officers had been very large; Lieut.-Colonel Rogers, of the 17th Louisiana, and Major Hoadly, of the heavy artillery, killed; Colonel Patten, Lieut.-Colonel Steever, Colonel Marks, Colonel Harrison, Brigadier-General Baldwin, Captain Bruike, and others wounded, all belonging to the field and staff. Colonel Garrott, commanding an Alabama regiment, was killed at the breastworks; also Captain Emanuel, Chief of Artillery of Herbert's Brigade, and a most promising young officer.

For about five days after the siege commenced, the troops were allowed full rations. At the expiration of that time they were gradually reduced to the following amount of food:—4 ounces of flour, 4 ounces of bacon, 1½ ounce of rice, 2 ounces of peas (the latter not eatable), and 3 ounces of sugar—making a total of 14½ ounces of food per day. From the small number of our forces it took every man to defend the lines, so that the men had no time whatever to rest. Occasionally a company would be permitted to go out to wash their clothes, taking their arms with them, and receiving strict orders at the first sound of musketry to hurry back to their position. Whole companies would lie back of the breastworks for three weeks without leaving the line for a moment.

It had been previously known that the enemy were undermining our works, particularly the fort on the immediate left of the Jackson road, and occupied by the 3rd Louisiana regiment of Hébert's brigade. At about half-past four or five on Thursday, June 25, a terrific explosion took place, caused by the blowing up of the above-mentioned fort. Luckily most of our forces occupying that line had been withdrawn to an inner line of entrenchments, erected by our forces in anticipation of the fort being blown up, so that only a few men were wounded by the explosion. As soon as the fort was destroyed, a column of the enemy advanced, as if with the intention of storming the line, but were met by the 6th Missouri, under Colonel Eugene Erwin. A desperate struggle for mastery now took place. Colonel Erwin was the first to ascend the parapet. As soon as he had mounted, a shot from the enemy's sharpshooters pierced his heart and he fell dead. He was a grandson of Henry Clay, and one of the most ardent supporters of Southern rights. The 6th Missouri enraged at his death, and aided by the 3rd Louisiana, sprang on the dismantled fort, and after a severe combat, drove the enemy from their position. Our loss on this occasion was heavy, being no less than eighty-six killed and wounded. The loss of the enemy was estimated between 300 and 400. They were severely punished in their first attempt at "blowing up" our works.

We now have to record an event of a most melancholy nature:—On the 27th of June, Brigadier-General Grenoy, of Missouri, was shot in the neck by a minie ball. He lingered for about an hour, when he died. He was an aged man, beloved by all who knew him, for his devotion to our cause, his intrepid valour, and his genial and amiable qualities. He was a quiet and unassuming man; the meanest private in his command had free access to his presence, and he was looked upon by his men, not as a General, but a father to his brigade. Many noble sons of Missouri have fallen during this war, but none of her martyrs in our war of Independence will be spoken of in more glowing terms, or more deserved praise, than "the old man" who fell in defence of Vicksburg. His wish was gratified—he lived not to see Vicksburg fall!

During the siege many instances of daring took place. Several times our forces sallied out, taking prisoners. Among them were one Lieut.-Col. Cann, of an Illinois regiment, with a good many subaltern officers and privates. On the 22nd May, the 2nd Texas of Moore's brigade captured a stand of colours from the enemy in the following manner: The enemy charged up the hill towards our works; as soon as they had arrived about thirty yards from our line of breastworks, the colour-bearer of the regiment rushed forward and planted the United States' flag on the edge of our works. One of the men of the 2nd Texas quickly jumped out of the rifle pits, shot the colour-bearer, and taking away the flag, returned to the lines. Many other instances of individual heroism occurred during the siege too numerous to narrate. Our forces buoyed up with the hope of a speedy relief, determined never to permit the enemy to cross the line of our works. Repeated assurances were given to the men that succour would soon arrive. Couriers arriving from Johnston brought most exaggerated reports of the strength of the army under his command—many placing it as high as 80,000 effective men.

While these events were transpiring at the breastworks around the town, the enemy were not idle on the peninsula opposite. One constant stream of mortar shells was poured into the devoted city, the enemy exhibiting a refinement of cruelty in throwing their shells at the hospitals particularly, aware that the men who were now well and hearty were perfectly indifferent to the storm of shot and shell poured like hail upon them. They fired into buildings on which the yellow flag waved, killing and wounding several of the inmates. Whether General Pemberton offered any remonstrance at their doing so, has not been ascertained. If he did, no regard was paid to his complaint. The women and children remaining in town suffered severely, no less than three having been killed and twelve wounded during the siege. In spite of which, with all the heroism that characterizes our Southern women, those remaining well declared their willingness to run the risk of being killed rather than lose Vicksburg. Among the ladies wounded are Mrs. Hazzard, Mrs. C. W. Petus, Mrs. H. H. Clements, Mrs. Major T. B. Read, Miss Lucy Rawlings, and Miss Maggie Cook, the most of these ladies being well known in the State of Mississippi. The firing on the city was not marked with the same regularity and precision observed on the front of our breastworks, the mortar shells falling in every direction over the town, as if no particular object was aimed at. After the surrender of the town the Federal artillery officers stated that the mortars and Parrott guns opposite the city were manned by fresh troops, and were placed there for a double purpose—first, to annoy us in the city, and to practise themselves in that arm of the service, and gave that as their excuse for our hospitals having been struck so often. The enemy's sharpshooters were all splendid shots, and after the first few days of the siege it was a very dangerous thing for any one to look over the breastworks. So accurately did they aim, and in such numbers were they, that a hat placed on a stick and held above the fort for two minutes was pierced by fifteen minie balls.

On the 29th of June the enemy succeeded in blowing up the same portion of our line again. We lost several men of the 3rd Louisiana from the explosion. The enemy, however, made no attempt to charge the work, being apparently contented with the occupation of one portion of the ruined fort.

Tremendous cannonading continued during the remaining few days of the siege, with but little damage to the Confederates. The men were all in good spirits, and appeared satisfied to live on the meagre allowance of rations given them, rather than yield the city they had defended gallantly for so long a period. Not a murmur was heard among them—all were inspired with the greatest enthusiasm and devotion to their cause, and the word "surrender" was never broached among them. Five or six days previous to the surrender of the city "mule meat" was tried and found of good quality, the meat being equal to the finest venison, and was freely eaten by the soldiers and citizens alike.

An attempt was made by our forces to countermine the enemy, but the attempt signally failed—as from the position of the enemy's works they could not be mined.

On Friday morning, the 3rd of July, General Pemberton sent out a flag of truce, and a short time afterwards himself and Brigadier-General Bowen were seen leaving our lines. As soon as they left the works the men conjectured that the object of his going to Grant in person was to treat for a surrender of the city. There was soon considerable excitement observed among the soldiers, not one of whom favoured such a course; the excitement was partly allayed by the statement that General Pemberton had gone to Grant for the purpose of getting his consent to our removing the sick and wounded, and the women and children, from the town. After remaining at Grant's headquarters for about two hours, Generals Pemberton and Bowen returned. An armistice had been declared till 10 o'clock that night. The firing had ceased, and nothing but the voices of soldiers in angry and indignant conversation could be heard.

At half-past 6 o'clock on Friday evening a meeting of all the Generals took place at General Pemberton's headquarters, and at 10 o'clock a messenger went into the Federal lines with despatches from Pemberton.

On Saturday morning a circular from the Lieut.-General commanding announced the surrender of the city, and the terms of capitulation, as follows:—The entire force of Confederate troops were to surrender as prisoners of war, to the United States' army, under General Grant; the whole army, including the Generals, were to be immediately paroled and sent into our lines; all officers were to retain their arms; all mounted officers to have the privilege of riding out; private property to be respected, and all parties, whether citizens or not, connected in any manner with the army, were to be allowed the privilege of leaving the Federal lines on parole. All ammunition, stores, field artillery and siege guns were to be surrendered to the United States' army, as well as all small arms in our possession.

On Saturday morning, at half-past eleven o'clock, the men having stacked their arms, marched from the breastworks they had stood behind with such heroic valour for nearly two months. Soon after the Federal army commenced pouring into the town—in the space of fifteen minutes the city was crammed with them—and then began a scene of pillaging. Houses and stores were broken open, and the contents appropriated by the Federals. In justice to General Grant, I would say, that as soon as complaint was made to him, a guard was placed at all the buildings that had been broken open. Soon after entering the city, the Stars and Stripes were hoisted up on the spire of the courthouse, amid the exultant shouts of the Federal soldiers, and the deepest feeling of humiliation on the part of the Confederates.

The Confederate army remained in the city for one week, during which time repeated fights took place in the streets between our men and the Federals—many of whom were very insulting and full of taunting remarks on the downfall of our Gibraltar.

On Saturday, the 11th of July, at about 12 o'clock, the Confederate army, having all been paroled, took up its line of march from Vicksburg, and arrived at Big Black that evening. It was a solemn and imposing departure. Tears were seen coursing the cheeks of many of our troops, and ever and anon the men would turn back to take one last look at the city they had so well and nobly defended. On Tuesday morning the troops commenced arriving at Brandon, where it is anticipated they will remain for a few days.

Thus fell the city of Vicksburg, after an obstinate and heroic defence of forty-seven days, for forty-two of which the Confederate army had subsisted on one-quarter rations. The city is now in the hands of the invaders, yet its fall adds not one single laurel to their wreath of victory. Starvation succeeded in doing what the enemy could never have done, and though the result was a reverse to the Confederate arms, when future historians shall speak of the siege of Vicksburg, the memory of the gallant men who bared their bosoms with unflinching firmness to the storm of shot and shell poured upon them will shine with a lustre of unsurpassed magnificence. All honour to them! Nobly have they sustained the Southern name, and in their fall robbed the enemy of a single claim of victory!

[Here follow some comments on the want of provisions, which the writer thinks ought to have been avoided.]

Our fortifications were pronounced by the Federal officers to be the "most miserable" they had ever seen, and it was a matter of great surprise to them that, with fifteen months' time, we had not erected works that could have defied an army of 200,000 men. The works were so badly made that the damage done to them by the enemy's fire in the day could scarcely be repaired by a large force of men working all night. Our engineers only existed in name; in fact, there was not one man among them that understood the duty. The fortifications were so poor that General M'Pherson, after riding over the line, is said to have exclaimed, "Good Heavens! are these the boasted fortifications of Vicksburg? It was the rebels alone, and not their works, that kept us out of this town."

The amount of prisoners captured at Vicksburg was about 23,000 altogether—among them were three major-generals, and nine brigadier-generals. About 90 pieces of artillery were captured, of which several are unfit for use; 40,000 stand of arms and between 35 and 40 stand of colours were taken by the enemy. The amount of ammunition surrendered is immense, there not being less than six months' supply stored away in the magazines.

The writer, who throughout his narrative betrays a strong bias against General Pemberton, concludes by criticising severely, and as it seems to us, without warrant, his military conduct and capacity. We must make every allowance for the disappointment of a soldier who was ready to die rather than surrender.

THE NAVIGATION OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

(From the Mobile Register of July 19.)

THE Memphis Bulletin of the 8th says,—The Mississippi river will soon be entirely opened by the triumphant capture of Port Hudson, and the resumption of our trade here is looked for as a consequence. When steamboats for New Orleans, and from it, are daily landing at our wharf, the Chamber of Commerce will again be, daily, the busiest spot in the city.

This dream of profitable trade is destined to be dashed from Yankee lips. The Memphis editor will awaken to disappointment and not to fruition. There can be no peaceful commerce on a river washing two thousand miles of hostile banks.

The time has come to combat the enemy on the great river in a new form. It has been gravely doubted by some whether the proper method of disputing the possession of the river was to seize and fortify salient points like Fort Pillow, Vicksburg, or Port Hudson.

The current of war has brought us to the test of the other mode advocated by the opponents of this system of defence. The first has been tried and through a negligence, that is without parallel and without conceivable excuse, has failed. Let us now prepare for the other system. It is to organize small guerilla parties of sharpshooters and light artillery to annoy the enemy at every point of approach to the river. The expedition should be planned on the principle of rapid mobility, to watch the passing transports, give them fire and retire upon the approach of a hostile foe. It is not humanly possible for the enemy, with all his gunboats and all his means, to guard the river at all points. No better service to the cause can be rendered than by numberless small squads of guerillas watching their opportunity and making the navigation of the "great river" a subject of constant anxiety and peril. This will soon open the eyes of the Northwest to the emptiness of the promises of Lincoln and his Generals that the fall of Vicksburg would revive their lost trade on the Mississippi river.

WE learn through a private source that Geo. B. Lawrison, Esq., a prominent citizen of New Orleans, and Secretary of the Committee of Public Safety there, has been released by order of General Banks, having been in close confinement ever since the occupation of the city by General Butler. It is supposed that Mr. Lawrison, since his liberation, which took place in the middle of July, has gone by a flag of truce back to Mobile.

An extract from the Washington National Intelligencer is communicated by the Foreign Office to the press for publication. It purports to be a copy of an order issued by Rear-Admiral Porter, providing for conveying trading vessels down the Mississippi. "Steamers destined for New Orleans with merchandise shipped and permitted according to law, will be conveyed all the way through to Vicksburg, from which place a sufficient force will be ready to start every Monday morning to give protection to the convoys. No vessel will be permitted to go down the river without a convoy for the present, and steamers will be obliged to lay over for a week if they do not arrive on or before the day of the week on which the convoys start. Armed vessels, however, going between times, will also give convoy, but no regularity must be expected, as they have to stop on the way. This arrangement will commence on the 10th of August next."

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at the earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Boulevard-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

The INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the paper made:—

At Liverpool, to WM. KNOX, Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings, At Paris, to Messrs. PFEIFFER and MULLER, 52, Rue du Château d'Eau, Paris.

Northern versus Southern Slavery.

THE New York Tribune, the well-known organ of Abolitionism, as well as several other "isms," commends as "highly creditable to both the head and heart of Brigadier-General Payne," the latter's report of his plan of managing slaves on estates which have come under the occupation of the Federal armies. It appears from the report of this military overseer, that while he pays the black men wages he takes care to inform them that he "would stop the pay of any lazy or disobedient servant, and would punish him besides." This last sentence throws a world of light on the Federal scheme of emancipation. It tallies perfectly with a prospectus now before us, setting forth "to capitalists" the official plan of managing plantations in Federal possession in Louisiana, to which is appended an assurance on the part of "Lieut. George H. Hanks, General Superintendent of Negro labour," that he will "use strong measures to enforce labour." General Phelps does not enter into the details of his system in Tennessee, but the more minute Lieut. Hanks supplies this deficiency from Louisiana. The negroes are "to do such a day's work as was done in former years;" they are to "obey the manager in all things;" they are to "go to work at daylight, and work until dark, taking the usual number of hours for meals;" they are "to rise at the tap of the bell, to be in their cabins at the last tap of the bell, and to remain there until the first bell in the morning;" "no one will leave the place without a written pass." All these rules are to be enforced by numerous and various penalties, the severer of which are only indicated under the vague phrase of "strong measures." Now, let the candid reader note well the features of this system of Federal "free labour," which the leading advocate of forcible emancipation commends as creditable both to the head and heart of the Federal officers. Let him point out, if he can, the superiority of the new system over the old, and let him also mark the differences between the two, for they are many and striking.

First, there is the usual work to be done,—“tasks will be given when possible,”—and the same hours of labour to be kept which writers of the Abolition school have loved to represent as cruelly exhausting beyond description, and which an English professor of political economy has averred to lead to such a waste of human life as can only be replaced by wholesale importation from supposed "breeding States" through means of an enormous internal slave trade. Then there is the same restraint upon individual movements, the same rising and retiring at a given signal, the same prohibition "to leave the place without a written pass," the same despotic command "to obey the manager in all things," that have been complained of as the worst features of slavery; only that the discipline is evidently a harder one, for under the old system the negro might hunt 'possums and 'coons at night, or sing and dance to his heart's content. We have then all the essential conditions of slavery—arbitrary power, despotic jurisdiction, compulsory labour under pain of bodily punishment. But we look in vain for the modifying influences which alleviated the evils of the old practice. In the place of the master brought from childhood in close and cordial contact with the inferior race, bred to the habit of command from which self-control is inseparable, recognising a personal tie in the relations of his servant to himself, and at worst being influenced by the motives of an ever-present self-interest, and the pride which a man takes in all that belongs to him, even if it is only a dumb and useless animal—in the place of this master, belonging almost of necessity to an educated class and a high social sphere, we have the arbitrary manager, a stranger from a land where the negro is regarded as a leper, where he is massacred in every ebullition of popular fury, where he is not permitted to ride in the same railway carriage or omnibus as the white man, where he is not allowed even the right of residence, much less any other right. We lack also the gentle mistress, with her tender care for the moral and spiritual welfare of her subordinates tending the sick, praying to the dying, carrying comfort and brightness into the cheerless cabin. Whoever has watched the development of the Yankee character in this war, its fierce vulgarity, its brutal propensities, its mean vindictiveness, its cowardly ferocity, will tremble for the poor negro on his transfer from a Southern to a Northern master. Let us be certain that the worst does not appear in the published programmes of the "military superintendents of negro labour." And per contra, in these minute plantation regulations we look in vain for even the mention of any of those improvements, the hope of which reconciles many to the grave dangers of emancipation. There is not a word said about legalising the marriage of the negroes, or establishing schools for their instruction. "Human chattels" they still remain, though they are no longer called slaves, and the only problem which the "military superintendent" has to solve is to produce the largest possible amount of cotton or sugar at the smallest possible expense. We have all that was bad in the old system with none that was good. We have simply exchanged the family for the workhouse.

But, it will be said, the negro works for wages. Here again we shall find that the boon proffered by the North is a Sodom's apple, which turns to ashes when raised to the lips. In Tennessee, under General Phelps's management, the wages of the men are $8 per month, and of the women $5. Out of this the labourers must support themselves. In Louisiana, it is only "$1 per month for women and boys; $2 for field hands, and $3 for mechanics;" but then each family is allowed half an acre for a garden, which, as each labourer is compelled to "go to work at daylight and work until dark" they can have little spare time for cultivating. The plantation slave has almost always a patch of ground, and poor indeed must he be and hard his master, if his "crop," or the eggs and poultry of which the master's family is most generally the liberal purchaser, does not produce him more than the Yankee offers him for his labour from "daylight until dark." But it is not necessary to enter into an elaborate calculation to prove that this wage in money is not equal to the wage which, as a slave, he received in kind. The $8 in Tennessee do not more than suffice to buy his food and clothing, supposing, from the absence of anything being said, the tenement to be free; and in Louisiana, where rations are furnished, the $2 do not more than suffice for the clothing, the tobacco, and the other small luxuries which he enjoyed as a slave. Yet this miserable pittance is still further reduced by a scale of fines for petty offences, which seem devised for the purpose of eating up the wage. "Each hand will be responsible for loss and damage to stock, tools, or other property." "Lost time will be deducted. Lazy work will cause a deduction of wages." Getting out or turning in a few minutes after the tap of the bell, is punishable with a fine of one-twentieth of a man's monthly wage; striking a mule over the head with one-fourth. But, independently of all these drawbacks, supposing the negro to get the full amount, of whom, in a country so sparsely peopled, shall he buy his pennyworth of this and his shilling's worth of that? Evidently, from the necessities of the case, a shop must be opened on each estate. We are not left to surmise at the working of this plan. It has failed in the mining districts of this country, where the labourers were white men. It is now in full operation on the haciendas of Mexico, where the peon, or Indian serf, belongs to a race which in bygone times had reached the highest indigenous civilization on the American continent. The peon is sober, industrious, and docile, but from one end of the year to the other he never sees the face of a coin. The hacienda shop supplies, indeed, his most immediate wants, but his wage is ever necessarily and hopelessly absorbed and consumed in advance. So it would be with the negro, in an aggravated degree, if it were possible to conceive anything more utterly miserable than the condition of the peon. He would receive his wages as before when he was a slave, in kind, only more scantily and stintedly. Only nominally a freeman, without any of the privileges or the hopes of that condition, he would have all its anxieties and the heartburns. His children would become a burden. Disease, physical infirmity, old age, would visit him with all the terrors of despair. He would not, indeed, be sold by auction, but the amount of "black labour" that in him is would be transferred for a consideration from one estate to another, and from one purchaser to another, as caprice or convenience might dictate. Without in the slightest degree having acquired the control of his person, he would have lost the protection of the master in whose household he was born, to be the slave of every brutal white man, who might choose to kick, to buffet, to wrong, or to insult him.

Such is, fairly sketched, the emancipation which the North holds out to the world as the virtuous object of all its outlays of blood and treasure, and which it would persuade us is cheaply bought at the cost of the extermination of a whole people of our own race. Only an arrant hypocrite can recognise in the sketch aught else but slavery without the offensive name. This is the millenium of freedom promised to credulous Europe when the greedy, canting worshippers of the Almighty Dollar shall have overrun the fair lands of the South, divided the spoils, colonised the country, and when New England shoemakers and New York bar-keepers shall make the laws of Virginia and South Carolina. One advantage the change of name of the negroes would indeed have. It would open to Yankee cupidity the inexhaustible slave-market of Africa, wherewith to supply ad infinitum the waste of negro life which the new colonist is coining into money. Why not? If Europe is content to accept slavery under a new name, why not the slave-trade? But if some doubts should arise and make themselves heard with undue loudness, would not the universal Yankee nation then have cotton as well as cannon wherewith to silence such insolent objections?

In all truth and soberness, the negro's only hope on the new continent lies in the success of the South. Were we to judge only by the attested character of each of the two nations which are now warring, one for independence, the other for empire, we should not hesitate to which rather to intrust the destinies of four millions of helpless dependants. We should see in the Southerner's respect for law, in his love of truth, his patience under misfortune, his moderation in prosperity, his enduring valour, his unwavering resistance to the temptation of retaliating the inhumanity of a barbarous foe, so many guarantees for the improvement of the negro's condition, which the most partial eye must fail to discover in either the language or the acts of the North. Hitherto the South has had little time for self-contemplation. In the Union, these thirty years past, it has maintained a desperate struggle for political equality. Out of the Union it is still struggling for national life. In both of these struggles, its adversary has selected slavery as the point of attack, because by so doing he was sure of enlisting the world's sympathies on his side. It was not the faults or abuses of the existing relation between the black and the white man that was assailed, but the relation itself. Men do not experiment upon new inventions of arms in the heat of battle; they do not alter the internal arrangement of a house whilst it is assailed by burglars from without. Similarly, legislators do not attempt experiments upon a social system at the time when that system itself requires every energy in its external defence. The South, therefore, absorbed in defending existence, and stung to fury by the persistent calumnies of its malignant defamers, has legislated but little on the subject of slavery, content to leave public opinion and the moral sense of a Christian community to supply the theoretical deficiencies the law had left. While the contest lasts it is idle to expect from the South any changes in its social fabric. When the vital object is secured, and it takes its place among the nations of the earth, it will doubtless treat its social problem as other nations have treated theirs, yielding to the same heaven-implanted aspiration at self-development and improvement which is the law of every civilized human society, and bringing to bear upon the subject the same wisdom, the same desire to consult and obey God's commands, which animates other Christian nations. Why should not the South be trusted to deal as justly and as humanely with its slaves, as other nations with their serfs, their poor, their criminals, or any other class needing protection or restraint?

The Progress of the War.

THAT veneration for State rights, that loyalty to State authority which has at all times in American history clashed with the allegiance claimed by the Federal power, is at once the strength and weakness of the Southern Confederacy. Nothing has more strengthened the sense of injury, or more confirmed the resolve of resistance amongst Southerners, than the lawless violation of State rights by Mr. Lincoln's Government. And even in the North the time seems rapidly approaching when the total disregard by the Washington Cabinet of the feelings and rights of individual States will become intolerable and provoke a collision. But on the other hand, this limitation of the sentiment of nationality as it were to the frontiers of the State has its disadvantages, and the South is now experiencing them. There can be no doubt that up to the commencement of this terrible struggle, attachment to the State was the first duty and the first inclination of every Southern citizen; and it is surprising to notice how soon in the face of a common danger, and in support of a community of interest, it has been supplanted by a patriotic devotion to the Confederacy. But it would be unnatural to expect that the old feeling should altogether die out, and that a couple of years should bring about a unity of sentiment and object, such as one finds in adjoining English counties or French departments. There are regiments from every Confederate State in Lee's army of Virginia. The victories, the hardships, the traditions of three or four campaigns, have welded them into a homogeneous body, with probably as few dividing interests as any army in the world. But it is different where armies have been raised for local purposes, and where the defence of a district or a State has been mainly confided to its inhabitants. The Tennessean will fight bravely for his own soil. There, where his ancestors have died and are buried, where his children have been reared, where are all his associations of the past and all his hopes of the future, he will struggle on to the last. But when foot by foot the Confederate army is forced back by overwhelming numbers, and something like a settled occupation of his chief cities by the Federal army takes place, it is difficult to convince him that his first duty is to defend the frontiers of the neighbouring State, and that his allegiance is, as it were, transferred. He has not the same interest, nor the same feeling to inspire him. His heart is still in his old home. Is it wonderful that he will brave all sorts of dangers to remain within the confines of his own State, and take his chance of there striking a blow at the invader, as bushwhacker or guerilla? No doubt he is wrong. His first duty is to the Confederate Government. His services in irregular fighting are comparatively worthless. But we can respect his motives while we blame his action. It is in no craven fear, no spirit of submission that he has quitted the Confederate ranks and preferred to throw in his lot with his beloved Tennessee. But the period has arrived when a common emergency forbids the indulgence of a mere sentiment, and when every citizen must be made to feel his responsibilities to the central Government. The strong appeal of President Davis will, we doubt not, bring back some thousands of veteran soldiers to the Confederate ranks. It was, of course, impossible that in an army so hastily levied and organized as that of the South, there should have been throughout the discipline incidental to the regular troops of the standing armies of Europe. The volunteer principle, still to some extent prevalent in its formation, is necessarily liable to produce an assertion of individual will, more or less fatal to perfect subordination. In most of the great engagements in the South-West, at the battle of Shiloh particularly, this inherent defect of the volunteer system has been conspicuous; and we cannot be far wrong in tracing to it some of the results against which President Davis's recent proclamation is framed. We have no fear but that his spirited appeal will be worthily met, and that for the time everything will be forgotten in the one resolve to beat back the armies of the invader.

In the meantime, it is evident that the resources of the North are fast drying up. Apart from the mere wear and tear of the armies in the field, the losses of the Federals in their several campaigns of this year are almost unprecedented. Take the army of the enemy in Virginia alone; Burnside's, Hooker's, Milroy's, and Meade's losses cannot be computed at less than 100,000 men; and to these must be added the withdrawal of the two years' service men. General Grant's operations against Vicksburg, and Banks's movements in Louisiana, have cost at least another 70,000 men killed in battle and dead by wounds and disease. How are these men to be replaced but by the draft? and if that is to be carried out only at the cost of civil war in the North, whence are the Northern armies to spring who in 1864 will overrun Virginia and South Carolina, and Georgia and Alabama and Texas, conquer, and hold them? We learn from Northern sources to what sort of stuff the recruiting officer is already reduced. In Massachusetts it is estimated that only one out of five of the drafted men is fit for service, and that a fresh draft will be necessary. In Ohio and Iowa armed resistance is organized to the draft. Wherever the military officer presents himself, it is at the head of an imposing military force, and at New York the conscription is enforced by cannon sweeping every principal thoroughfare. Yet with all this lack of chair-à-canon, the North needs at this present moment armies as strong as ever, if not stronger. It has greater distances to traverse, greater resistance to overcome, greater battles to fight. The present necessities of the Lincoln Cabinet show how powerless it is to meet adequately the present strain upon its resources. What will be its position, when another and another draft shall have proclaimed the absurd extravagance of its pretensions, and the utter futility of its hope of re-conquest?

Even the latest news is not without its further proof of the terrible cost at which alone the North is able to hold the ground it has occupied and to undertake fresh offensive operations. It is nearly two months since General Banks left Western Louisiana in the possession of Federal troops. Large garrisons held the principal towns, and its plantations were worked by negroes under Federal supervision. With the withdrawal of Banks's army to the left bank of the Mississippi, the Confederates swept down upon the isolated garrisons, captured some 3,000 or 4,000 troops, some millions' worth of stores, and a valuable artillery, retiring in safety as Banks, with his wearied army, advanced to recover the territory he had won by so much hard fighting. It is reported, too, that the Confederates under General Taylor have turned to bay, that an engagement has taken place, and that Banks has been defeated with the loss of 6,000 prisoners. If this report be confirmed, it is of the utmost importance. For it will tend to paralyse the operations of the Federals in the districts of the Lower Mississippi for some time to come. The Confederates under Taylor, Magruder, and Kirby Smith can hardly be less than 40,000 men. They may have collected their corps, given battle to Banks, and defeated him. If this be the case, Banks must be at once reinforced, and it is only Grant who can aid him. But Grant's army has enough to do already. It has to garrison Vicksburg and the banks of the Mississippi, to threaten Mobile, to reinforce Gilmore at Charleston, and to lend 15,000 men to Meade. It has, besides, been weakened by some 15,000 two years' service-men, who went north after the fall of Vicksburg. There is evidently plenty of work cut out for the Federal armies in the south-west. At Charleston, General Gilmore's first plan has proved a failure. Fort Wagner still holds out; and the Federal General, tired of fighting at close quarters and engaging earthworks, is about to try a game of long ranges and fight an artillery duel with Fort Sumter at the distance of a mile. The siege of Charleston promises at this rate to be a very tedious and costly process. If the same sort of thing is to go on for the next three months at Mobile and Savannah, Mr. Lincoln is wise in enforcing the draft at any hazard, for he will want every man he can lay hold of. In Virginia the two armies have fallen back into very nearly their old positions on the Rappahannock, and Lee is once more on the defensive, in a country whose natural strength will at least counterbalance Meade's numerical superiority. A cavalry action has taken place in which the Federals were very roughly handled. Beyond that all is reported quiet. Both armies require rest. The Federal army is certainly in no condition to make a general attack with any hope of success. The probability is that there will be a period of inaction, during which both sides will be busily occupied in refilling their ranks. But Lee has carried away from Pennsylvania stores and subsistence for his army for the next six months, and he can very well afford to wait. Whether the impatient clamour of the Northern press will not force General Meade into precipitate action, and insist on a repetition of the fight of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, we have yet to see.

Negro Soldiers.

MR. LINCOLN'S Proclamation of so-called retaliation opens a new chapter of horrors in the sickening tragedy of the American war. Henceforth even the pretence of carrying on a civilized warfare is to be laid aside. Prisoners of war are to be treated as felons and held to hard labour until impossible conditions are complied with. The gallows is to complete the work of butchery which the battle-field has left unfinished. There is no doubt that the vulgar despot who disgraces the chair of Washington will execute the threat to the full. A commander-in-chief whose approved lieutenants are such men as Butler, McNeill, and Milroy, is not likely to be deterred from any course by the ordinary considerations of humanity or justice. Nor is it an unaccustomed path which the Federal Government is about to tread. The murder of Mumford, of the ten prisoners at Palmyra, and of unarmed citizens elsewhere, at their own thresholds and in presence of their families, have already quite familiarized the Northerners with killing in cold blood those whom the chance of war has thrown into their merciless hands. The incarceration of the gallant General Morgan and his staff in convicts' cells—a repetition of the treatment of captured privateersmen at an earlier period of the war—had already shown the world what Federal America was meditating to do whenever it thought itself strong enough to ensure impunity. The Proclamation of the 30th July contains, therefore, nothing absolutely new; it only systematizes on a larger scale the atrocities which have glutted the fiendish thirst for revenge from the first.

If there is anything more revolting than the barbarity of this proclamation, it is its hypocrisy. "It is the duty," so it runs, "of every Government to give protection to its citizens, of whatever class, colour, or condition, and especially to those who are duly organized as soldiers in the public service." Now, examining the question solely from a Northern point of view, there is not a single State in Federal America where the negro is held in law to be a citizen. In some States, among them the President's own State of Illinois, he is not even allowed the right of residence, which is refused to none other, of whatever race, colour, or country. In the metropolitan city of New York, after being hunted like a wild beast, beaten to death, hanged, drowned, or burned, he has just been again excluded from the use of the public conveyances. The Federal Constitution does not protect him against the cruel injustice of the several States, for that Constitution, as construed by the highest tribunal in the land, does not recognise him as a citizen. Mr. Lincoln cannot legally give him even a passport to travel abroad; he cannot obtain for him the permission to sojourn a single day in Illinois; he cannot in any part of the North make him socially, or in the eyes of the law, the equal of the white man; but he affects to consider him more than the equal of the Confederate soldier, his former master, and to protect him in that equality. Not only is every slave impressed in the Federal ranks to be deemed a full equivalent in exchange for a Confederate prisoner, but in every case where that exchange is refused a Confederate prisoner is to suffer the doom of a convicted felon. The most implicit believer in Abolition fictions would scarcely venture to aver this to be retaliation, and to compare the lot of a negro slave, under the harshest of masters, with hard labour in a penitentiary or a chain gang.

But let us, for the sake of argument, in the face of the United States' Constitution, in the face of the decisions of Federal and State tribunals, in the face of the municipal legislation of the several Northern States themselves, admit that the slave emancipated by Mr. Lincoln's "military measure" is a citizen. Assuredly, as such, his allegiance would be due to the belligerent State against which he has been induced to take up arms. Even the obtuse intellect of Mr. Lincoln foresaw this difficulty, and long since prepared to meet it. With habitual disregard of the plainest provisions of the Constitution which he was sworn to uphold, and which provides that all regulations for the government of the army should be submitted to and approved by Congress, he employed, through his Secretary of War, a Dr. Lieber, a German professor, to frame certain supplementary rules and regulations, which by the ipse dixit of Mr. Stanton now supersede the law. Foremost in this newly invented code of war is the monstrous declaration, that "the uniform protects the soldier, of whatever class, colour, condition, or former political relations." The more rational of the Northern papers at once raised the voice of warning, and foretold the evils that must inevitably flow from such an unprecedented interpolation into the accepted laws of warfare. They reminded the Northern public that in the war with Mexico General Scott hanged fifty men in a batch, fighting in the Mexican uniform, because they had deserted from his army. The uniform then did not protect them against "their former political relations," and no sane man could contend that it should. Both Federals and Confederates have shot deserters in the enemy's uniform—the former vastly more often than the latter—during the present war. In those cases, the uniform was regarded as an aggravation of the offence. There was good sense enough left in New York to ask publicly the question: "If a British invading army, in 1812, had landed in South Carolina, and had uniformed and disciplined the slaves, does any man imagine that this (the United States') Government would have considered the act within the limits of Christian warfare, or would have listened to the assertion of a right on the part of England to dictate our course as regarded them?" In the war with the colonies a partial attempt at arming the slaves was indeed made, but it was denounced with equal indignation in both countries, and the British Government recognised its error by making restitution and compensation at the conclusion of peace. As early as June last, the New York World thus clearly placed the subject before the public:—

Slaves must be regarded either as property or persons. As property, they are as sacred as other property; as persons, they are non-combatants. There is no middle-ground. But our authorities conscript them. Grant that the right to do so is perfect; what are the rights of the other belligerent? It must be remembered that the United States and "the so-called Confederate States" are belligerents, and that the laws of war govern their present relations. It is treason here, punishable with death, for a man to give aid or comfort to the enemy. Can it be less treason for a man there to give aid and comfort to their enemies? Can we maintain our position before the civilized world on this question? If Napoleon had employed Russian serfs as his soldiers, could he have claimed immunity for them, from the laws of Russia, if they had been taken prisoners? We suspect not. The public mind had better examine this subject carefully, and reflect wisely before coming to a conclusion, for the freeing of slaves, and enrolling them as our soldiers, must inevitably, at a very early date, bring about a character of warfare unknown since the Wars of the Roses. The Confederate States could just as easily give up the claim of right to independence as the right of punishing alleged subjects for treason. The men who lead there, and the men who are led, unite cordially on this point. A scene of blood will soon be opened, and Europe will interfere forcibly, in the name of humanity. The side in fault will be constrained. Let us be sure to be right on this point, and, in order to be right, let us discuss it. The policy seems to have been adopted without examination, and by the military chiefs, in separate departments, and is to be examined under two aspects—our right, and the right of the other belligerent. It may be that we have no right to free the slave, or, if we have that right, no other. If we have a right to make a soldier of him, what are the rights of the enemy as against that soldier? We have a right to make a soldier of a deserter; the enemy has the counter right to hang him. Is this theory applicable to enlisted slaves? We own to a hope that the laws of civilized war prohibit the employment of the slaves of the other belligerent as our soldiers, for we can conceive of no measure so likely to prolong the war, to make the alienation permanent and the hate bitter, and, we regret to add, none which would so fully justify continued struggle, complete alienation, and life-long hate.

With even greater force spoke the unanimous English press, excepting, of course, the few organs of the Federal Government. The Morning Post, of the 22nd of June, observed truly:—

We doubt much whether quondam slaves would be entitled to demand the treatment of prisoners of war. Strictly, they might be considered bound by virtue of their servile status to espouse their masters' cause, and liable to be treated as deserters for aiding the opponents of those to whom they owe obedience. The North has not concealed its desire to excite a servile insurrection in the South, and the latter would be justified in taking any steps to prevent the consummation of so terrible a crime. To accord to a revolted slave the privileges of a prisoner of war would be pro tanto to weaken the inducements he has to remain loyal, as well as to diminish the penalties incident to ill-success. Humanity and strict law in this matter point in different directions, and we make these remarks in order to prevent any misapprehension being entertained in respect to the relative positions of the Confederates and such of the negro population as the Federals can induce to revolt. During a civil war which has now lasted more than two years, not one charge of inhumanity has been brought against any of the Southern generals. The same, unfortunately, cannot be said of those of the North. If, therefore, in their contests with negro troops it should turn out that the Confederates have acted with unusual ferocity or severity, the peculiarly trying position in which they are placed should not be lost sight of.

The civilized world will soon have to judge in this matter. It has quietly permitted the Federals to make a maritime law of their own to the prejudice of the Confederates; it will, perhaps, if Earl Russell is left to "construe the obligations of neutrality liberally in favour" of the stronger party, permit them a similar latitude in their warfare on land. But the Government which shall do this, and tacitly connive at such scenes as the North is now inaugurating, will have confessed that our boasted progress is but a hollow mockery, and share the infamy that must for ever cling to Federal America as the perpetrator of the most stupendous crime in modern history. Let no false issue becloud the position which the South holds in this sad emergency. The Confederate States are recognised by the principal Governments of Europe as a belligerent power. As such it has the right, and it is its duty to punish treason on the part of its citizens and subjects. The slave, by laws which antedate the formation of the Confederacy, and which are expressly sanctioned and supported by the Constitution in whose name the North professes to fight, is doubly a subject, to his master individually, and to the State at large. In the Federal uniform he is a criminal against both. It is absurd to suppose that the Confederate authorities can regard him in that case as a prisoner of war. For only one-half of his double offence—that committed against the State—the punishment awarded in the case of a white man would be death. It is the more humane policy of the Confederate Government to consider him as irresponsible for his acts, as the unwilling or unconscious tool of those who employ him, and therefore to restore him on capture to his former condition without punishment. It is different with white men who officer these slaves. They cannot be deemed irresponsible for their deliberate acts, nor ignorant of the law which on more than one occasion has been enforced with the aid of the very Government which they serve—the law which in every slaveholding State of the late American Union dooms the white man who shall head rebellious slaves to an ignominious death. That law is written on the Statute-books of Maryland, Missouri, and Kentucky, States more or less in the possession of the Federal Government, and would unquestionably be enforced in each of them to-day. It is neither more severe nor more lenient in the Statute-books of Alabama and Virginia, and the other States of the new federation. White commanders of slaves organized to commit hostilities within the limits of any of these States will be regularly indicted before the competent tribunals for violation of this law, fairly tried, and if found guilty will not be entitled to the same leniency as their misguided victims. The South makes no new laws and resorts to no extraordinary measures; but it cannot be expected to stay the execution of the laws it has already, because an enemy deliberately organizes for their systematic violation on an unprecedented scale. Those who planned this diabolical scheme knew full well that the South had no alternative, but they counted upon the world's antipathy to slavery for escaping too strict an investigation of the facts, and for throwing the odium upon the object of their hatred. Up to this moment the South has erred on the side of mercy; it has not in a single instance taken a life in retaliation, in cold blood; it has even sought pretences for staying the hand of justice when already uplifted; it had just instructed the second-highest officer of its Government to make another endeavour to conduct the war according to civilized usages, and been repulsed with indignity. The execution of this last threat makes retaliation a necessity. With that characteristic incapacity for appreciating a noble or generous motive, the North has mistaken humane hesitation for cowardice, and has thus been tempted to this fatal step. Upon its head, then, be the blood of unarmed men which will now begin to flow as fast as heretofore on the battle-field.

MOBILE.—It has been officially announced that the following gentlemen constitute the Committee of Safety for the City of Mobile:—Messrs. Wm. D. Dunn, Dr. J. C. Nott, H. S. Smith, sen., D. W. ## THE BIOGRAPHY OF A CHRISTIAN SOLDIER.*

ALTHOUGH the circumstances are altogether different, this life of a Southern soldier from the pen of a Southern clergyman recalls to mind at every page the biographies of Henry Havelock and Hedley Vicars. As we read this affectionate tribute to the memory of a brave patriot and a devoted servant of the Cross, we feel that, besides a common descent, a common language, and a common literature, we are bound by still closer ties to the people of the Confederate States. The Southerners are not only our kinsmen, but they are actuated by a like spirit, and a change of climate has not wrought a change of character. We notice this particularly in their deep-rooted, unaffected, practical piety. The men glibly consigned to everlasting perdition by Mr. Newman Hall and the political faction he worthily represents, are intent upon doing their Master's work with all their strength and at any sacrifice. The veil that concealed them from the rest of the world is now rent, and henceforth no matter how New England slanders and curses, the Christian zeal of the South will be praised in all the Churches.

The subject of this memoir, Dabney Carr Harrison, was born in Virginia in 1830. His parents, the Rev. Peyton Harrison and Jane Cary Carr, were nearly allied to the cause of freedom, being the immediate descendants of two signers of the Declaration of American Independence, and one of them was the author of that celebrated instrument. When their sons in 1861 took up arms they did so because the South was invested "with the great privilege of defending the principles of 1776." Dabney had several brothers, and with them received a liberal education. He was under private tuition until fifteen years of age, when he entered at Princeton College. From that institution he went to the University of Virginia, and there qualified himself for the bar. He then settled at Martinsburg and commenced practice. It is worthy of notice that the Rev. Peyton Harrison had been anxious that one or more of his sons should become ministers of the Gospel; but with admirable good sense and a proper appreciation of his Christian duty, he left them free to elect their own careers. Great would be the gain to the Church of England if parents in this country would pursue the same wise and righteous course.

The highest hopes were entertained of the young lawyer's advancement. Dr. Hoge tells us, "He was well fitted for his profession both by nature and education. His memory was quick, tenacious, and prompt; so that his acquisitions were rapidly made, firmly held, and always at command. His understanding was comprehensive and solid; while his imagination, without being vivid, was graceful and chaste. His perception was keen, his judgment cool, his language clear. He had singular facility in explanation. No one could impart information more pleasantly. He charmed you on towards knowing what he knew, without once making you blush because you did not know it before. His historical and political knowledge was copious and accurate. Having an intrepid intellect he was fond of discussion. Incapable of artifice himself, he was yet not easily entrapped by an opponent." To one so endowed the highest judicial prizes were attainable, and in the United States even more than in England forensic ability was the stepping-stone to political eminence. But Dabney determined to give himself up to the work of the ministry, and to follow the example of his father, who had been a lawyer before he was a clergyman. It was not that the young man lacked ambition, or that he deemed it inconsistent with a religious profession to seek for reputation and influential position. Nor must it be supposed that he acted upon a sudden impulse. From his youth upwards he had been noted for his piety, and in becoming a clergyman he only sought a larger sphere of Christian usefulness. He did not immediately enter upon the ministerial office, but again was a student, first under the guidance of his father and then at Union Seminary. At the end of his first year's residence the Principal of the Seminary died, and from his devotion to Oriental literature and his excellent knowledge of Hebrew Mr. Harrison was chosen to partially supply the vacant place. For two years he continued in this employment, at the same time preaching at the College Church of Hampden, Sydney, and afterwards at the First Presbyterian Church in Lynchburg. He was next chosen for the regular term of two years as chaplain to the University of Virginia, and that six hundred students should be confided to the pastoral care of a young man at the age of twenty-seven is a signal proof of the estimation in which his ability and zeal were held. The Rev. D. McGuffey, Professor of Moral Philosophy, has borne eloquent testimony to his merits as a preacher. He says,—"It was my privilege to hear the Rev. D. C. Harrison preach almost every Sabbath during two Sessions of the University of Virginia, of nine months each, and I can truly say that I never heard him deliver an indifferent, nor even an ordinary sermon in all that time. . . . In short, I have heard few men whose preaching approached so near to scriptural models, and never have I known any man of higher qualifications for the successful and acceptable discharge of the specific duties of a pastor." As to his personal character and influence another Professor testifies,—"I knew him intimately. Our conversation was as unguarded as brothers; and every sentiment I ever heard him utter was worthy of a gentleman and a Christian. I never knew him to neglect a duty, or to postpone one. He was always faithful to his country, and faithful to his God."

Upon leaving the University, he accepted the pastorate of the Bethlehem Church in Hanover. The main inducement to undertake this charge was the opportunity it afforded of ministering to the negroes. The absorbing interest he felt in the welfare of the coloured race is usual with the Southern clergy, and hence it is, under God's blessing, that so many of the negroes in the Confederate States have become members of the Church of Christ. Dr. Hoge gives expression to this sentiment of sympathy with the negro in the following passage:—

Who that has ever preached to them, especially when gathered in large crowds, has not found his work full of gladness? Their beaming delight in listening to the Gospel warmly presented; their devotion to the person and name of Jesus; their perpetual pleasure in the recital of His miracles, love, sufferings, and gracious offices; the almost electric response from the whole congregation when their fancy is pleased, or some deeper chord in their experience is struck; the fervour, simplicity, and originality of their prayers, often charming the ear by their touching cadences, and melting the heart by their affectionate pathos; the wild modulations and glorious choral swell of their songs; their hearty greetings of him who has warmed them afresh with the love of Christ, as he comes down from the pulpit and offers his hand—it would be a cold nature, indeed, which, amidst such scenes, would not glow with new life, and love, and joy in the Gospel of our Lord!

Mr. Harrison had special services for the negroes. One entire Sabbath each month and half of the others were exclusively theirs, "but they could freely participate in the morning services also, more especially designed for their masters." In the South the negro is not treated as a leper or kept from the house of prayer on account of his colour.

These peaceful labours were soon to be interrupted. The North was bent upon crushing the independence of the South, and the Abolitionists, in furtherance of their scheme, were ready to stir up a servile war, and to change the Christian negro into a savage. At the commencement of hostilities Mr. Harrison was sorely afflicted:—

On the 18th of July, in the battle of Bull Run, he saw the heart's blood of his gentle cousin, Major Carter H. Harrison, drawn by Northern bullets on Virginia soil, and heard the cry of a broken-hearted young widow and her orphaned babes go up to God. In three days more, at Manassas, he saw his native soil wet again by the blood of the only nephews of his mother, the only sons of their mother, Holmes and Tucker Conrad, and by the blood of his own pure and beautiful brother, Lieutenant Peyton Randolph Harrison. These four young men were all faithful servants of God. Their lives were lovely and useful. In His fear they fought. They were sustained by His grace when they fell. The Conrads were shot at the same moment, and falling side by side, lay, as in the sleep of childhood, almost in each other's arms. The younger of them was a student of theology, and was nearly ready with glowing heart to enter on the higher service of his Lord, in the ministry of the Gospel.

He felt these bereavements keenly, and writes to a friend, "My tears lie almost as shallow now as when I was a child." He resolved to take his brother's place. Was he not to aid his country in her hour of trial? Was he not bound to offer up his life for the sake of liberty, order, and civilization? Was he to look on while the battle was being fought for the safety and honour of his countrywomen, for the inviolability of Southern homes, and for saving the negroes whom he tenderly loved from utter ruin? He did not hesitate, but raised a company and entered the military service. A few extracts from a letter written by the Rev. M. D. Hoge, D.D., the brother of our author, and chaplain to the Camp of Instruction near Richmond, will show that in becoming a soldier he did not cease to labour as a minister of the Gospel. Dr. M. D. Hoge writes:—

In addition to daily visits to the sick in the hospital, I had three appointments each week for preaching in the camp; and whenever I was prevented by any cause from meeting these engagements, he was always ready to take my place; and I had the most abundant evidence of the efficiency of his labours, and of the gratitude of the men for his efforts to promote their temporal and spiritual welfare.

His gentleness and sympathy, his facility in adapting his instructions to the characters and capacities of the sick, and the unction that gave such a charm to his prayers, always rendered him a welcome visitor to the hospital, and made him the instrument both of profit and consolation.

During the summer several thousand troops were sometimes stationed at once in our camp, and Captain Harrison was, of course, brought into contact with a large number of officers. Over these he exercised the most happy influence.

While no man was more inflexible in his adherence to his convictions of duty, or more prompt to rebuke whatever he believed to be wrong in principle or in conduct, yet his manner was so conciliating; such was the candour and kindness of his disposition; such his scrupulous respect for the rights, and regard for the feeling for others, that he rarely gave offence, even when he attempted to repress what he deemed culpable. The very presence of one so frank and fearless in his bearing, so delicate and refined in his tastes, so pure and elevated in his principles, was ordinarily sufficient to check any exhibitions of profanity or vulgarity. And, withal, he was so genial in his nature, so entertaining in his conversation, and obliging in his disposition, that his presence was never regarded as imposing an irksome restraint, even in a company of the irreligious.

One of the most interesting incidents connected with Captain Harrison's sojourn in our camp, was his success in forming a "Young Men's Christian Association," in the regiment to which his company was attached. The organization was as complete and thorough as that of any similar association in town or city. It had the usual number of officers and committees for conducting prayer-meetings, distributing religious publications, and providing teachers for the Sabbath school and Bible classes. No one, unfamiliar with camp life, can fully appreciate the value of such an association in counteracting the demoralization so common among men exposed to such temptations as soldiers are, and deprived too, of those domestic, social, and religious influences, which, like guardian angels, hovered around them in their own homes. A chaplain, whether at a post or in a regiment, can have no ally comparable to a well-organized and efficiently-managed Christian Association among the men to whom he ministers. It is not only an instrument of incalculable good to the irreligious, but one of the best means of keeping alive the spirituality, and of developing the Christian graces of the pious officers and men who become enlisted in its work as active members.

— "how awful goodness is!" —

it was Dabney Harrison's happy province to show how amiable and attractive it may appear, when thus illustrated in the life of a Christian gentleman and soldier. While he remained in our camp, he moved about as one whose superiority was tacitly acknowledged without exciting ill-will or envy; and when he left us, he was regretted as one whose place was not to be filled again. Since the commencement of this war, my position has brought me in contact with many of the officers in our army, but I have known few equal, and none superior, to my lamented friend, in the possession of those gifts and graces which impart true nobility to the man, and attractive loveliness to the Christian.

To those who desire to learn how heroic he was in battle, how indefatigable in the discharge of his military duties, how cheerful under privations, how greatly he was beloved by his men, with what intense solicitude he sought to prepare them for death and eternity, and how it pleased God to abundantly bless his labours, we commend Dr. Hoge's touching narrative, and we will conclude this notice of an excellent but too brief biography by a few words about the death of the Christian soldier.

On the 10th February, 1862, Captain Harrison wrote a long letter from the camp before Fort Donelson, which he thus closes:—

Oh, how all these adventures, with their perils and deliverances, their privations and blessings, do drive us to our God! I want no other strength than the Lord Jehovah; no other Redeemer than our blessed Saviour; no other Comforter than His Holy Spirit. I believe that when we do our duty, the Lord will fight for us. I feel a constant, bright, and cheery trust in Him. I think of my precious wife and little ones, and long for their society and caresses, but I am satisfied that it is right that I should be here, and I await the development of His will. * * * I think His mercy in making us His children in spite of all our ill-desert, ought to make us willing meekly to bear all that He chooses to lay upon us.

This letter was accompanied by two playful notes to be read to his little daughter and son. From the 10th to the 15th he was engaged in skirmishes with the enemy, and on the last-named day he was mortally wounded in the midst of a hard-fought battle:—

With reverence (says our author) I have taken in my hand the hat he wore in the battle; with tears and a swelling heart I have gazed on it. It is pierced by four balls. Three whistled through and did him no harm. The fourth, partly spent, marred that beautiful brow. But this was as nothing. He calmly fought on. A more deadly aim drove a ball through his right lung. Just when, cannot be told. His face was to the foe, and his step onward, even when, from loss of blood and exhaustion, he sank upon the frozen earth.

There, with his head resting on a log, he lay unattended for an hour and a half, suffering from his wounds, but more from the chill air and his bed of snow. When at length his men were ordered to cease their fire, they hastened to his side. They found him almost numb with the cold. Yet he met them pleasantly, and told them not to mind him; that he must die whatever was done, and that he would rather they would take care of themselves. "We could not have left him then," said one of his faithful men with a burst of honest enthusiasm, "if all the regiments of the enemy had been after us!" They made a litter, and six of them bore him to Dover, a little village hard by the battle field.

On Sunday, the 16th, he wrote as follows in a manuscript book:—

"February 16, 1862.—Sunday.

"I die content and happy; trusting in the merits of my Saviour Jesus; committing my wife and children to their Father and mine.

"DABNEY CARR HARRISON."

After this he slept for a few minutes. "Starting out of his sleep, he sat once more erect, and exclaimed, 'Company K, you have no captain now; but never give up! never surrender,' and then he died in the arms of his attendant." How precious in all time to come will be the Independence bought with the blood of such men as Dabney Carr Harrison, and happily he was but one of a multitude of Christian soldiers in the armies of the Confederate States.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

RICHMOND, July 18.

THE army of General Lee has been withdrawn to the Virginia side of the Potomac, and is now massed at Martinsburg. We are, of course, utterly ignorant of the reasons which directed this movement, but we know that it was most successfully accomplished. The Northern papers complain that Meade did not intercept our retreat, and admit that Lee has out-generalled all his adversaries. Fifteen hundred of the rear-guard of his army were reported cut off and made prisoners at Williamsport, but the main body made the recrossing in perfect safety, bringing over all their wagon trains and large supplies of food, clothing, and ammunition. During the three weeks that our troops were beyond the Potomac, immense quantities of grain and meat, besides stock, beehives, horses and mules, were brought over from Maryland and Pennsylvania, and the question of feeding the troops during the residue of the summer campaign has been relieved of much of its embarrassment. It is not to be denied that the second attempt at the invasion of the enemy's country has proved a failure, and that the recollection of it will be embittered by the fearful loss of life we sustained in the three days' battle at Gettysburg. Our total loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners will probably fall little short of 20,000, and among the killed we have to mourn many of the best and bravest in the land. General Pettigrew, of South Carolina, the gallant soldier, the skilful officer, the cultivated scholar, the noble gentleman, has died of the wounds he received in the fight. On the other hand, the enemy has received a staggering blow, from which it will not soon recover. If the Gettysburg battles are to be set down as a Federal victory, they constitute one of those victories of Pyrrhus, from which Lincoln may devoutly pray to be relieved in future. Two or three more such will utterly destroy his "Army of the Potomac."

The transmission by telegraph of any information relative to the movements of our troops on the Potomac having been expressly interdicted by the authorities, and the postal communication with the army being very slow and uncertain, we are wholly without the means of knowing the chances of the war in that region, but it is thought that many days cannot elapse before another engagement will be fought, as there seems no doubt that Meade has also crossed the river, and seeks an opportunity of repairing the grave error he committed in allowing his antagonist to escape. A despatch was received this morning announcing that a cavalry and artillery fight in heavy force took place yesterday at Shephardstown, between the Federals under General Pleasanton and the Confederates under General Fitzhugh Lee, in which the latter, though greatly outnumbered, succeeded after a protracted and bloody conflict in driving the enemy back in the direction of Harper's Ferry. The news of this fight will probably reach you through the New York papers in the shape of a pan over another glorious triumph of the invincible Union army.

Our advices from Jackson are up to the 16th instant. The fall of Vicksburg on the 4th having been followed by the surrender of Port Hudson on the 9th, the enemy are pushing their successes in that quarter with uncommon energy, in the hope of completing their operations by the entire discomfiture of General Johnston. Immense reinforcements have been sent to General Grant, consisting of the greater part of Burnside's command. It may be that the vast superiority of numbers on the part of the enemy and the great facilities they have for the transportation of heavy ordnance by the river, will enable them to drive General Johnston back. For the present he holds them in check, and has even gained some advantages over them since the attack on Jackson was begun. On Sunday, the 12th instant, a trial of strength was had, in which the Yankees were repulsed with a loss of 500. General Osterhaus, of their army, was killed. The regimental standards of the 28th, 41st, and 53rd Illinois regiments were captured and carried into the town. The latest telegrams represent that the fire of the Yankee siege guns upon Jackson is incessant, that an attack on the right and centre made on the afternoon of the 16th was handsomely met and repelled by the divisions of Loring and Walker, that many buildings had been destroyed by the cannonade, and that an attempt would be made on the part of Grant to cross the Pearl River and take the city by a flank movement. Altogether the intelligence from Jackson is by no means encouraging, but it is not conceded that the Yankees have secured to themselves as yet the uninterrupted navigation of the Mississippi, nor will any successes they may achieve in the extreme South avail more than in a hopeless extension of a hopeless undertaking. We are not near the Caudine Forks as yet.

General Beauregard informs the War Department that his troops attacked the Yankees on James Island on the morning of the 16th, and drove them to the protection of their gunboats in the Stono River with a small loss on both sides. General Beauregard calls for a large number of negroes to work upon new defences which have been rendered necessary by the new modes of attack resolved upon by the enemy, and the Mayor of Charleston has ordered all the non-combatants out of the city. The Yankees, having obtained a foothold, a pou sto on Morris Island, are massing their troops there, intending to make the reduction of Fort Wagner a question of mere arithmetic, so much weight of metal, so many tons of powder and iron, and so many days, against the power of resistance to bombardment of an earthwork. If permitted to retain their position and to erect what batteries they please, it is demonstrable that, sooner or later, Fort Wagner must fall, and then Fort Sumter. General Beauregard, who is perfectly cognisant of the relative importance of these defences, will probably not let the Yankees proceed uninterruptedly in their work, and we may, therefore, expect to hear of vigorous operations on Morris Island at any moment. Ninety-nine prisoners taken in the engagement of Friday, the 10th instant, were marched through our streets, on their way from the Southern Railway Station to the Libby prison, yesterday afternoon.

The efforts of the Lincoln Government in "crushing out the rebellion" have met with unexpected and somewhat alarming interruption in New York City. Profiting by the excitement created there by the stirring news of Gettysburg, and being under a pressing necessity for more troops to fill up the awful gaps in their columns made by General Lee's artillery, the authorities undertook to enforce the conscription, and thereupon serious riots broke out, in which the operatives tore down the conscript offices, burned arsenals, shot down the enrolling clerks, murdered the military with stones and bludgeons, and openly defied the law in every way. The disturbance commenced on Monday, the 13th, but the rioters gathered strength the following day, and the emeute had not been quelled on Wednesday the 15th, although Governor Seymour had made an official announcement upon the authority of the Government at Washington, that the draft had been stopped in New York City, and thus that the armed resistance to law had proved successful. Lincoln is learning something in "crushing out rebellions." It is amusing as well as highly significant that the enmity of the rioters took the wholesome direction of vengeance upon the authors of the war; and when we read that the office of the Tribune was threatened, and that "the Hon. Horace Greeley" was fain to make his escape out of the back window of a chop-house where he had gone to dine, we may indulge a reasonable hope that justice will sooner or later overtake the scoundrels who plunged the country into strife for the extermination of slavery and slaveholders. The "nigger" will yet prove Greeley's Frankenstein, his bête noire, the atra cura behind his back, the lifelong misery of his existence. The dread of the peace party at the North must be exceedingly great on the part of the Administration for them to yield this matter of the draft at the very first resistance to its enforcement, since their only hope of a continued prosecution of the war lies in the carrying out the Act of Congress. If the conscription is given up in New York City, it surely cannot be enforced in Hartford or Albany. Indeed, the surrender in one point is absolutely fatal to it everywhere. The reluctant patriot of Connecticut or Indiana will not submit to a coercion which his political brother in New York has successfully set at naught. Indeed, the people of the North-West have made up their minds to furnish neither men nor money to Mr. Lincoln. They will not be drafted, nor will they draw on their bankers for the $300 which is to be accepted in lieu of the new recruit. The work of an enrolling officer has long been about as safe and as pleasant in Indiana as that of the agent of an absentee landlord in Ireland, where "the boys" (if they have not been belied by Mr. Lever and other lively historians), have an infernal way of shooting down the obnoxious representative of a moneyed oppression from behind fences and hayricks; and without fresh levies for their armies, never to be obtained through voluntary enlistments, the cause of the "glorious Union" is hopeless indeed. If Mr. Lincoln cannot get his 300,000 men by compulsion before Christmas, the new year will see the end of the war.

For while these unhappy troubles have been agitating New York city and other parts of the North upon the first attempt to enforce the Conscription, President Davis's Proclamation extending the Confederate Conscription to the age of forty-five years, the extreme limit authorized by law, has been hailed everywhere with approval, and the levy will be raised without difficulty or opposition in any quarter. The Southern people are in no respect more inclined to submit to the exercise of arbitrary power than the refractory Yankees, nay, not half so much so, but they recognise the necessity of getting an army into the field without delay and without possibility of failure, when the stake is nothing less than their existence. The Northern despotism would drag its citizens from their homes to fight for mere conquest, splendour—our own citizens assist the Government in the execution of a law seemingly oppressive, which was rendered necessary by the very hope of national salvation.

A considerable fleet of Yankee gunboats has been steaming up and down James River, between City Point and Hampton Roads for a week past, shelling the woods on shore, and carrying off negroes from the mansions. They landed a force at Fort Powhatan, some ten or twelve miles below City Point, and destroyed some miserable earthworks thrown up there two years ago by an incompetent engineer. Several transports were in company, from which it was supposed they designed debarking troops for another attack on Richmond, but this purpose has not yet been sufficiently manifested to warrant us in regarding it seriously.

A lady, Northern by birth, but connected by marriage with a family of great wealth and the highest social position in this city, has been detected in a treasonable correspondence with the enemy. The evidence is quite sufficient to demand the death-penalty, were a man the offender. The discovery has excited considerable surprise and discussion in our social circles.

Major-General D. H. Hill has been raised to the rank of a Lieutenant-General and sent to the army of General Bragg, in place of Lieutenant-General Hardee, who has reported to General Johnston.

The weather has been unusually rainy during the month of June and, so far, in the month of July, and the sun to-day shines feebly out of a wet sky upon as moist a bit of earth just around Richmond as it sees in the daily revolution of the planet. Bridges have been carried off and railway embankments washed away at various points. The day before yesterday there was such a deluge that a wag reported the Quartermaster-General as having made a requisition for pontoons to cross the street from his office to the Treasury Building.

NEGRO SOLDIERS IN NEW ORLEANS.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, July 25.

General Banks's official organ has published what it calls "a partial list of the casualties before Port Hudson." I mail you a copy as a curiosity. This partial list says not a word about the hundreds of ditch-buried negroes who were bayoneted into the trenches during the assaults of May 27 and June 14. Their names, if they had any, are of no consequence. But the list of white Federal soldiers fills six and a half closely-printed solid columns. It may possibly give half the names of the killed and wounded, but it mentions not one of the thousands of sick soldiers who fill the Federal hospitals in this Department.

When Banks's men crossed the Teche, April 11, the advancing column marching to Alexandria numbered about 23,000 men. There are not, this 25th day of July, 10,000 effective Federal soldiers in the Gulf Department.

The "recapture of Brashear City" is thus flamingly announced in the official organ this morning:—

ANOTHER VICTORY—BRASHEAR CITY RETAKEN.

IT SURRENDERS TO A GUNBOAT.

Official information has been received in this city announcing the recapture of Brashear City.

It surrendered to the gunboat Sachem, Captain Johnson, on Tuesday, the 22nd instant.

We have not as yet received the full particulars, but presume that the whole garrison were made prisoners. When the place was taken by the rebels, a number of guns, and considerable stores and ammunition fell into their hands. It is to be hoped that at least some portion of these have been retaken.

The "full particulars not yet received" may be supplied as follows: Weitzel's small army is still forty miles this side of Brashear, wending its way through the deserted Lafourche Country. The "whole garrison" "presumed" to have surrendered is presumed to have consisted of the very few inhabitants, negroes, dogs, cats, and mayhap a mocking-bird or two, left in Brashear City since the Confederates so thoroughly cleaned it out, and conveyed the enormous quantity of Federal military stores left in that place across Berwick Bay into the Confederacy.

There is no other news of importance. The return flag-of-truce paroled prisoner boats from Mobile brought us New York news of the riots (telegraphed from Richmond). The Mobile papers and people continue to feel very badly about the fall of Vicksburg and the surrender of Port Hudson. I inclose an editorial or two from Mobile papers indicating not only the public feeling, but the plan to be pursued to prevent the opening of the Mississippi from being either profitable or pleasant to the Federals.

The second of the small steamers whose capture off Mobile Bay, July 17th, was noted in my last, is the James Battle. The Bagley started out with 700 bales, but 124 were thrown overboard during the chase.

We have yet to learn in this city—so far as receipts of supplies are concerned—that the Mississippi is open.

Negro soldiers are not particularly popular in a community where they were slaves not long ago. It is no unusual sight to see a nigger second-lieutenant swelling down Canal-street or St. Charles decked out in full uniform, with shoulder-straps and side arms. A negro in the cast-off coat of his master is apt to put on as many "airs" as does the Gulf breeze when it blows its best. Fancy the negro in a soldier's uniform! Only yesterday a gentleman invited to "appear" at head-quarters was paraded down Carondelet-street, with two musket-bearing negroes beside him and another in the rear, the guards of this white man. Ullmann, for a while brigadier-general of the corps d'Afrique, in one of his windy proclamations (called a general order), speaks of accidents occurring from the "improper use of fire-arms." I can conceive of no more improper use of fire-arms than placing them in the hands of negroes, teaching them how to use them, and paying slaves to murder their own masters. The white Federal officers hate their negro fellow-soldiers with a venom worthy of a first-class abolitionist. You know already how the negroes were bayoneted into slaughter at Port Hudson. And why not? A negro in any condition of contact with a superior race is only a substitute for a white man—he is his substitute in labour, his servant, his slave—and the Abolition scheme which proposed to flatter Sambo into the belief that he was a soldier, designed that he should not only murder Southern white men, but that he should stand between Northern troops and Confederate batteries, and be the Federal soldier's "substitute" for death.

There is now and then an amusing incident connected with this negro business which relieves for a moment the enormity of the outrage in arming negroes to murder white men, and the degradation to the Federal army in calling these rifle-carrying slaves "soldiers of the Federal army." Thus, not long ago an old gentleman in this city was addressed near the gate of his residence by two Federal officers, when the following brief dialogue occurred:—

Officers.—"These two young ladies, who have just turned in at that side gate, are, we presume your daughters?"

Old Gentleman (politely).—"It is presumed so."

One of the Officers.—"Well, sir. We are obliged to pass here quite often, and we notice that your daughters, if they see us coming turn back, cross the street, or avoid meeting us. Do they think we will insult them? Let me assure you and them, sir, that the uniform of an officer in the United States' army always covers a gentleman."

"Pardon me, sir," quietly replied the old gentleman, "I am obliged to take your word for that. But those young ladies have seen the uniform you speak of worn by negroes that a few days since were their own slaves. Good morning." And that conversation closed.

There are negroes, no doubt, brought up as house-slaves in respectable families, who are quite as well bred, and perhaps as well educated, as many of their fellow-sergeants, corporals, and lieutenants from New England. They are too well-mannered to walk into private houses, and steal silver pitchers and baby-linen, as Brigadier-General Neal Dow has done; but no given quantity of shoulder-straps and blue cloth can make them "gentlemen" in the sight of the Abolition officers of the Federal army. Sambo is now learning a hard lesson—and to many negroes it comes too late—that the "freedom" given by his Abolition friends from the North means a more terrible slavery than he has yet dreamed of—and "liberty" to die like a dog.

A private letter from London asks the question—"Would it be possible to procure a list of the plantations visited during the progress of the Federal army in Louisiana and an approximate estimate of the damage sustained on each?" Let me give a general answer through your columns. To give the details would be much like estimating the individual losses in Herculaneum and Pompeii. It would be almost as impossible. The Lincoln Government, so boastful of its real and supposed "successes," will carefully conceal from the civilized world as much as may be the wanton outrages, the public and private plunderings, the burnings, the utter ruin and desolation which mark the marauding march of the Federal army through a part of Louisiana. I will endeavor soon, however, to give your readers a general idea of the situation in this respect in the State of Louisiana.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, August 3.

It is not yet decided when the draft will re-commence in New York, and not positively ascertained that it will re-commence at all. Rumours get abroad every day or two—to be dissipated, and then revived with the same fate—that on a day certain the conscription is to be enforced with rigour, and that it is for that purpose so many Federal troops are concentrated in the city. But all this is guess-work. The reason given out for delay is that there are differences outstanding between the State authorities and Department at Washington concerning the number of troops which New York has furnished, for which credit is to be given in the apportioning of the number to be drawn. There is something in this, and in another branch of the question, that the draft is unequally apportioned, so as to bear heavily, by the caprice of power, on those portions of the city in which the political opponents of the Administration are mostly to be found, with the view of compelling an unfair portion of them into the army. There are, however, well informed men who are persuaded that the Government has no intention of drafting men at all again, at least until the local measures are perfected for relieving the Government of the expense and the odium of taking away unwilling conscripts by force. They reason that the claims of the Administration press for immediate conscription have a financial signification. The Government wants men, but has not the money or the authority to give the large bounties which are required by the waning popularity of the war to induce voluntary service. It will be contented with the men, if the cost will be furnished by others. The excitements which grew out of the first attempt to enforce conscription threw the city authorities and the property-holders into such a state of trepidation, that they are willing to bleed freely in their purses, rather than see a renewal of the dangerous experiment. If this terror be well kept up, there is reason to believe that subscriptions will be spontaneously made, as men pay black mail for the sake of escaping the attentions of a mob, to purchase the service of consenting conscripts or buy substitutes. The Government will thus get the men without extra cost to the Treasury. The terrorism which it employs becomes a cheap way of raising from one part of the community the means of bribing another part with ostentatious bounties, to fill up the armies of which Mr. Seward a few months ago made it a boast in one of his diplomatic despatches for the instruction of foreign governments in the immense popularity of the war, that they contained "not one conscript or involuntary soldier." The enthusiasm has so far subsided that the Government has been constrained to institute an immense and rigid conscription, in order to fill up the wasted ranks of the army, and to confess that soldiers cannot be had "in the day of the Nation's agony for life," unless dragged away from their homes by force, or hired by gratuities unheard of before in military service to affect the patriotism they do not feel.

We hear less of the conflict between the State jurisdiction and the Federal jurisdiction which has been threatened on the contesting of the constitutionality of the Conscription Act. The State functionaries are very willing to avoid the conflict here, where there are so many elements to disturb the regular course of legal proceedings by acts of individual violence, and will smoothe the way for the peaceful completion of the drafting, and of all subsequent proceedings under the act, until a decision is had in the Courts. Cases are made up in other parts of the State where the draft has been proceeded in regularly, to go first to the Supreme Court, which in this State belies its name, being only a district Court, of which there are eight in eight several Supreme Court districts. From a Supreme Court is an appeal to the High Court of Errors and Appeals—the tribunal in the last resort. The language of the Conservatives, who are waiting for this decision, is exceedingly moderate and "loyal," not to say timid, while that of the Administration journals is bold and defiant. The Administration will, probably, in some way, get the men for its present military necessities. It seems to be equally confident that in the conflict of jurisdiction it will ultimately triumph, and establish by its own Courts the theory of political power, asserted for the Federal Government by the Conscription Act and other kindred acts. Such a decision would reverse the whole current of former decisions, and change the character of the Government at Washington from that of a union of States under a limited Constitution, to one of a central consolidated Government, of which the States are dependent provinces. The Administration has some ground for its confidence in a favourable decision in the change of character which is thought to have taken place in the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Lincoln has had the rare fortune to have the appointment of three of the Justices of the Supreme Court to fill the vacancies caused by the deaths of Justices McLean and Daniels, and the resignation of Justice Campbell. There are good grounds for supposing that partisan considerations prevailed in the choice of their successors, and the friends of the new theory believe they have a majority of the Court secondaries. Some of Mr. Lincoln's judicial appointments have confirmed the suspicion that this was intended. One or two of the new Judges have given decisions only accounted for by extreme partisanship; and the opposition are alarmed with the signs that the Judiciary, too, has become Radical.

Late transactions in Kentucky show with what audacity the Administration is using its military powers to control State elections. The general election takes place in Kentucky to-day, and members of the House of Representatives of the next Congress are to be chosen. These are nearly the closing elections, and thus far, parties are so equally divided that the remaining elections may throw the balance against the Administration. It is very certain that a great majority in Kentucky, if left free to vote, would declare against cardinal points of Mr. Lincoln's policy; to prevent this, the elections have by an order of Major-General Burnside, been taken under the control of the army of the United States. General Burnside is the officer who made himself infamously conspicuous in the arrest of Mr. Vallandigham. The following is a copy of this remarkable order:—

CINCINNATI, July 31.

Major-General Burnside has issued an order declaring the State of Kentucky invaded by a rebel force, with the avowed intention of overawing the judges of elections, intimidating loyal voters and keeping them from the polls, and forcing the election of disloyal candidates at the elections on the 3rd proximo.

The military of the Government, the order declares, is the only force that can defeat this attempt, and the State of Kentucky is therefore placed under martial law.

All military officers are commanded to aid the constituted authorities of the State in the support of the laws and the purity of suffrage.

The legally appointed judges at the polls will be held strictly responsible that no disloyal person be allowed to vote, and to this end the military power of the Government is ordered to give them its utmost support.

The allegation that there is a rebel invasion strong enough to affect the political result of the elections—confesses too much to be uttered in earnest. The plain object is to keep away from the polls, by terror, all those who will not vote in favour of the Administration. "Disloyalty" in Kentucky has been already defined in one of the military orders as including all opposition to the carrying on of the war—on the policy of Mr. Lincoln. The judges are threatened with being made "responsible" to the military if they permit any man to vote whom the military pronounce disloyal. The State is therefore to be made to record a vote in favour of the Administration, and to send "representatives" to support it by virtue of the bayonets of General Burnside's army. There will, of course, be a great Union and Administration triumph in Kentucky, and a new example to the world of the manner in which republics are governed in this "great and glorious land." A few weeks ago, Mr. Wolfe, the anti-Administration candidate for Congress, from Louisville district, for addressing the people in his canvas in terms not considered sufficiently polite towards the President and his policy, was arrested and sent to prison under a military order.

The same means for strengthening the Administration vote in the next House of Representatives are to be tried in the States further South, where the Federal armies have any foot-hold. The functions of civil authority in the name of the States are to be conferred on such persons as may profess and swear Unionism; and elections will be ordered for representatives in Congress to be regulated by military superintendence; of course the members appointed will be out-and-out supporters of Mr. Lincoln, and will really represent only the military occupants of the States. The opposition will find itself outvoted in the next Congress by this means, and all branches of the Government will continue to be as devoted to Mr. Lincoln through the remainder of his Administration as now.

MR. LINCOLN'S ORDER OF "RETALIATION."

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, July 30.

It is the duty of every Government to give protection to its citizens, of whatever class, colour, or condition, and especially those who are duly organised as soldiers in the public service. The law of nations and the usages and customs of war, as carried on by civilized Powers, permit no distinction as to colour in the treatment of prisoners of war as public enemies. To sell or enslave any captured person on account of his colour, and for no offence against the laws of war, is a relapse into barbarism and a crime against the civilization of the age.

The Government of the United States will give the same protection to all its soldiers, and if the enemy shall sell or enslave any one because of his colour, the offence shall be punished by retaliation upon the enemy's prisoners in our possession. It is, therefore, ordered that, for every soldier of the United States killed in violation of the laws of war, a rebel soldier shall be executed, and for every one enslaved by the enemy or sold into slavery, a rebel soldier shall be placed at hard labour on the public works, and continued at such labour until the other shall be released, and receive the treatment due to a prisoner of war.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

FROM SHETLAND.

SYMPATHY FOR STONEWALL JACKSON.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—I cannot resist forwarding to THE INDEX a letter which reached me from the Shetland Islands, accompanied with a Post-office order for £1 5s. 6d., from twenty-seven donors, and a subscription list of their initials, headed by the text,—"His body is buried in peace, but his name liveth for evermore." I am certain that the genuine admiration and affection which the old country feels for Jackson, will, in future and happier days, form a strong bond of sympathy with the good and brave Confederate people. You will be glad to know that subscriptions are coming in apace.

Yours faithfully,

A. J. B. BERESFORD HOPE.

Bedgebury Park, August 17.

Shetland Islands, Lerwick, August 10.

SIR,—Inclosed I beg to hand you Post-office order for the sum contained in the accompanying list, being an offering from this quarter to the Stonewall Jackson Statue Fund. We Northmen, admiring Stonewall Jackson in life, sorrowing for him in death, desire to aid, though ever so slightly, in commemorating this leader of men.

Honour the brave and bold,
Long shall the tale be told,
How he rode onward!

I am, Sir, your faithful servant,

ARTHUR LAWRENSON.

A. J. B. Beresford Hope, Esq.

PRESIDENT DAVIS'S ADDRESS TO THE ARMY.

TO THE SOLDIERS OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

After more than two years of a warfare scarcely equalled in the number, magnitude, and fearful carnage of its battles; a warfare in which your courage and fortitude have illustrated your country, and attracted not only gratitude at home, but admiration abroad, your enemies continue a struggle in which our final triumph must be inevitable. Unduly elated with their recent successes, they imagine that temporary reverses can quell your spirit or shake your determination, and they are now gathering heavy masses for a general invasion, in the vain hope that, by a desperate effort, success may at length be reached.

You know too well, my countrymen, what they mean by success. Their malignant rage aims at nothing less than the extermination of yourselves, your wives and children. They seek to destroy what they cannot plunder. They propose as the spoils of victory that your homes shall be partitioned among the wretches whose atrocious cruelties have stamped infamy on their Government. They design to incite servile insurrection and light the fires of incendiarism whenever they can reach your homes, and they debauch the inferior race, hitherto docile and contented, by promising indulgence of the vilest passions, as the price of treachery. Conscious of their inability to prevail by legitimate warfare, not daring to make peace lest they should be hurled from their seats of power, the men who now rule in Washington refuse even to confer on the subject of putting an end to outrages which disgrace our age, or to listen to a suggestion for conducting the war according to the usages of civilization.

Fellow-citizens, no alternative is left you but victory, or subjugation, slavery, and the utter ruin of yourselves, your families, and your country. The victory is within your reach. You need but stretch forth your hands to grasp it. For this and all that is necessary is that those who are called to the field by every motive that can move the human heart, should promptly repair to the post of duty, should stand by their comrades now in front of the foe, and thus so strengthen the armies of the Confederacy as to ensure success. The men now absent from their posts would, if present in the field, suffice to create numerical equality between our force and that of the invaders—and when with any approach to such equality have we failed to be victorious? I believe that but few of those absent are actuated by unwillingness to serve their country, but that many have found it difficult to resist the temptation of a visit to their homes and the loved ones from whom they have been so long separated; that others have left for temporary attention to their affairs, with the intention of returning, and then have shrunk from the consequences of their violation of duty; that others again have left their post from mere restlessness and desire of change, each quieting the upbraidings of his conscience, but persuading himself that his individual services could have no influence on the general result.

These and other causes (although far less disgraceful than the desire to avoid danger, or to escape from the sacrifices required by patriotism) are, nevertheless, grievous faults, and place the cause of our beloved country, and of everything we hold dear, in imminent peril. I repeat that the men who now owe duty to their country, who have been called out and have not yet reported for duty, or who have absented themselves from their posts, are sufficient in number to secure us victory in the struggle now impending.

I call on you, then, my countrymen, to hasten to your camps, in obedience to the dictates of honour and of duty, and summon those who have absented themselves without leave, or who have remained absent beyond the period allowed by their furloughs, to repair without delay to their respective commands, and I do hereby declare that I grant a general pardon and amnesty to all officers and men within the Confederacy, now absent without leave, who shall, with the least possible delay, return to their proper post of duty, but no excuse will be received for any deserter beyond twenty days after the first publication of this proclamation in the State in which the absence may be at the date of the publication. This amnesty and pardon shall extend to all who have been accused, or who have been convicted and are undergoing sentence for absence without leave or desertion, excepting only those who have been twice convicted of desertion.

Finally, I conjure my countrywomen—the wives, mothers, sisters, and daughters of the Confederacy—to use their all-powerful influence in aid of this call, to add one crowning sacrifice to those which their patriotism has so freely and constantly offered on their country's altar, and to take care that none who owe service in the field shall be sheltered at home from the disgrace of having deserted their duty to their families, their country, and their God.

Given under my hand, and the Seal of the Confederate States, at Richmond, this first day of August, in the year of Our Lord One thousand eight hundred and sixty-three.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

By THE PRESIDENT:

J. P. Benjamin, Secretary of State.

GEORGE III. AND PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

The Union with the Southern States is ended, and the other States are rapidly drifting into the most fearful despotism the world has ever known. Lincoln is but the cat-paw of the secret aspirants to the dictatorship. Whether it be McClellan, or Grant, or Halleck, or Meade, or Rosecranz, or Banks, or Burnside, no one can tell. It may be reserved for some one almost unknown at the moment; but to this result events are certainly bringing the Northern States. The people, in blind fury, close their eyes to passing events, and their ears to the voice of warning and timely advice. Looking to "honest Abe," and believing he has neither the capacity nor the ambition to be military dictator, they forget the fact that there are other jugglers behind the scenes, whose success depends on keeping all eyes turned on Lincoln. Their forefathers were not so blind in 1776, when, in their declaration of independence, they set forth, "that governments are instituted among men to secure the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundations on such principles, and organising its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

Amongst the charges brought against King George III. in that document, they enumerated the following:—

"He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power.

"He has combined, with others, to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation.

"For protecting them by a mock-trial from punishment for any murders they should commit on the inhabitants of these States:

"For depriving us in many cases of the benefits of trial by jury:

"For suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

"He has plundered our seas and ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

"He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation, and tyranny already begun, with circumstances of cruelty scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

"He has excited domestic insurrection amongst us; etc."

What a change has taken place in the ideas of popular rights as expressed by the fathers of the republic when compared with what is witnessed in the present day by the slavish submission of its people. There is not one charge here made by the former against King George III. of which President Lincoln has not been guilty. The Montreal Advertiser

THE CONDITION OF THE NEGROES IN THE SOUTH.—"An Englishwoman who has lived nearly thirty years in the South," asks us to call the attention of our readers to the following statement:—"There were imported into the British West Indies 4,000,000 negro slaves, and when they were manumitted there were 800,000. Into the Southern States 400,000 were imported, and there were, before the war, 4,000,000. This decrease in the former and increase in the latter are strong facts; the climatic influence is on the side of the West Indies; there must then have been a very different treatment, and the views of the anti-slavery party, probably, based upon their own experience, is false as to ours. Again, accurate research gives the number of white communicants in the Southern States at 1,550,000—one in three of the adult population. Of the coloured people—500,000—one in four of their adults. Surely the blessing of God must be with such a state of things.

DIED at Havannah, June 5th, 1863, George H. Thomas, a distinguished citizen of Kentucky, who, though in feeble health, had devoted his energies to the cause of the South to the day of his death. Mr. Thomas was about thirty-five years of age, and being disqualified by ill health for the field, was actively engaged in sending in supplies through the blockade for the past two years; he leaving many friends to mourn his untimely loss.

AFFAIRS, FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, August 19.

The general money and discount markets have not experienced the least alteration. A good demand for ordinary purposes prevails, the trading requirements being slightly on the increase, while the absorption for harvest operations continues considerable. One curious circumstance, however, appears to be that the pressure is not in any degree experienced at the Bank, which for the last three days especially, the applications have been comparatively moderate. Exceptional causes, it is imagined, must prevail to create the out-door exigency alluded to, and it is thought late remittances to Russia, whether some half million sterling has been forwarded, has created part of the late effect. The rate for first-class paper is maintained at 4 per cent., and if one or two transactions have ensued at 3½, they have not been of a character to induce a supposition that lower terms will be currently accepted. There have been no instalments on loans of moment; a few calls on Bank and other shares are in course of payment, which withdraw a little capital, but nothing to signify, and any supplies for current wants can be immediately obtained, the only question being one of price. We shall in all probability remain in our present situation until about October, the period of the distribution of the next dividends, and since there seems little prospect of hostilities between the Western Powers and Russia in relation to the Polish difficulty, a quiet course of affairs may be almost safely predicted.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The amount of gold sent into the Bank this week has been much less than usual, including £10,000 sent in this afternoon; the total is only £133,000, whilst there has been a withdrawal of £50,000 for transmission to Constantinople. The arrivals of bullion amount to £516,307, of which £233,712 is from the West Indies, £117,500 from Melbourne, £50,452 from Alexandria, and £109,693 from New York. The only gold ship at present known to be on its way to England is the John Durham from Otago, which will bring £160,000. There is no alteration in the state of the silver market, bars being still quoted 5s. 1d. per oz. Dollars are without change, but there is a considerable parcel on the market, not yet disposed of.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 30,00,000 rupees in Bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were, to Calcutta, 16,80,000 rupees; to Bombay, 12,00,000 rupees; and to Madras, 20,00,000 rupees. The declared minimum price was as before, 1s. 11½d. per rupee on Calcutta, and 1s. 11½d. on Bombay and Madras. The applications within the limits amounted to 254 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta above the minimum will be received in full, to those at the minimum there will be no allotment; on Bombay at minimum about 16 per cent., and on Madras about 80 per cent. will be allotted.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The general characteristic of the market for English Government Securities has been remarkable steadiness in quotations, with a tendency to improvement; but with comparatively very little doing. Consols show an advance as compared with last week of about ½ per cent.; the present price being 93½ to ¼ for money, and 93½ to ¾ for the September account. Exchequer Bills are unchanged, being still at 1s. discount to 2s. premium. In the Foreign Stock Market the chief dealings, both speculative and otherwise, have been in Mexican, but prices exhibit only a fractional variation from last week's quotations. Greek Stock has also been fairly dealt in at steady prices. Turkish and Spanish descriptions have also been in good request, with but little change. This evening's closing quotations were—Mexican, 38½ to ¾; Greek, 33½ to ½; Spanish Passives, 33½ to 34½; and the Certificates, 12½ to 12¾. Turkish Six per Cents, 1854, 92½ to 93, and ditto 1862, 68½.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

This loan has been again much depressed this week, more in consequence of forced sales on the part of adverse operations than from transactions of bona fide holders. The news from the seat of war is certainly, on the whole, less unfavourable to the value of the security, but isolated facts, such as the Secretary of the Treasury's letter as to the possible burning of the Government cotton stores in Louisiana and Mississippi, are dwelt upon with a view to shake public confidence still further. With limited transactions here the price has declined at one time to 30, 29, but the Stock closes firmer, at 28½ to 28 dis.

The payment of the dividend on the Bonds due 1st proximo is announced; also that the paid up scrip can be exchanged for bonds on and after the 24th instant.

The Morning Post of the 18th says,—In the foreign market the Confederate loan was, notwithstanding the more favourable news for the Confederate cause, quoted 24 22 dis. It is understood that there are agents in London and Liverpool who have directions to sell the Confederate Bonds for Northern account at almost any sacrifice in order to damage Southern credit in Europe; but whether the system will succeed remains to be seen.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The dealings in American Government and Railway Securities continue on a rather extended scale, and in some instances variations in prices to the extent of 3 to 4 per cent. have taken place, but in others, although the transactions have been numerous, there has been comparatively little fluctuation. The dealings comprised Virginia State Six per Cents. at 42 and 41½. United States Five per Cents., 69½ and 69½; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, 74; do. Pennsylvania Section, 75½, 76, 76½, and 76; Erie Shares, $100 all paid, 74½, 75½, 74½, 78, 79, 77½, 77, and 76½; do. Seven per Cent. preference, 73, 72½, 73½, and 72; Erie Seven per Cent. Fifth Mortgage, 73 to 73½; Illinois Central $100 Shares, $90 paid, 16, 15, 16, 15, 15½, 13, 12, 12½, 12, 11½, and 12 dis.; do. do. all paid, 76, 75½, 77½, 78½, 78, 79, 79½, 79½, 80, 79½, and 79; New York Central Six per Cents. 73; do. Seven per Cent. Convertible, 1876, 87; do. $100 Shares, 85, 86½, 86, 87, 86½ and 87.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

A moderate business has been transacted in British Railway Shares, and as compared with the prices of this day week there has been an improvement in most of the leading descriptions; South-Eastern showing an advance of about 1½ per cent., Great Eastern and London and North-Western, 1 per cent., Midland, ¾, and Lancashire and Yorkshire, Metropolitan, North-Eastern (Berwick), and ditto (Leeds), ½ per cent. each. But in Caledonian there has been a decline of about ½ per cent. In Foreign Railway Shares business has been less active, but without any material alteration in value. For Colonial descriptions there has also been comparatively little doing, but in the generality of cases prices continue steady.

BRITISH COLUMBIA DEBENTURES.

The Agents General for the Crown Colonies have just offered to public competition, British Columbia Debentures for £50,000, of which £41,400 were disposed of at prices varying from 104 (the minimum) to 108, the average rate on the whole being £105 1s. 3d. The balance, £8,800, was withdrawn. The money thus raised is to be applied to the opening out of roads between the capital and the gold-fields, a want which is said to be severely felt in the Colonies, and one which when overcome will go far to ensure the rapid development of trade and the prosperity of the mining and agricultural population.

RAILWAY LOAN FOR MELBOURNE.

Advices just received from Melbourne state that the Government had offered a further portion of the railway loan, amounting to £250,000 sterling. The minimum fixed was 5½ premium, and the whole was taken up except £33,000, which was withdrawn. These securities were subsequently dealt in at 107, or a premium of 1½ per cent. upon the official minimum.

BANK MEETINGS.

At the half-yearly meeting of the Bank of Australasia, the report, which was of a very satisfactory character, was unanimously adopted. It stated that the directors proposed paying on the 13th of October the same dividend and bonus as for the half-year in April, being together at the rate of 14 per cent. per annum. The directors continue to receive satisfactory reports from the colonies of the progress of business. Arrangements had been made for opening branches in New Zealand. The chairman (Mr. Childers, M.P.), in moving the adoption of the report, stated that everything was going on well in the colonies; 245 of the £10 shares only remained unallotted. During the past six months a larger number of emigrants than for many years past have left England for Australia. He (the chairman) was of opinion that the war in New Zealand would not very materially affect the southern portion of the island.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the first general meeting of the Charing-cross Hotel Company, the report of the directors, which was adopted, stated that a perpetual lease of the site at the railway terminus had been purchased by the company of the railway for £65,000, to be paid for in shares. The architects are Messrs. Banks and Barry, and the construction of the building has been intrusted to Messrs. Lucas, under a contract for £113,000, which includes also £10,000 for the booking-offices of the railway.—At the fourth annual meeting of Bray's Traction Engine Company a report was read which stated that the engine built by the company for her Majesty's Government, and now successfully working in Woolwich Dock-yard, was awarded a prize medal at the late International Exhibition "for practical utility and success;" but the prohibition by the Government of the use of locomotives of any kind on the roads or streets within the Metropolitan districts except between the hours of ten at night and six in the morning, acted as a total prohibition of the business of the company, so far as this country is concerned. The operations of the company were therefore, at present, almost wholly confined to the mining districts and the execution of foreign orders; but the directors express their unabated confidence in the ultimate triumph of the company over all difficulties. The report was adopted, and the directors were authorized to borrow any sum not exceeding £25,000, either by the creation of preference shares, bonds, or mortgages as they might deem expedient.—At the annual meeting of the proprietors of the Eagle Insurance Company, a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum was declared. From the report it appeared that the income of the company for the year was £389,106, and the charges £338,230, leaving a balance of £50,875. The premiums on insurances newly effected were £21,567. The actual income was somewhat lowered by the application of bonuses in reduction of the annual premiums. The claims and additions amounted to £242,359, being more than those of last year by £35,264, but less than those of the previous year by £13,077. A further investment of about £110,000 had been made in the Government funds.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In American produce a quiet but steady business is passing, and transactions since this day week sum up to about the recent average. Prices, whilst anything but buoyant, are generally well supported. The only exception worth naming is in breadstuffs, which, affected by the increased quantity of home supplies, have again receded in value. Wheat has declined 1s. to 2s. per quarter, and flour 6d. to 1s. per barrel for average qualities, the finer kinds approximating more closely to late rates. Most descriptions of American provisions are in steady request, with quotations tending rather upwards than otherwise. The bulk of the inferior grades of butter lately offering have now been pretty well cleared off and anything of fair quality coming fresh to hand is saleable without difficulty. Opinion is in favour of higher prices for butters of all kinds. The cheese trade remains without essential alteration. Prices are firm for all good dairies; and on the foreign market New York brands are still the most in favour. Bacon sides move off steadily at the previous currency, and bacon middles, which continue in some demand for export, firmly maintain the late advance. American rough lard brings 38s. to 40s. per cwt., and sales of moderate extent are effected. There has been no revival of demand for petroleum, and to sell in quantity lower terms would have to be taken, but there is no apparent disposition to force business, and general quotations cannot, therefore, be altered. Rosin of all imports continues very firm. For sperm oil a fair inquiry prevails, and the market is firm for both colonial and foreign. Linseed oil moves off slowly at 44s. 6d. to 44s. 9d. per cwt. The weather having retarded the operations of the chandlers, the tallow market has shown increased heaviness, and in common with all other descriptions North American has declined 6d. to 1s. per cwt.; nor are there indications of any immediate recovery. Some moderate contracts have been made for tobacco, upon terms which do not in any case alter previous quotations. American advices, in reference to the destruction of such cotton as was likely to fall into the hands of the Northerners has stimulated this market perceptibly, the inference being that whilst it may be doubted if Federal successes can ever bring peace, it can no longer be doubted that they will never bring cotton. Under these circumstances a good deal of buying, partly speculative, has taken place, and prices are fully ½d. per lb. higher. American oil of peppermint (Hotchkiss) has been sold in quantity at a slight reduction, but there are no further parcels offering under the recent quotation of 16s. New York beeswax is 2s. 6d. to 5s. per cwt. cheaper. Quercitron bark is in fair demand without variation in price. In our export trade with America the tone is very dull, and rates are in some instances easier. Quinine, most kinds of tartar, and Turkey opium are purchasable rather under the full terms recently quoted. Gum Arabic, except Jeddah sorts, are the turn flatter. Kowrie gum is firm, and little to be had under 38s. for coaty, whilst fine scraped is worth 65s. Turmeric is 1s. to 2s. per cwt. dearer. In metals there is no material change.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, August 19.

Our last report closed on a strong market. On Thursday, the tone was decidedly quieter, and 7,000 bales only were sold at previous prices. On Friday the sales reached 6,000 bales, at steady prices for Surats; but in American, which was freely offered out of recent arrivals, a small concession in price was necessary to effect sales.

In Manchester a healthy business has been doing quietly throughout the week at very full prices, which induced the trade to enter our market more freely; and on Saturday 8,000 bales were sold at steady prices.

The American news to hand on Monday, showing still no prospect of an early settlement, or of the receipt of cotton from the Southern States, further stimulated our market, and 10,000 bales were sold at rather higher prices.

On Tuesday, the receipt of an excellent report of the Manchester market started some speculation, and the sales again reached 10,000 bales at hardening prices.

To-day we have had a very large attendance of the trade who have bought very freely to cover orders, and the business reaches 15,000 bales at ½d. advance in Surats, and ½d. in long-staples, since Friday.

We quote Middling American 22½d., Fair Dholerah, 19d., Fair Sawginned Dharwar, 20½d., and Fair Dholerah, May shipment—to arrive, 18½d.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, August 18.

The intelligence by each successive steamer from America during the past week has imparted a firmer tone to our market generally, and an increased amount of business in yarn and cloth has been transacted from day to day.

Notwithstanding the fall of Vicksburg and Port Hudson, we do not hear of any greater quantity of cotton arriving at New Orleans up to the latest dates, than previously, but we learn that all cotton that might be in imminent danger of falling into the hands of the Federals would be destroyed by the Confederate military authorities. This, and the daily advance in the price of cotton at New York, also the decrease in exports of cotton from Bombay up to the latest date as compared with the same period of last year, being 130,000 bales, are sure to infuse a better spirit in this market than has been experienced for some time.

Continental yarns are in better request, and an advance of from ½d. to ¾d. per lb. over last week's prices can be obtained. Home-trade yarns are dearer to about the same extent.

India Mules are more inquired for, and the advance realised is fully ¾d. per lb.

Cloths of all kinds participate in the improved feeling, and are better to sell by about 3d. per piece than was the case last week.

NOW READY,
THE FIRST TWO NUMBERS OF A NEW QUARTERLY SCIENTIFIC JOURNAL, ENTITLED
AND
Journal of the Anthropological Society of London.

THE ANTHROPOLOGICAL REVIEW is an effort to supply a want which has long been felt by all who have directed any serious attention to the philosophy or natural history of Man. It will be a repository of facts, an arena for discussion, and a medium of communication between Anthropologists and travellers all over the world. All relevant subjects will receive, in its pages, a free and fair consideration, irrespective of party or personal feelings, and it will be the aim of the Editors to see that every question is discussed purely on its merits, and that every shade of opinion shall be able to command a fair and adequate representation.

Neither will the work be a merely passive recipient of the communications of the learned or of the facts brought to light by travellers and explorers. It will actively seek, by every available means, to promote the study of Man "in all his leading aspects, physical, mental, and historical; to investigate the laws of his origin and progress; to ascertain his place in nature and his relations to the inferior forms of life; and to attain these objects by patient investigation, careful induction, and the encouragement of all researches tending to establish a de facto science of man." As a means of attaining these objects it will contain:—

- I. Original Articles, or Translations of Original Communications in Foreign Languages.
- II. Reviews of the principal British and Foreign Works on Anthropology.
- III. Short Notices of the Minor Works bearing on the Science of Man.
- IV. Miscellaneous Anthropological Intelligence.
- V. The Official Reports of the Meetings of the Anthropological Society of London.

GENERAL THOMAS J. (STONEWALL) JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence.

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a marble Statue, heroic size, of the General for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "Stonewall" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COURTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

It has been our almost invariable rule to treat with silent contempt the mendacious assertions of the Federal Government and its hired advocates and spies in this country. At the request of some friends we consent to make an exception in reference to the reported defection of North Carolina from the Confederate States. Suffice it to say that the genius of Yankeeedom never forged a more unmitigated falsehood. It is pretended that Governor Vance, despairing of the success of the South, is desirous of reunion. We have before us a letter from Governor Vance to the agent of North Carolina in this country, dated "Raleigh, July 10th, 1863," and from which we are permitted to make the following extracts:—

The resources of our State and the Confederacy have developed in such a degree that we have every assurance of being able to clothe our troops with our own goods, and our vast amount of captures has given us an abundance of arms.

The fall of Vicksburg, though creating some despondency, has not discouraged us.

On the whole our prospects are better than they were this time last year. Our people are adapting themselves to a state of war, our resources are developing wonderfully, our army is becoming veteran and invincible, and our crop prospects, with the harvest already in, almost exceed belief.

That the Raleigh Standard can publish the articles ascribed to it must convince the most sceptical that the Confederate press is completely free, and that the Confederate Government must be strong and popular to permit the publication of what the North would call treasonable articles. If Mr. Lincoln granted his subjects equal liberty, his lease of office would not be worth many weeks' purchase.

During the present lull in the war Northern politicians are directing their attention to the prospects of the next congressional campaign. In the elections the administration has been placed in a minority in the House of Representatives. The following table gives the returns according to the Northern press up to the middle of August:—

States.	Administration.	Opposition.
Connecticut .. ..	3	1
Indiana .. ..	4	7
Illinois .. ..	5	9
Iowa .. ..	6	0
Kentucky .. ..	0	9

The six great States of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana have returned thirty-nine members for the Administration and sixty-five members for the Opposition, being a majority of twenty-six against the Government. This is an emphatic protest against the war policy of Mr. Lincoln.

The New York Tribune of August 15, after telling an Abolition story about the "mean whites" of the South, adds:—"Such is the infernal, God-defying, man-debasing system which the white labourers of this City are now being goaded by Fernando Wood and Horatio Seymour into treason to uphold and perpetuate—and all because those reckless aspirants believe their own chances of political aggrandizement will thereby be promoted! May the lightnings of Divine Justice blast their fiendish ambition!" The Republican faction is very great in blaspheming and cursing, and, indeed, in these accomplishments is without a rival.

In our leading columns we have referred to the discussion that has ensued from the report of the Federal spies that some iron-clads were building on the Clyde and intended for the Confederate States' service. The discovery of this mare's-nest is a pleasant diversion for the dull season.

General Neal Dow, who was lately captured by the Confederates, told his guards, says the Atlantic Constitutionalist, "That he was aware of the outrages committed by Federal troops, but they were contrary to the wishes and orders of the officers; but the army being composed chiefly of the scum of the North—the refuse population of Europe and the United States—they would rob and plunder in spite of their officers." It happens, however, that General Neal Dow has not only been unable to restrain his soldiers from stealing, but he himself has been guilty of that crime. We learn from the Richmond Dispatch that when he took possession of Pensacola he compelled the wife and children of Mr. Bachelor, whom he confined in Fort Pickens, to move fifty miles, and seek protection on their negro plantation. "In the meantime General Neal Dow stole Mrs. Bachelor's piano and parlour furniture and sent them to his wife. When the articles were demanded and the matter was investigated, General Dow confessed to the theft, but these articles were never returned nor paid for."

The petition presented by the French residents at New Orleans to the French Vice-Consul, praying for the protection of some French ships of war against the threatened negro insurrection, avers:—

That meetings are held, speeches made, and publications spread abroad, the tendency of all which is to bring about a conflict between the black and white races. That this danger is increased by the condition in which the undersigned are placed by the orders of the Commander-in-Chief of this Department, who has taken away all the arms with which they could defend themselves. That circumstances may at any moment arise, either owing to the departure of the United States troops to encounter the enemy, or the evacuation of this place after some engagement, in which the National Government might be found perfectly unable to afford the protection which the undersigned have a right to demand.

If the white people of New Orleans escape massacre it will not be the fault of the Federal authorities. What more can be done to bring about a rising, than to incite the negroes by speeches, to put arms in the hands of the coloured men, and to disarm the white population?

The Richmond papers announce the speedy appearance of the "The Southern Punch," a weekly journal, to be in general features like "the world-renowned London Punch," so long an acknowledged power in the British Isles in the reformation of public abuses, and the enlightenment of the public mind, flashing as it did with the genius of Hood, of Jerrold, and a host of wits, poets, and philosophic thinkers."

Owing to the presence of a large body of Federal troops and the admonitions of Governor Seymour, the drafting has proceeded without disturbance, but the contest between the State and Federal authorities is apparently only postponed. Governor Seymour, whilst regretting the precipitate action of the Federal Government, appeals to the people to conform to the conscription until it has been declared void by the Courts. At the latest dates from New York, Federal troops were still arriving to maintain public order. If President Lincoln is to maintain his authority, he will have to garrison other Northern cities besides New York.

The Peterhoff is to be purchased at prize value by the Washington Government, and converted into a gunboat, without waiting for the decision of the Supreme Court. It is not, so says the Federals, lawful for the Confederates to recruit their navy by buying ships of British builders; but according to their action in the case of the Peterhoff, it is lawful to steal a British ship and convert it into a war vessel. The New York Times, in an article in which it gloats over the alliance between Russia and the United States as a means of humbling this country says:—"It will go hard with America, but England shall have enough of these relations before America has finished." We have already endured enough of insult and wrong from the Federal Government to make England appear contemptible to the people of the North.

There is still a dearth of military news. The Northern papers issue a fresh programme every day as to General Lee's movements. Nothing reliable has transpired about the siege of Charleston. A report that the Federal iron-clads had passed Fort Sumpter was not believed by the Federal Government.

In commenting on the claim made by the Messrs. Upton, of Boston, against the British Government for the loss of their ship the Nora, which was captured by the Alabama, the New York Herald says it is the first of a "numerous series" of similar claims; and that "Mr. Cobden was quite right when he informed the House of Commons some weeks ago that a record was kept in the United States of all the damages done to their citizens by the corsairs, which Mr. Laird and his co-labourers were sending on the high seas, and that the British Government would be held responsible, even to the point of war, for the amount." No one doubts, or has doubted, that Messrs. Cobden and Bright are well posted as to the policy and intentions of the Federal Government.

It is a breach of neutrality for the West India merchants to supply Confederate steamers with coals, but they may fairly render the same service to the Federals. The New York Herald says, that the number of the Federal iron-clads is rapidly increasing, and adds, "Let the West India ports that have been acting as feeders to rebel wants look to it that they keep on hand abundant coal supplies for our war steamers. We intend by-and-bye to make them render us similar services to those they have been so efficiently performing for their rebel friends."

Nothing is left undone that can be done to urge on the people of the North to wage a war with this country.

In a leader on the West Indies the New York Herald observes: "These British West India Islands imitate the dishonest policy of their so-called parent Government."

"When Napoleon I. declared that the British were a nation of shopkeepers, he made a very sage and well-merited remark. John Bull's energy is principally confined to the prosperity of his shops; and after that comes another thing with which no man must trifle—the rotund condition of his capacious stomach." The British Government, "meanest of the mean, has carried its mean tendencies to every corner of its dependencies. . . . From Nassau to Jamaica, from Jamaica to Barbadoes, and all along the whole belt of the Antilles, our correspondent sends us undeniable testimony of the demoralisation of the British colonies, the failure of emancipation, and the future misery awaiting the helpless people of the British Isles. . . . We do not want these islands at present; but if ever we do we will take them in spite of England and all her brave colonial soldiers." And yet we are asked to alter our laws so that we may bind the Federals to pursue a particular policy in any future emergency. Every act of subservieny on our part will encourage the North to make war on us.

The Richmond Whig, of August 4th, states that the bridge over the Tar River, North Carolina, has been replaced, and that the trains on the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad have resumed their regular trips.

The Federal rule in Vicksburg is cruel and oppressive. The families who having means enough to support themselves, did not draw on the Federal rations, had all their provisions seized, and were compelled to subsist on the army commissariat. The Atlanta Appeal informs its readers that the lines are closed and that no more citizens are allowed to come out. The unfortunate people of Vicksburg are, in fact, prisoners upon scanty rations. At every place taken by the Federals the people are taught that it is better to die than to fall into the power of the Yankees.

Mr. W. H. S. Taylor, of the Audit Office, Richmond, announces under date of July 28th, that he has received a "series of Yankee returns of our soldiers and citizens, who have been murdered by cold, starvation, and the most cruel and intentional neglect, in the Yankee prisons all over Yankeedom, numbering many thousands. A perusal of these lists is enough, and ought to fire the hearts of every Confederate man, woman, and child with the deepest hatred, fury, and the desire of speedy vengeance. Any one desiring to inspect these lists, comprising the bravest and best soldiers and citizens from all the Confederate States, and of the latter especially from Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee, can do so by calling at my office." Nothing can exceed the savage brutality with which the Federals treat their prisoners. They maltreat the healthy, neglect the wounded, and torture the dying.

It has been asserted that a large amount of ammunition was lost at Vicksburg. A correspondent of the Mobil e Register contradicts this, and says:—"I have the papers to prove to the contrary, which I will show to any person who wishes to see them, and assert that there was not enough for twenty-four hours hard fighting. The Ordnance Department was engaged in making ammunition night and day to supply the consumption for two days before the surrender, and the stock in Vicksburg from the time the first gun was planted has never been enough—certainly never immense."

Although no battles are being fought the Confederates are not inactive. On the 15th August a party of Mosley's corps captured seventeen sutlers, with their waggons, horses, and guards, near Fairfax Court-house. On the evening of the same day a few Confederate cavalry made an incursion into Poolesville, Maryland. They captured the telegraph operator and his instrument, and returned into Virginia with a considerable booty in horses and stores.

The Federal sport of hunting Indians to death and scalping them is being eagerly pursued. The New York Times, referring to a proposition that the Indians should be enlisted into the United States' service—the Federals would like to use the Indians as well as the negroes to aid them in demolishing the South—says, "Unless the Minnesota hunters are cheeked in their pastime, there will be few recruits left us when we begin to swear in the red-skins."

A person named R. H. Webster has been arrested at Albany, New York, on the charge of manufacturing United States Treasury Notes. It appears he sent circulars to postmasters and other local officers at small towns, offering to supply imitation notes that defied detection at $30 per $100, and to send a specimen note on receipt of $1. When he had favourable replies he returned a genuine note as a specimen, and this led to further orders which were not executed. He did not really forge notes, but duped his correspondents. His letters show that he received hundreds of dollars from all parts of the Northern States. So much for the morality and patriotism of the postmasters and local officers.

ENGLAND.

Bishop Colenso has been cited to appear on the 17th of November next in the vestry of the Cathedral Church of St. George, Cape Town, to answer certain charges of false, strange, and erroneous doctrine and teaching, preferred against him by the Deau of Cape Town, the Archdeacon of Graham's Town, and the Archdeacon of St. George. The charges are founded on passages from his translation of the Epistle to the Romans, and also from his famous work, "The Pentateuch and the book of Joshua critically examined." The citation bears date the 18th of May, 1863, that is, before the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of "The Bishop of Cape Town v. the Rev. W. Long." That decision makes it extremely doubtful whether the Bishop of Cape Town has the authority of a Metropolitan Bishop over the Bishop of Natal.

Further intelligence has been received of the Zambesi mission. Bishop Tozer, on board the Orestes, had arrived. It was reported that Dr. Dickenson had fallen a victim to the fever, but this is not certain. Dr. Livingstone's party had been very short of provisions, and he intended to send down the Pioneer for a supply. Owing to the shallow state of the river the vessel had not arrived at Quillimane. Bishop Tozer was busy making arrangements for forwarding supplies of food and other necessities in canoes for the mission.

Kilkenny has for the second time been visited by the Royal Agricultural Society; and on this occasion the promise of a fine harvest, brighter hopes, and the absence of disaffection, seemed strikingly in contrast with the results of the show held there fifteen years ago, with the discontent then prevalent, and with the existence of martial law at the time of the show. The gold medal for the best bull went to Tipperary, and numerous prizes were secured for Waterford. However, a large number of prizes were absorbed by the English and Scotch exhibitors, against whose capital and industry it is difficult for Irish agriculturists to strive. The results in implements were somewhat similar, the fifty guinea challenge cup given by the Farmer's Gazette going to Munster, while the bulk of the prizes found their way into the hands of the great English manufacturers. The Lord-Lieutenant visited Kilkenny, and was entertained by the Mayor and Council, and also by the Society, and in his speech drew attention to the contrast between the scene at Kilkenny—calculated as it was to unite all classes, landlords, tenants, and labourers, in a reciprocity of goodwill and good deeds—and the discord and bloodshed at other times, and still, in other places, resulting from the conflict of those who possess and those who till the soil.

A principle in ship-building, new so far as concerns its application to vessels of war of sea-going qualities, has been tested with extraordinary success during the past week. The turn-screw system had been first tried by Messrs. J. and W. Dudgeon, of Limehouse, last November, with the ship Flora, of 400 tons, and afterwards with the Hebe and Kate vessels of about the same tonnage. The Admiralty have already applied the principle to iron-cased floating batteries; but in those cases the screws were driven by collective power. Now, however, the Aurora has been fitted with two screws driven by independent engines. She is an iron vessel 165 feet in length, with a beam of 23 feet, a depth of 13 feet 6 inches; an area of midship section of 150 square feet, and a displacement of 400 tons. Her engines are 120 horse-power; her two screws are three-bladed, 7 feet in diameter, and with a pitch of 14 feet 6 inches. Her draught of water at starting for her trial trip was 7 feet 3 inches aft, and 5 feet 3 inches forward. She started from Tilbury Pier and ran the measured mile in the Lower Hope in 4 minutes 48 seconds; that is at the rate of 14.516 knots. She accomplished the run from Tilbury to the Nore, 20 nautical miles, in 1 hour and 17 minutes; which, if her horse-power, engine, and hull displacement be considered, is almost an unparalleled feat. On her return she accomplished 20 miles in 1 hour and 7 minutes. She was also proved to possess extraordinary facilities in turning both to port and starboard in answer to her rudder and screws. Messrs. Dudgeon have received orders from the Admiralty for the construction of a small vessel on this principle.

The Confederate man-of-war the Florida captured on Friday, the 21st August, the ship Anglo-Saxon, from Liverpool to New York. The latter vessel was about 30 miles off the Old Head of Kinsale (Ireland), bearing

N.N.W., and becalmed. The Channel pilot was on board. The Anglo-Saxon was stripped of all the nautical instruments, books, charts, &c., was then set on fire, and afterwards received three broadsides at 1,000 yards. The captain and crew were landed at Brest. The Anglo-Saxon was a ship of 868 tons and was despatched by Duncan and Kendal.

The total exports of British and Irish produce and manufactures amounted in value for the past year to £123,992,264. Goods in a finished state were of the value of £82,364,681, exhibiting a decrease of nine millions on the year 1860, the fall being entirely due to the state of the cotton trade. So also in goods partially manufactured, there is a decline of four millions as compared with 1860, the declared amount for 1862 being £25,513,933. In this particular the decline is mainly in cotton twist and yarn, but to a certain extent in iron and tin. Articles of food, raw produce, and materials of manufacture exhibit a steady increase in value.

The taxation on enjoyments in this country presents some remarkable features. In the year ending March 1863, duty was paid in Great Britain on 343,285 dogs, and on 571,189 horses. The duty on race-horses, being on a different scale, was paid on no less than 1668 animals, and produced £6,442. Private carriages, being 269,443 in number, paid £350,083, while more than £200,000 was paid for keeping livery servants, hair-powder duty producing £1,103.

The British Association for the Advancement of Science has commenced its annual series of meetings, debates, excursions and researches. The favoured spot this year is Newcastle-on-Tyne. On Wednesday, August 26, the proceedings were opened with an address from Sir William Armstrong, in which the progress made within the last twenty-five years in all physical science was most ably sketched, the chief subjects of discussion being the system of railways, electricity, the discovery of the dynamical theory of light, the coal-beds of England, and scientific gunnery, besides the somewhat social questions of stenography, and the merits of the decimal and duodecimal systems. The success attained in geographical researches, the Darwinian theory, and the theory of the antiquity of man were also briefly discussed. On the following day the sectional departments commenced their sittings. They are divided under the heads Mathematical and Physical Sciences, Chemical Sciences, Geography and Ethnology, Geology, Zoology and Botany, Physiology, Economic Science, Statistics and Mechanical Science. In the Geological section the subject of coal mines was warmly discussed, and the opinion of Sir William Armstrong, that the duration of the English mines would be limited to 200 years, most ably controverted by Mr. Nicholas Wood. It was also suggested by Mr. Wood that Sir William had overlooked the extent of coal-beds beneath the sea, which he believed might be worked. In the Chemical section a paper was read on glass manufacture, and the baneful effects of the trades' unions on the blown-glass trade severely criticised. It was even held, that in the absence of legislative interference, the trade would be driven from the country. In the Ethnology department a most interesting debate arose on the "Commixture of Races," a paper being read on the subject by Mr. J. Crawford, F.R.S., who laid down a rule that nations of approximate equality readily commingle, and without deterioration, but that where the disparity of races is extreme there no amalgamation at all takes place, for antipathy is the result. He alluded to the laws of Tennessee and Indiana on the intermarriage of the white man with the negro, and also to the proscriptive enactments of Massachusetts and Oregon. He declared the absolute inferiority of the African race, and their utter incapacity to rise to an equality with the white man of North America. The African race was hotly defended by a man of colour, named Craft, who roundly asserted that whenever the African race had equal opportunities with the whites, they had shown that they possessed considerable intellectual ability, and many of them had risen to a very high position in society. Dr. Hunt agreed with Mr. Crawford in the general conclusion at which he had arrived, but he thought he had not dwelt sufficiently on the great physiological law which was admitted by most observers, that where the intermixture was kept up through succeeding generations the offspring gradually died out, and the race became extinct. He thought that the laws in the Southern States of America against the intermarriage of the negroes with the whites were wise laws. Professor Wilson, of the University of Toronto, was of opinion that the Red Indian and the white race might intermarry with advantage. He thought the same would apply to the negro, though in that case the experiment had not been tried. In the evening of the same day Dr. Hunt read a paper "On the Mental and Physical Character of the Negro." He treated the subject elaborately, and contended generally that nowhere had the negro shown signs of improvement, except when intermixed with a higher race. The general conclusions of the paper were:—1st, that there is as good reason for classifying the negro as a distinct species from the European as there is for making the ass a distinct species from the zebra; 2nd, that the negro is inferior intellectually to the European; 3rd, that the analogies are far more numerous between the negro and apes than between the European and apes. In the discussion which followed Mr. Galton said that among the negroes of Africa there were more frequent instances of an abject and superstitious character, combined with brutal behaviour; than could be paralleled elsewhere in the world. It was a wonder that people like those of Dahomey could mould themselves into any form of society at all, and it was actually found that when the chief of such a tribe died it disintegrated and rapidly disappeared. In short, the tribes of Africa were remarkable for their rapid formation and short continuance. Mr. Craft said he was not of pure African descent, yet he was black enough to say a few words about the paper that had been read, and he referred to several instances, amongst others to that of Mr. Crowder, of negroes manifesting intellectual powers. Mr. Craft said he had lately been to Africa on a visit to the King of Dahomey. The Rev. H. B. Tristram said that the children of free negroes who were engaged in honourable occupations were invariably more intelligent than the children of slaves. Mr. Tristram's experience is totally opposed to the general testimony as to the condition of free negroes. Mr. Carter Blake contended that in nearly every instance of a negro attaining intellectual eminence it had been ascertained that there was an admixture of European blood in his veins. Sir E. Belcher said he had visited many countries of the globe, and had been brought into frequent contact with African races, of which there were several thousand varieties. One native African he had seen he looked upon as the most beautiful model in creation. He had brought from Timbuctoo some of the most elaborate specimens of workmanship. In many of the arts of life the natives of Central Africa had anticipated Europeans in their inventions. Professor Wilson, of Toronto, was of opinion that Sir Charles Lyell and others, who contended that the intellectual progress of the negro stopped at the age of 14, had fallen into the error which a person would who went into a work-house, among the most degraded and wretched of its occupants, to find intellectual culture and capacity, and that if the negro had a fair chance, that is, if he were enfranchised, he would progress as other races have done. The learned Professor does not, in the brief report before us, explain how it happens that, instead of advancing, emancipated negroes have degenerated. In the Economic Science section, the decrease in the agricultural population of England, being at the rate of 3 per cent. in ten years, the great rise in the rate of agricultural wages, and the enclosure of waste tracts of land, amounting in the whole to 300,000 acres since 1851, were ably shown. The Association does not confine itself to debate or lecture. Excursions organised on a vast scale serve to lighten their philosophical toils, and parties have visited the west of Northumberland and the borders, have inspected the magnificent beds of strata exposed along the course of the river Liddell, and have been entertained at Mildar Castle by the Duke of Northumberland, while others have visited Sunderland for the purpose of examining the public works. On Monday Speke and Grant made their appearance, and the latter read a paper on their travels to the sources of the Nile.

Campden House, situated in what is called by Leigh Hunt the "Court Suburb" in Kensington, derived its name from Viscount Campden, its founder, who was advanced to the Peerage under that title by James I., being before his elevation known as Sir Baptist Hicks. The house was built about the year 1612, was of two stories, and contained thirty rooms. At the beginning of the last century it was inhabited by the Princess Anne, and at the beginning of the present century it came into the hands of the Pitt family, by whom the estate was leased to Messrs. Little, and Co., builders. In 1847 a Mr. Woolley resided there, and afterwards, in 1854, he took a lease from the Pitt family for ninety-nine years. The history of Mr. Woolley seems simply to have been, that during the early part of his life he subsisted by the goodness of his friends, having no fortune and no regular occupation, but at the same time not having any objection to turning his hand to any useful art in the houses or for the gratification of his friends, whether he was called upon to help at Raggett's Hotel or to render theatrical services. However this may be, it is certain that in 1847 he was lucky enough to marry a Miss Cope who had a fortune of about £25,000, and who also possessed a sister with a like property. Mr. Woolley usually resided at Campden House from the date of the lease, with occasional visits to Brighton and Tonbridge Wells, and once let Campden House for a short time to the notorious Colonel Wagh. Mr. Woolley was a man of remarkable tastes, and employed himself entirely in the decoration of his house, sparing for that purpose neither money, time, nor trouble. He would purchase old panels, carvings, pictures, tables, or bedsteads. He gave about £2,000 for a house in Essex, simply for the purpose of getting therefrom the carvings, which were of the time of Henry VIII. The ball-room contained a splendid Florentine glass, the frame of which was of the 16th century, and elaborately carved, twenty-five pictures, several of them of value, and one by Velasquez. The sum of £150 was not considered too extravagant for a dining table, and all the rooms were richly furnished in various ancient styles—Louis Quatorze or Louis Quinze. Substantial repairs had been done to the house at a cost of £8,000. Mr. Woolley had also constructed a theatre in the house, in which plays were acted for charitable purposes, and it was his greatest pleasure to manage these affairs. He also gave splendid entertainments, and was visited extensively by people of rank and fashion. Such outlays must of course have diminished his wife's fortune, and it is worthy of remark that he had borrowed of Miss Cope about £17,000, of which £8,000 was secured on the furniture of Campden House. On Saturday, the 23rd of March, 1862, before three o'clock in the morning, a fire broke out in Campden House. The night was wet, but not windy, yet the fire burnt with such rapidity that the premises and contents of the house were demolished in less than half an hour. Mr. Woolley, Crozier the valet, and one Temple, a carpenter, his wife and child, were the only occupants of the house at the time. The furniture, fixtures, and walls were covered up with calico, holland, and paper; drugget and tapestry were suspended at the windows; books were lying open in all directions; the house was undergoing a coating of varnish, and nothing could be more complete than the condition in which the house was, if the purpose had been to secure its speedy destruction. The house and its furniture were insured in various officers for about £29,000 and the usual application for payment having been made, the demands, after much negotiation, were resisted by the companies on the pleas of fraud and misrepresentation as to the value of the property, and also on the amazing plea that Mr. Woolley had set fire to his own house. As the Judge said, it was a charge of arson and of a triple murder. The point seemed to be that Mr. Woolley had ruined himself by extravagance, and his only means of saving his credit was by securing the insurance money. The case occupied five days, and an immense mass of evidence was adduced. On the plea of fraud the company entirely failed, and on that of arson the jury took but ten minutes for consideration, their verdict being for the plaintiff, Mr. Woolley, for the whole of his claim. It will easily be understood that the action was only against one company, and was in respect of about £4,000, but, of course, it virtually decided the issue on the whole amount. It is difficult to imagine that a company would bring such a terrible charge against a man without very strong belief in its truth; but at the same time a perusal of the case amply justifies the verdict of the jury, and proves that the company has so acted.

Not long since we had to record and to remark severely on the fatal results of performances on the high rope in two several instances. Now another victim has been added to the list of the exigencies of modern entertainment. The occasion was a fête in the park of Mr. North, at Basford, near Nottingham, and the particular method of delighting the crowd was a balloon ascent. Mr. Coxwell, the famous aeronaut, was to be the hero of the enterprise. The balloon employed was a new one, and, on trial, found to be incapable of lifting Mr. Coxwell, whose weight is 11 stone 6 lbs. The crowd was of course impatient, and had no idea of being disappointed. They had paid their money, had travelled some distance and were resolved to be compensated. At the critical moment a young man, named Chambers, whose weight was only 9 stone, offered to make the ascent, and on giving an assurance to Mr. Coxwell of his ability to manage the balloon, was permitted to enter the car. It seems that after ascending some distance the balloon passed through a thick cloud into sunshine, whereby the gas expanded rapidly, that the deceased then was overpowered by the gas, and in his insensibility pulled the valve-line to such an extent as to bring down the balloon. He was picked up three miles off, quite dead, probably from suffocation. It seemed that, from his conduct, he was either ignorant of his work, or that he became alarmed and lost his judgment. It is true that Chambers had made ascents before, but it is equally a fact that he had no grapnel with him and only two bags of sand. However, as Mr. Coxwell assured a by-stander that the mob would cut the balloon in pieces and offer violence to him if there were no ascent, it is probable that there was an incautious readiness to solve the difficulty by permitting Chambers to undertake the task. Balloon ascents may be in the interests of science, but this attempt was a rash exposure of an inexperienced man, and could have no object but the amusement, or rather the conciliation, of a mob.

THE CONTINENT.

THE Congress, at Frankfurt, which terminated on the 1st instant, has not achieved much towards bringing about a better union between the States that compose the German Confederation, but Austria, whatever may be the result of her project of reform, has gained an increase of influence at the expense of Prussia. Her right to preside at the directorate has been affirmed by a majority of the Congress, and the Emperor has conciliated the goodwill of his colleagues as well as of the people. Petty dynastic jealousies are almost certain to render abortive the Imperial scheme, and if so, the royal Congress will have taught the Germans that their political unity is impossible so long as Germany is parcelled out amongst a number of jealous sovereigns. It is rumoured that the King of Prussia will bring forward counter-propositions. The probable effect of such a proceeding will be to widen the breach between North and South.

There is very little news from Poland. An insurrection has broken out in the Ukraine, and the Poles have been victorious in two cavalry engagements, and also in an engagement that took place at Janow on the 30th August. Seven Polish corps are said to have been engaged in this affair. General Mouravieff is compelling the peasants to sign addresses of loyalty. It is supposed that the Grand Duke Constantine will not return to Warsaw.

The prospect of a pacific settlement of the Polish question is much more hopeful. The Emperor Napoleon, whilst maintaining a firmer attitude, has been indefatigable in his efforts to avert the calamity of an European war, and it is thought he will succeed. The Courier du Dimanche says that on the 19th instant M. Drouyn de Lhuys addressed a circular to the French agents abroad, stating that the attitude of Russia had strengthened the good understanding between the Powers. It stated also that the Emperor's Government was convinced that the Polish question was an European one, and would continue to watch events in Poland with the solicitude which it will expect to be also manifested by all the other Powers.

The intelligence from Russia is highly important. It is said that the Emperor has prepared a scheme for a new constitution. According to the proposed plan the parts of the Empire that would enjoy special Constitutions, would be nine in number, viz:—The Grand Duchy of Finland, the Provincial Assembly of which would be held at Helsingfors. Baltic-Russia, comprising the Government of St. Petersburg, properly called Esthonia, Livonia, and Courland, the Provincial Assembly of which would have its seat at St. Petersburg. Great Russia, whose Provincial Assembly would meet at Moscow. Little Russia, with a Provincial Assembly at Kiev. Southern Russia, with a Provincial Assembly at Odessa. Western Russia, with a Provincial Assembly at Wilna. The Kingdom of Poland, with a Diet which would be held at Warsaw. Eastern Russia, with a Provincial Assembly at Kazan. Finally, Siberia and the adjacent provinces, with a Provincial Assembly at Irkutsk. As regards the provinces of the Caucasian region and of American Russia, their organization will be ulteriorly considered. The particular institutions for Poland will, it is said, be very extended. Should the Poles decline to send deputies to the Chamber of the Representatives of the Empire, their scruples would be respected, and the special Government of Poland would function under the sole direction of the Diet of Warsaw, towards which the lieutenant of the Emperor would fill the constitutional mission of head of the executive power. This liberal programme is opposed by the court party, but the Emperor is said to be resolved on carrying out his liberal project.

A novel case has been brought before a Paris tribunal, MM. Marcuard and Co., bankers in Paris, recently advanced a sum of 225,000*fr.* on the probable proceeds of 74 bars of silver from the mines of Mexico, which they immediately sent to be assayed by MM. d'Hennin, Lunel, and Co., of the Rue Rambuteau. Some days after they learned that an attachment had been laid on the bars at the instance of Messrs. Frederick Huth and Co., of London, and they now applied for an order to authorise the sale of the silver, notwithstanding the said attachment. Their counsel stated that the 74 bars had been consigned by Messrs. Fraser, Trenholme, and Co., of Liverpool, to his clients, who received them on the 22nd instant; but Messrs. Huth and Co. claimed the silver as their property, since it had been regularly consigned to them from Mexico, and shipped at Mazatlan, on board the ship B. F. Hoxie, an American merchant vessel belonging to the Federal States, which was burnt at sea in May last by the Confederate steamer Florida, after being stripped of her cargo. The captain of the Florida sent these bars as lawful prize to the agents of the Confederate States at Liverpool, Messrs. Fraser, Trenholme, and Co., who forwarded them to MM. Mareuad for sale. The learned counsel concluded with demanding an order authorising their sale, without awaiting the issue of the actions as to the right of ownership now pending before the English and French tribunals. The counsel for Messrs. Huth and Co. stated that the value of the silver was 525,000*f*. and that his clients did not oppose the immediate sale provided the proceeds were impounded till the right of ownership should be decided. The President accordingly issued an order for the sale of the silver, and directed that the proceeds should be invested in Treasury Bonds at six months till the question of ownership should be duly decided.

The latest French advices from Mexico state that the health of the army is excellent, and that there are continual demonstrations in favour of the Empire. It is reported that Juarez has been deserted by the followers he had collected at San Luis Potosi. The Mexican papers urge the recognition of the Confederate States and it is supposed that President Davis has already sent a commissioner to Mexico to recognise the Empire and to propose a treaty. The Emperor Napoleon has issued a decree for striking a medal commemorative of the Mexican expedition, to be distributed to all who have taken part in the campaign.

The declaration made by Denmark respecting Schleswig has been published. Denmark states that though not in a position to withdraw the proclamation of the 30th of March, she is ready to take into consideration the proposals of the German Confederation, and to carry out in the non-Germanic provinces those resolutions of the Federal Diet compatible with the sovereign and legislative power of the King. Denmark, in conclusion, states that, having recognised the political autonomy of the Duchies, and declared herself ready to enter into negotiations concerning the realisation thereof, she would be compelled to regard a Federal execution as falling under the provisions of international law. Sweden has given notice to several of the Powers that she will side with Denmark in the event of hostilities breaking out between that Power and Germany.

THE SOUTH-WEST.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, Aug. 8.

UNTIL within comparatively a quite recent period your advantages in London for receiving news from the North and from New York were almost equal to ours in New Orleans. The occasional exception in our favour was when a Southern paper came by the "grape-vine," "underground," or some of the numerous modes of blockade-running so well known in the South. Once last winter we were twenty-one days without a line of intelligence from the North. Owing to the irregularity in the arrival of steamers at this port, very many of the most important movements connected with the war in America were known to you before the intelligence reached us.

If the fall of Vicksburg and the subsequent surrender of Port Hudson were not first known to you, it is certain that both were believed in London and Paris before the news was fully credited in the South. Indeed, as I have already written you, the announcement of both events was conveyed in such a manner as to throw discredit upon the despatches that purported to be "official," and every effort made to force the news upon the public only increased the public's incredulity. You cannot bully a man into a belief; and long after the negro and office-holders' bow-wow over Vicksburg, in this city very large sums of money were freely bet that the official despatch of Grant was false. The South, too, with the prestige of nearly eighteen months of an almost unbroken series of successes was slow to believe in the sudden and unexpected disasters of July. We have only begun to calculate the consequences of the recent defeats, and to see what future is likely to follow the unfortunate past.

It is thought in some quarters that late in the autumn an attack will, if possible, be made upon Mobile, but the United States is not so rich in ships as one would suppose from reading the Naval Register. To make an attack on Mobile, the iron-clads now at Charleston and Port Royal are needed. Farragut has just gone North for sixty days, and nothing will be done till he returns. Ship Island has been cleared of the prisoners, political and military, who have been confined there, and there are conjectures that this indicates that the Island is to be a rendezvous for ships, men, and supplies to operate against Mobile. It is possible, it is true; but the prisoners have been brought here with a view to their release and exchange; the negroes guarding them are needed by Banks; and there are no superfluous ships or transports to employ constantly in carrying supplies to that Island.

Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward placidly inform the world that, in the non-recognition of the right of secession, it is the theory of the United States Government that no State has seceded and that no State is out of the Union. Yet no longer ago than June 19 Mr. Lincoln refused to allow the return of Louisiana to the Union under its existing State Constitution? If Louisiana is not out of the Union, there is surely no necessity for arranging for its re-admission; if it is in the Union, neither Mr. Lincoln, nor any number of Lincolns, including the whole population of this continent, excepting the actual voters in this State, can say what shall or shall not be in the Constitution of Louisiana, so long as its laws do not conflict with the Constitution and laws of the Government of which it forms a part. This is the doctrine of State Rights.

In no part of the South is there so general a belief in Foreign intervention as there is in this State. It obtains widely among the Anglo-Americans as well as with the French and Spanish Creoles, and they look for intervention by France and Spain, and not by England. Of course, there are no organs here expressive of Southern opinion on this subject. The South has warm and earnest advocates, who can use their pens and reach the public better in London, Paris, and at the North than they can here. But there is much thought, much talk, and earnest consultation and comparison of ideas on this and other Confederate topics in the clubs and social coteries of this city. It is believed by several of the advocates of Southern independence that intervention could never come so long as the South successfully resisted the armies of the North. Defeat alone would induce foreign Governments to step in and compel the North to let the South alone.

So far as the Federal lines extend in the Southern States they mark lines of devastation only. In this State, from the mouth of the Mississippi to Port Hudson, from New Orleans to Red River, along the line of Butler's march through Lafourche, and Banks's advance through the Attakapas to Alexandria, the whole country is a ruined waste; the plantations are devastated; the crops destroyed; the horses, mules, and negroes stolen or carried away; everything that could not be removed has been destroyed. It is a literal fulfilment of the Apocalyptic picture of Death in advance, and Hell following after. It has been and will be so wherever the Federal army plants its feet. Yet the pious prater at Washington, the "government" as it is called, which is wholly engaged in schemes for making presidents, and which carries on the war solely for political purposes, to enrich a horde of shoddy contractors, and to fill countless offices, civil and military, with political friends, tells the world that it is engaged in the noble work of restoring the integrity of the Union.

So long ago as May 16, 1861, only a month after Sumter, Mr. W. H. Russell's "Diary North and South," records his view of "Union Principles," which were then, in that early stage of the war for "restoration," "rapidly becoming the mere expression of a desire to destroy life, liberty, property, anything in fact which opposes itself to the consolidation of the Federal Government." The destruction of the South, as well as her institutions, was deliberately premeditated. There is so much cant about the immense amount of civilisation, of Christianity, and of refinement which is to come from the North in place of the "barbarism of slavery," that it is well enough to show how much of this sort of thing—this refining of the South—has already been effected.

After Admiral Farragut had taken New Orleans, and when the presence of his fleet rendered it safe for Butler to approach, this "General," as he has been called—a "General" who was never in but one engagement, and that was when he was kicked into a ditch by a workman whom he insulted, not three months ago, in Lowell, Massachusetts—came to the city and was duly proclaimed by his understrappers, his shoulder-strappers, by sundry Northern papers, and by himself, as "the second Jackson, the Hero of New Orleans." He at once commenced a career which would have put Barabbas to the blush. His proclamations, his promises, his reports to his Government, his statements with regard to what he had done and what he would do for New Orleans, were as false as his lying tongue and pen and heart could make them. He robbed private houses; he robbed planters; he imprisoned men who have lain in Port Jackson and Fort Pickens, who have basked on the barren sands of Ship Island for more than a year past, (and who have just been released by General Banks), without even making a single charge against them; he insulted ladies in the vilest manner; he is reported, in one instance, to have broken open a tomb to see if it secreted money; he stole horses; he stole silver, sugar, cotton, negroes, anything and everything he could lay hands upon; he came here a beggar, and after nine months' residence he went away with a private and stolen fortune that is estimated at from two millions to five millions of dollars.

He is one of the refined, and civilised, and Christian reformers and restorers from the North. His Government knows the entire extent of his villanies in this department. Its estimate of him is sufficiently evident from the fact that this same Butler came very near bullying his Government into appointing him at the head of its list of Major-Generals; and he is one of the favourite candidates of the refined and civilised North for the Presidency of the States that are united enough to hold the next election.

His followers, as a general thing, were like him in a less degree. They were thieves or speculators to a man, almost. There was scarcely an officer, hardly a soldier, who did not think he had a right to plunder the planters, to rob houses in the city, to commit all sorts of outrages; and they generally behaved as uncivilised conquerors in a conquered country. They ceased stealing when there was nothing more to steal. You can judge something of the peculiar morality they introduced, from what I have already written of the perfectly polluting character of the soldiers' intercourse with the negroes in this department. The city has not materially improved in "morality"—indeed, everything touched by the army of refinement is smitten with corruption.

That Banks's army, which followed and was added to what was left of Butler's, is not quite so bad, is in some respect due to the fact that General Banks himself is a totally different being from Butler. He is a politician, but not a common thief. His followers are lesser thieves than Butler's men, mainly because there is less to steal. But the official commission, the swindles, the outrages committed under so-called confiscations, and the attempt under a pretence of "patriotism" to plunder everything and everyone with whom they come in contact, is the distinguishing feature of this as well as of all the Federal armies. The Gulf army has been the worst, since of all the army corps it had the best field for plunder.

There is a little news; we have had two excitements in the city this week. Last Sunday evening, when the boat came down from Vicksburg with six hundred of the paroled Confederates, as usual, the levee was crowded with the thousands of secessionists who live in this "Union" city. The ladies went down, followed by basket-bearing servants, and carried all sorts of comforts, clothing, food, and so on, to the Confederates on board.

I do not know whether these demonstrations alarmed the Federals or not, but they were anxious and worried enough about it to order out a squadron of cavalry to clear the levee. It was one of those engagements in which the Federal arms are invariably crowned with success. A charge upon the women and children resulted in a complete rout of these formidable foes. It was pleasing, no doubt, to the Federal cavalry to see these panic-stricken women, many of them with children in their arms, flying in terror before the cavalry charge. It was another "battle of the handkerchiefs," another conquest of parasols, and was bravely performed by a portion of the men who were quite reluctant to make a third assault on Port Hudson.

The prisoners brought down on this boat were sent to Mobile and transferred to a Confederate boat near Fort Morgan under a truce-flag. Among the officers who went over were Major-General M. L. Smith and his staff officers—Lieut.-Col. Edward Ivy, Majors John G. Devereux, and J. F. Girault, Captains M. M. McDonald, and E. Hobart, and Lieut. G. Hobart Frost. It is announced that no more sick and wounded men will be brought down from Vicksburg at present. Whether this is because there are no more sick and wounded to bring, no more Mobilians, or because it is desirable to have no more "secessh demonstrations," or cavalry charges upon women and children in this "Union" city, we are not informed.

The boat returning from Mobile Bay brought a few papers and a little later Northern news (telegraphed from Richmond) than we had received by any other route. The Federal blockading fleet off Mobile included the gunboats Ossipee, Colorado, Kennebec, Kanawha, Panola, Arrostook, and Lackawana, and the Mobile newspapers continue to advertise foreign goods received via Nassau.

The second excitement was a general gobble of city negroes on Tuesday night. Last winter, a Mr. P. F. Moncosas came to this city under the following circumstances. He was found on board a sloop in Lake Pontchartrain by one of the Federal boats. He claimed to be a deserter from Madisonville. His sloop had been boarded, he said, by two Confederate officers who came out in a boat from shore; but a friendly boom swung round and knocked overboard the two officers. They were drowned. He was considered a suspicious character and was sent to the Custom House prison, where he was confined some weeks. By-and-by, over the lake came a flag-of-truce boat and demanded the delivery of this Moncosas, to be tried for the murder of the two Confederate officers. He was not given up, and for a long time the public has heard nothing of him till suddenly he appears as colonel of one of Banks's new negro regiments. The official Federal organ says that "Colonel Moncosas was the moving spirit" of this "dashing and brilliant raid upon the negroes." For a long while past, negroes already enlisted as officers and soldiers in the United States' army and ranking with their fellow white soldiers, have been employed in negro-catching and in dragging up negroes to the enlistment or conscription offices. Tuesday night, the entire police force was instructed to "gobble niggers." They picked up every stray negro in the streets; if these negroes showed passes from their masters they were laughed at and told to "come along;" the police broke into houses and searched for negro-servants hidden away. They woke up respectable citizens and attempted to search their houses; in the morning they carried away slaves that were going to and returning from market, in some cases dragging them from the sides of their masters, and in more than one instance arresting master and negro, because the master protested against the forcible abduction of his servant. Hundreds of blacks were thus gobbled, to be forced into a nigger army, to be crowded over as our fellow American citizens of African descent, who have nobly "volunteered" in our noble army, to be shoved into some other ditch, and to be slaughtered as they were at Port Hudson. All this by the law and order lovers, in a district expressly "excepted" in Lincoln's emancipation proclamation. But what are presidents, or proclamations, or laws, or rights, when, as General Banks's official organ says, Colonel Moncosas is the "moving spirit" in a negro raid?

I wonder if Gumbo and Sambo are finding out the exact amount of blessings their friends have brought them, and if they are duly thankful for the "liberty" which drags them from comfortable homes and sets them up as targets before Confederate batteries.

There were so many complaints made to General Banks about these outrages, that next night the police were ordered to arrest no negroes, and many of the slaves already gobbled were returned to their masters.

The line of railroad from Algiers to Brashear has been under repair since the Federals have been permitted to reoccupy Lafourche, and will be in running order again next week. The re-establishment of communication makes Banks almost as well off in travelling facilities as he was when he entered upon the command of the department last December.

The military situation in this department is unchanged since I wrote you last. There have been no movements excepting a gobbling expedition sent out from Port Hudson by Andrews. A small expedition consisting of a section of a battery, about 100 of Chickering's "Piano Cavalry," and 100 negroes, went into the country to steal negro "volunteers." They encountered a body of Logan's cavalry, and lost, after a very short skirmish, 50 negroes, about half the piano horsemen, and the two Sawyer guns of the battery. The rest went back to Port Hudson with no negro recruits to atone for the negroes and whites lost in the excursion.

Mr. George C. Lawrason, who has been confined in Fort Pickens fourteen months, has been released, and is informed (as usual in these cases) that there is no charge against him. I believe all the Fort Pickens Butler prisoners have been or will be released, as well as those in Fort Jackson, and the Ship Island prisoners who have been brought to this city. They will all go into the Confederacy or go abroad.

Banks has published Halleck's thanks to him and to his army for the great things done at Port Hudson. It says not a word about the navy, which is utterly ignored by all the so-called military men. Yet were it not for the gunboats that lie in the river, neither General Banks, his staff, his soldiers, nor his niggers could remain in this city over Sunday (to-morrow). In giving Halleck's order of thanks, Banks's organ says that when the army "invested Port Hudson, it was scarcely stronger, numerically, than the force inside the rebel works." This is to smooth over the failure to take the place in two desperate assaults, and to glorify Banks's army. Now the same paper states that at the battle of the Plains which occurred the day before the "investment" (May 21), the exact force inside Port Hudson was 6,113 men. If Banks's force was "scarcely stronger, numerically," as he left Brashear City with more than 20,000 men, he must have lost, according to his own official organ's statement, about 14,000 men before the assaults of May 27 and June 14, when he is reported to have lost four or five thousand more. I should not suppose Banks's losses were so very enormous, but as the official organ says it, it must be true, of course.

Confederate money, which is the subject of more or less private speculation in this city, has advanced 4 per cent. during the week.

Her Majesty's gunboat Styx has arrived at this port to take the place of the Cygnet, which has gone to Havannah.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

MANCHESTER, September 2.

At a meeting of delegates from the various Southern Associations in Lancashire, a resolution has been unanimously carried in favour of drawing up a memorial to Earl Russell, urging him to make known to the Federal Cabinet the grief, indignation, and horror with which the English Government and people regard the excesses of the Northern soldiery—first, in their murderous attacks upon non-combatants; secondly, in their cruel spoliation and destruction of private property, especially implements of husbandry; and, thirdly, in their more than barbarous treatment of the defenceless women and children of the South. These unparalleled outrages upon civilised warfare will, I believe, be so set forth that there is some reason to hope the Foreign Secretary may not think it inconsistent even with the cold policy of neutrality to found a suitable remonstrance upon them. In any event the delegates will have done their duty to the several towns they represent, and with the Government will rest the responsibility of disregarding an opportunity of speaking a word in season, and of giving timely effect to Mr. Gladstone's promise that our policy, though a policy of neutrality, should also be a policy of watchfulness and observation, and certainly not a policy of heartlessness or indifference. If these words were anything more than a voice—unless when Mr. Gladstone uttered them he meant to keep them only to the ear and break them to the hope—then Lancashire may safely count upon all his influence in the Cabinet in securing for our memorial a favourable acceptance and—please God!—not a wholly unsuccessful issue. Don't let us again be met with the convenient argument of inopportune. That argument can always be stretched so as to seem to fit. But surely all times are seasons for asking mercy for the fatherless and the widow, the more so when England has stayed her hand and bated her breath until one of earth's fairest regions, peopled by our own kith and kin, may be likened to the roll of the prophet, which was "written within and without, and there was written therein lamentations and mourning and woe."

An extremely interesting "evening," which partook rather of the character of an influentially attended conversation than a political gathering, has just been held here, Commander Maury, who is now visiting some friends in the North of England, having accepted an invitation to meet a party of gentlemen in this city. The present position and future prospects of the Confederacy were hopefully and temperately discussed. The only other subject brought prominently under consideration was a statement recently made at a meeting of the Central Relief Committee, by the chairman of the Cotton Supply Association (Mr. E. Ashworth), relative to the probable supply of cotton in 1864. According to Mr. Ashworth's calculations, which the Earl of Derby has cautiously characterised as most important if the data were correct, our next year's supply is to be sufficient to keep all our mills at work four and a half days a week. Our cotton spinners say it would not take much to show that, whatever might have been the intended political value of such a statement, analytically it resolves itself into three parts: conjecture, and the remainder moonshine. But even if we give Mr. Ashworth credit for the increase he promises us of 650,000 bales—being an increase at the prodigious rate of upwards of 40 per cent. in one year—it can be proved by the plainest figures, as was argued at the reunion I have referred to, that the result would not average even three days' working a week. And while the grass is thus doubtfully left to make growth, let us take a thought how it is faring with the horse.

Much has been said, and more has been hinted, as to the moral deterioration which two years of enforced idleness and subsistence on alms are producing in the Lancashire character. That this is as yet happily a calumny, so far as the better portion of our unemployed operatives are concerned, others besides optimists may rejoice to believe. But who can deny that the most predisposing cause of what may be called a malady is in pernicious existence, and that the longer it remains the more insidiously will it do its work? That too many have unfortunately succumbed, is only too clear from what is repeatedly passing before our eyes. At the last meeting, for instance, of the Manchester Board of Guardians, a deputation was received from a large body of people who based a claim for an exceptionally liberal scale of relief upon the proposition that they were "exceptionally poor," but, by a curious coincidence, the very spokesman of the memorialists had to admit upon examination that, as times go, he was exceptionally well off. In point of fact, from various sources of relief, he was in receipt of 13s. 3d. a week. It is to be hoped that his exceptional character did not end here, but that the whole man was a highly exceptional representative of his co-memorialists. He stood detected but unabashed; and as it may do the Government some good to chew the cud of what he said in his defence, here it is, in two versions:—

Hart said that when human nature was reduced low by want, morals became low in proportion.—Manchester Guardian report, August 21.

Mr. Hart said it was only to be expected from human nature that when the means of subsistence were reduced to the lowest point, morals would sink also.—Examiner and Times report, August 21.

A course of culture known as "the Distress" has evidently forced this poor fellow into a sort of unsuccessful begging-letter impostor. His is the moral dishonesty of the scarcely reluctant pauper who, seeing no way out of his pauperism, has been tempted to turn it to "commodity," and, so to speak, eke it out with itself. But take another case—not this time, of a weak man who possibly yielded up his manhood without much of a struggle, but of a band of strong men desperately bent upon bursting their bonds, and sticking at nothing—not even at forgery—to rid themselves at once of their pauperism and of their country. These men, or rather three of them—for only three were arrested, although many others were said to be in the same predicament—were dragged a few days ago from the deck of the Fiery Star, off Queenstown, bound for Queensland, the charge against them being that they had fraudulently procured their passages by forging signatures to certain certificates necessary to render them eligible as emigrants under the auspices of the Emigration Aid Committee. They were brought back to Manchester, and, after a few words of caution and sympathy from the bench, they were discharged.

The magistrates considered that the ends of justice had been met by preventing the men from sailing. It also appeared on the unfortunate fellows' behalf that they had been grossly swindled by the self-constituted secretary of a so-called "Overlookers Emigration Society," to whom, as they said, they had paid over every penny in their possession, and at whose instance the forgeries were committed. One of the prisoners boldly stated in his defence that he thought there was no harm in what had been done, inasmuch as the secretary (who has since absconded) had told him it was a mere matter of form, "and lots of certificates had been signed the same way." It may be added that all the prisoners, who appeared to have borne good characters as people struggling to lead respectable lives, were married men with families, their wives and children being left in Cork, while their baggage is on its way to Brisbane.

While I am yet writing another crop of scandal springs up. A member of one of our relief committees (St. Michael's) has been sent for trial on a charge of plundering the funds, under circumstances which betray a peculiar refinement in villany. According to the evidence already adduced, his offences are legion, but the most hateful are those in perpetrating which he traded upon the sensitiveness of a certain class of recipients of relief, who shrink from accepting aid in the form of a pauper's dole. His story to grocers, butchers, flour-dealers, &c., was, that he had been specially entrusted by the committee to lay in a quantity of stores, to be distributed from time to time among such respectable individuals as, on account of their previous position, might not like to receive money. Upon these highly considerate terms he obtained goods during the last nine months, paying for them in relief cheques, which he failed to account for. He also paid his own workmen—in fact, kept house and carried on business—from the same or similar means of income. A very pretty story this to get away the operatives, who, in all conscience, are sufficiently beset with temptation without the addition of such precepts and such examples! There is one more class of cases to which I had intended to refer, but the following letter read at the last meeting of the City Board will indicate their nature and save space:—

"Dear Sir,—I am writing to you as Chairman of the Board of Guardians respecting a gross case of imposition upon either the relief fund or parochial relief. I engaged three men from Manchester as self-acting minders for my mill here, at 12s. a week, until I could find roving to put them on piece work, when they could have earned from 18s. to 24s. a week. They have been boasting to my old workmen that they have been receiving, and are still getting, 9s. a week in the shape of relief from Manchester, and making money in other ways, so as to make it better worth their while to remain idle in Manchester; and have left the mill to-day in consequence. It is quite time to put a stop to this sort of imposition; and, if they have relief from your Board, I hope you will stop it; if from Chorlton, I shall feel obliged if you will give their names in and hand this letter over to the Guardians.—I am yours truly,

F. S. BATESON.

"I am spinning Egyptian cotton, and the spinning is good. The wages are the same as the Preston list; so that they can have no excuse of low wages or bad spinning."

Although undue stress should not be laid upon these and such other isolated cases of wrongdoing, they are undoubtedly of too frequent occurrence to be wholly disregarded. Whether or not deterioration is wide spread or of any vicious type, we have abundant symptoms of its appearance amongst us. The sentiment may come ill from Hart's mouth, but it is cruel, unless inevitable, to put human nature to such a strain. Small blame possibly to many of those who at length fall! but, alas, the less the blame, the more the pity.

THE AGGRESSIVE POWER OF THE YANKEES.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—Mr. Senior, having conversed during the last month with Americans of both parties (he no doubt means with both Yankees and Southerners), finds them unanimous in asserting that if England permits two vessels now building on the Mersey to "go forth to prey on Federal commerce," their "escape" will produce a war with the North. His Federal friends tell him so; such, they say, will be the indignation of the Northern people, that they will force Messrs. Lincoln and Seward to declare war against us. Moreover, it appears that we have not a moment to lose: the escape of the vessels "is a matter not of months, perhaps not of days, not even of hours." Then war will be certain. England is on the brink of a terrible precipice; Mr. Senior sees the danger, which is so imminent that he will not even wait the return of post from Paris for Mr. Dayton's permission to publish some minutes of a private conversation which he had in May last with that "distinguished Federal statesman," but lays it before the public in the Times of Monday last to warn the Government in time, and induce it to telegraph at once to Liverpool to prevent these vessels "escaping," and thereby save England from the otherwise certain onslaught of the terrible Yankees. For are not Mr. Dayton's last words to Mr. Senior these? But before quoting them I beg to express my conviction of Mr. Senior's strict fidelity as a reporter of them. I believe I am as good a judge of a Yankee as any one, and the turn and style of Mr. Dayton, as reported by Mr. Senior, is so true that I would vouch for the accuracy of every word, and I can even fancy the peculiar smile which came over Mr. Dayton's features after the distinguished Britisher had departed.

Here are the words:—

"Your municipal law has not sufficient detective power. Then give it that power. You are not, as we are, bound by a Constitution. Your Parliament is omnipotent. If it is not skilful enough to invent a law which shall enable such atrocities to be detected and prevented, let it copy the law which we passed for that purpose, and which was sufficient. If you refuse to do this, and in consequence of your negligence, or of your self-inflicted impotence, these ironides escape and plunder us, the American people, irritated enough already, will be ungovernable. You have seen enough of them to know that their resentment is not under the control of their interests. They will really become as mad as your French friends call them. They will be quite ready to ruin themselves in order to ruin you."

Here is indeed a horrible prospect. We have Mr. Dayton's assurance that if our Government suffers these vessels to escape, the Yankees will be quite ready to ruin themselves in order to ruin us. Mr. Senior could hardly avoid acquainting his fellow-countrymen with the fearful fact.

Mr. Senior is a political economist of high repute. Political economy, as a science, is as new as that of geology, but the subject-matter of the one is as old as human society, of the other as old as the earth. But political economy is not yet old enough, as a science, to be employed by such statesmen and historians as figure on the European stage at presents as a key to unlock the mysteries of wars and revolutions that have passed, or as a guide to forecast wars and revolutions that are to come. At any rate, I have not remarked in Mr. Senior's writings any indication that he has given much attention to the connection between the political and military condition of nations, and some well-established truths of political economy. He has written learnedly on wages. He sees how dangerous it is, socially, to interfere between operative and employer, but he does not see what political consequences have ensued from violating the principles of political economy in the matter of wages—he does not see that such political power as the Yankees have achieved has been entirely founded upon our having violated those principles, nor what losses and disgraces have ensued to us from the violation in respect to the Yankees. The British marine operative was always as ready to work on board a vessel of war as on a merchantman, but he naturally required as good wages in one employ as the other. It did not suit the statesmanship of our pilots in the last war to pay him at this rate. They preferred robbing him of one-third of his just wages, and for this object they employed the press-gang. I calculate that they may have, apparently, saved about £300,000 per annum during the last war by this statesmanship. They created the Yankee commercial marine in consequence, provoked a war which cost us very many millions more than had been saved in wages, and in which the very men whose personal and pecuniary rights we had despotically outraged, fought against us with the most intense hatred, and inflicted on the British flag all the disgraces that it endured.

I will now invite Mr. Senior to weigh and measure the elements of Yankee power, and when he has made a catalogue of them it might not be amiss if he were to revisit Paris for the purpose of comparing his estimates with Mr. Dayton's. Perhaps at the end of this interview he may find himself less disturbed than on the last occasion, and bring back more comforting information for his fellow-countrymen.

I classify, roughly, the late United States in three divisions, productively. There is the South, producing raw exportable produce in cotton, tobacco, turpentine, &c., &c.; whose market is Europe, and which has no more commercial or financial connection, naturally, with Boston or New York, than with Pekin or Timbuctoo. There is the West, producing raw exportable produce in corn and meat, whose market, as far as its produce is exportable, is Europe; the way to this market lies through Canada and the Mississippi, the carriage of this produce is, as far as the ocean is concerned, naturally on European-owned ships, and, should the South succeed in securing its independence and betake itself again to the cultivation of cotton, the West will once more (but not otherwise) find a market for a portion of its corn and meat in the South. Thirdly (and casting out for reasons which it is too long to give here, the States of Maryland, Delaware, and Pennsylvania), there remains the Yankee division proper, in which I comprehend the States of New York and New Jersey.

Now, the first thing for Mr. Senior to do is to make an accurate list of the nature, quantity, and quality of the various exportable produce which Yankeland naturally produces, and, after having verified it in conference with Mr. Dayton and other Yankees of equal "talents, knowledge, and calmness," (and such persons will not, I think, be very difficult to meet with—at least, I have met with them by the hundred in Yankeland), to lay it before us. This estimate will constitute and be that of one element of Yankee aggressive power (and Mr. Senior will particularly observe that I do not say of Yankee defensive power)—but of that aggressive power of which we now stand, in his alarmed imagination, in such imminent danger. Before passing to any other element, I need hardly remark to Mr. Senior, who is a political economist, that he should be on the watch lest his Yankee friends should here and there foisted into the list some artificial product of Yankeeism, as if it were one capable of being produced to compete in the open market of the world, while, in reality, it is only exportably producible with a profit under the protective and high tariff system in a forced market. I would not, however, exclude the article of salt fish as a natural Yankee product; and when he has ascertained the quantity of this annually exported from Yankeeism, he will be justified in allowing it all fair weight.

The next element in Mr. Senior's list will be the number of indigenous Yankee sailors (and from this number he will exclude the Marylanders and the Pennsylvanians), and then the whole number of sailors of all nations employed in the Yankee mercantile marine in 1860, and then the number employed at present in that marine and in their ships of war, distinguishing English sailors, whether naturalized or not, and Scandinavian, from the whole aggregate number.

The next element in the list will be the Yankee mercantile marine. What will be the amount of tonnage they will possess when they will not be able to employ any more than will be necessary for the exports of Yankee produce proper, comprehending the produce of their fisheries, and when the Pennsylvanians shall export their own petroleum, and some other of their own peculiar products, in their own ships? This amount of tonnage can only be estimated approximately and conjecturally, but Mr. Senior will be on his guard against the sanguine imaginations of his "calm, talented, and knowing" Yankee friends, no doubt, in all that is conjectural and approximative, and as I have had to negotiate personally with a very great number of Yankees on what was peculiarly approximative and conjectural, perhaps I could myself lend him a little assistance on this point, in judging of the value generally due to their peculiar mode of calculating. For they are a peculiar people, as they admit themselves.

When Mr. Senior shall have measured and weighed these elements of Yankee aggressive power, and have carefully placed the results on paper, I would suggest his taking a hasty survey of the elements that constitute English aggressive power, and then proceeding as rapidly as he can (should there only be time before the Yankees declare war) to Washington for the purpose of comparing notes with Mr. Seward, for he will find that gentleman thoroughly master of the whole subject,—so thoroughly that when he shall have merely cast his eye over Mr. Senior's "Statement of the Elements of Yankee aggressive Power," Mr. Senior will find himself relieved from all fear that Mr. Seward will ever willingly expose the Yankee sham to the shock of the English reality.

Nevertheless, I allow that there is some danger that the thorough ignorance of the general Yankee public as to their own positive and relative aggressive power, fostered as it has been by the contemptible deference that our official men and our public writers have always shown to their self-assertion, combining with their natural brutality and rashness, may lead some Wilkes or Cassius Clay to do some act that must render a war inevitable. We have meanly manifested all the appearance of fearing them, and they have talked themselves into a conviction that we are afraid of them. That is certainly the condition in which they are—they believe us to be both fools and cowards, and judging, us by those rules and motives of action which guide them themselves, they are no doubt justified in this belief. Hence the danger; and I believe there really is some.

This is the way to avert it. The first step is to denounce, by royal proclamation, the impressment tyranny, and to declare it for ever abolished. Some people may think this superfluous, since the present generation of sailors can have no experience, and consequently no fear of it. But such persons know little of the moral effects of tradition on classes of men that are insulated, separated from general society, peculiar, and ignorant. De Tocqueville said that the peasantry near him still bore dislike to the gentry on account of the ancient droit de seigneur in respect of dove-cotes, though two whole generations had been called into existence since that right had been exercised. Impressment was a great crime, it ought to be so proclaimed, and it ought morally to be atoned for. It was as great—nay, a greater crime than the African impressment called slavery. The English sailor was a skilled operative of the highest order in a dangerous profession. You robbed him of the just reward of his skill, you seized his person, you doubted his dangers, and you treated him while a prisoner with cruel barbarity. Tradition preserves the remembrance of this injustice and iniquity among the sailors of to-day, and will long preserve it.

The next step is to prepare ourselves thoroughly for immediate action should the Yankees provoke it, and to let it be clearly understood that we are so preparing ourselves.

The third thing is to show that we really know, not merely our own strength, but the reality of Yankee weakness.

These measures will be sufficient, I think, to avert the danger of war as originating from the side of the Yankees.

But I wish to make it as widely known as possible that in the year 1841 that eminent soldier, the late Sir William Napier, proposed two plans, the object of which was to effect the total destruction of the United States as a Power having any military weight among the Powers of the world, and that he sent them both into the War-Office in that year. He showed me the answer from Lord Fitzroy Somerset, acknowledging the receipt of each of them. Sir William greatly preferred his second plan, for several reasons; one among which was that it completely nonplussed the Yankees about Canada. It would have reduced the Yankees in less than two years to a worse predicament than that in which they stand at present, and the application of it is infinitely more easy at present, in consequence of the glorious secession of the South.

As I saw in the handwriting of Lord Fitzroy Somerset that this plan would be carefully preserved in the "archives" (that was his Lordship's expression) of the War-Office, it ought to be accessible now.

HON. WILLIAM LOWNDES YANCEY.

THE journals announce the death at Montgomery, (Alabama), on the 28th ult., of William L. Yancey, well known as one of the leading spirits in the movements for Southern Independence, and recently in England as one of the first Commissioners of the Southern Confederacy in Europe. He is said to have been born in 1815, and, therefore, to have been at the time of his death about forty-eight years of age. From my own recollections of him I should have taken him to be older. The disease of which he died is not mentioned. He was for a long time subject to periodical attacks of chronic complaints, which several times caused him to withdraw from public life. His earnest and incessant labours in behalf of the South have probably worn him out. He had that heroic, impulsive, and unselfish nature of which martyrs are made.

Mr. Yancey was born in South Carolina, and studied law there, under Daniel E. Huger, a lawyer of great eminence, and in other respects among the ablest men in a State at that time abounding in remarkable men. It was at the period of that memorable struggle between the State of South Carolina and the Federal Government, in the Presidency of General Jackson, in which the State denied the constitutionality of protective laws, and organized resistance on Mr. Calhoun's theory of nullification within the Union. Mr. Huger was a zealous Unionist, and a determined opponent of the theory of State Rights and the remedy of nullification, as taught by Mr. Calhoun. These questions were keenly debated all over the South, but the great body of politicians and orators discouraged all practical agitation of them, in the vague confidence that for the preservation of the Union political parties would always so regulate and restrain the administration of Federal powers that a resort to any unusual measure for State protection would never be necessary. It is a remarkable sign of the rapid and thorough change which a few years effected in this respect, that within twenty-five years thereafter Mr. Yancey, the pupil of Mr. Huger, and every descendant of Mr. Huger himself, had learned to despair of the Union and finally to renounce it. Mr. Yancey died, Senator in the Southern Confederacy; and Mr. Huger's sons, grandsons and kindred are all in the Confederate service, some of them high in the ranks of the Confederate army.

I think it was at Wetumpka, in Antauga county, that Mr. Yancey first settled himself in the practice of the law, in Alabama. In 1843 he had already become prominent as a politician, and edited a weekly Democratic newspaper, which wielded some influence in that district, which had long been represented in Congress by Dixon H. Lewes, a devoted friend of Mr. Calhoun. Mr. Calhoun then had a large party in Alabama which desired his nomination for the Presidency, to succeed Mr. Tyler. When Mr. Van Buren succeeded General Jackson in 1837, Mr. Calhoun, with a large portion of Southern supporters, had joined the Democratic party, and supported Mr. Van Buren for re-election, in which he failed. During the succeeding Administration old differences were forgotten, and Mr. Yancey attached himself to that portion of the Democrats who desired the nomination of Mr. Calhoun; but on his taking his name from the list of candidates worked for the election of Mr. Polk. With Mr. Polk as President, William R. King, of Alabama, was elected Vice-President. Mr. Dixon H. Lewes succeeded to Mr. King's seat in the Senate, and Mr. Yancey was elected in place of Mr. Lewes to the House of Representatives, in which he served for the remainder of that term and for a full term of two years afterwards, when he declined a re-election. His course in the House was modelled after that of Mr. Calhoun in the Senate, which during those years was exceedingly Conservative. Mr. Yancey took a very conciliatory course towards England in the Oregon dispute, and spoke and voted against the giving of the notice of the termination of the treaty agreement for joint occupation. He was with Mr. Calhoun, too, in the rational views of that statesman, on the subject of the "Monroe doctrine," which was then paraded as a national pledge to exclude Great Britain from this Continent. Mr. Calhoun had been Secretary of War in the Cabinet of Mr. Monroe, and had a right to know, what he asserted to be true, that the celebrated declaration in the message of 1823 was a stroke of policy concerted with Great Britain, Mr. Canning then being Prime Minister, for a temporary purpose, and that it was never intended to have, by possibility, the arrogant and ambitious character which has been assigned to it by demagogues. During his service in the House he was involved in a personal difficulty with Mr. Clingman, of North Carolina, which resulted in a bloodless duel. The Penal Code of Alabama makes duelling a criminal offence, for which, in addition to other punishment, the penalty was disfranchisement; and a bill was accordingly introduced into the Legislature of the State to relieve him from the penalties of the law. The Governor at the time shelved the bill, for various reasons, among the best of which was that Mr. Yancey was not liable to the penalty, the offence having been committed beyond the jurisdiction of the State.

On leaving Congress Mr. Yancey carried home with him a deepened distrust of the good faith of any of the Northern parties towards the South. His efforts were then directed, out of office, to the organizing of the Democratic party of the South—to operate on the national organization of the party—so as to make the recognition and defence of Southern rights, in respect to slavery, an unmistakable article of the party faith. With that object he went to the State Democratic Convention in 1848, and laboured to secure the appointment of delegates to the Baltimore Nominating Convention of that year favourable to the nomination for the Presidency of Judge Levi Woodbury, of New Hampshire—a statesman in whom the Southern people had a great deal of confidence. But Mr. Buchanan's friends had a majority in the Convention, and prevented the nomination. Mr. Yancey was sent a delegate to Baltimore, but was outvoted there by his colleagues, who preferred Mr. Buchanan, but acquiesced in the nomination of General Cass. Mr. Yancey was overruled too in the Convention, by the rejection of his resolution denouncing the theory of what has since been called "squatter sovereignty," which asserted the right of the people of a Territory, before organized into a State, to vote slavery out of it. Of this doctrine General Cass was the reputed author. The Convention refused to censure it, in order not to embarrass General Cass's prospects in the North; and his friends argued at the South that he did not hold it. Mr. Yancey was very much discontented, and expressed his discontent in a long and bitter pamphlet, which involved him in controversies with some of his colleagues. It was said at the time that he actually voted for General Taylor, the successful competitor of General Cass; but the better opinion is, that he abstained from voting and took no part in the canvass. He remained in private life, and for a good part of the time in ill-health, until the rapid spread of the anti-slavery manifestations in the North, and the development, in 1856, of the immense hold which the sectional party had gained over nearly the entire North, created a profound sensation all over the South, and stirred up the leading minds there to anxious inquiry for the means of averting the catastrophe with which they were threatened. The conviction was nearly universal that the Presidential election of 1860 would finally test whether the administration of the General Government could be so reformed by constitutional means that the South could remain safely in the Union. It came to be the belief of a great body of the more advanced Southern men, and Mr. Yancey was of them, that no effort would succeed; but very many in the South, as resolute as Mr. Yancey in the determination not to submit unresistingly to the ruin which menaced them, still clung to a lingering hope that a successful presidential contest, by keeping the executive power out of the hands of their enemies, might open a way to a peaceable adjustment within the Union. The North was fairly warned that the South could not live under the dominion which the election of Mr. Lincoln would establish in the Government; and the South was counselled to prepare for self-protection if that evil day should come. The same language in substance was held by the Southern men who went to the Democratic Convention in Charleston, and those who went to the Conservative Convention at Baltimore. There was but one language,—that the time for a final settlement of these controversies, if they were ever to be settled by peaceful means, had come with the election of 1860. In this last effort to save the Union Mr. Yancey was conspicuous, and laboured with as much zeal as though he had hopes. He was of that resolute party who went to the Charleston Convention in 1860 with fair notice of their determination not to be put off with equivocal resolutions or a doubtful candidate. They found the North impracticable; it would concede nothing which offered them any guarantee for the future, and pressed upon them a candidate from whom they shrunk as one whose position was offensive to them, and whose election would weaken them only a little less than that of the Abolition candidate. The Convention was hopelessly split on that point, but the earnest men of the South would not be contented without a plain issue, for a right understanding of their position. They nominated a representative man as their candidate, and Mr. Yancey went on their part to expound throughout the North the Southern purpose, to treat the result of the coming election as decisive of their relations towards the Union. He was heard by immense crowds; they were won to a reluctant applause of his oratory, but his warnings were disbelieved or unheeded. The power of passionate conviction of right with which he defended the cause of the South before its enemies, and the earnestness and fervour with which he pleaded for a Union such as the South could live in without ruin and dishonour, drew cheers of admiration from those who had come to revile; but all failed to move the stubborn resolve of the Northern people to exercise their numerical superiority in their own way, and risk the consequences. They triumphed, of course, and Mr. Yancey's warning words came to be prophecies, accomplished sooner than they dreamed of. Differences on questions of expediency disappeared in the South, before the reality of the peril. The rapid development of the rancorous purposes which the new party carried into power, speedily swept away every vestige of Southern hopefulness in the relenting of the North, and the Southern mind consolidated itself into the conviction that there was no honour nor chance of safety except in total separation from the North.

They do not read history right who allege that this was the work of Mr. Yancey, and such as he, who by persistent labours educated the people up to the point of disunion. The merit of Mr. Yancey is that he studied the logic of history and read the character of the conflict and the nature of his countrymen so well as to be able to foresee and announce, while they were unheeding, the inevitable effects of the causes he saw at work, and strove unavailingly to remove. When the storm he foretold came upon them, he is not to be chided for having opened the gates for the floods which howled about them, but rather to be held in higher reverence that he had warned them to build up defences for themselves against the evils to come. And so it has been. In less than six months after the election of Mr. Lincoln hundreds of true men who had for years derided his voice as the croaking of an unquiet spirit, wounding the public ear with idle alarms, were ranged around him as their leader, only wiser than they; and hundreds and thousands more are testifying the same recantation with swords in their hands, or in the dungeons of the North.

Under the Confederacy, Mr. Yancey was selected to go abroad with the first commissioners sent to Europe to represent the claims of the new Government to recognition. The failure of that mission is well known, as are the causes. On his return, he took his seat in the Confederate Senate. What figure he made there is not known outside of the Confederacy. Little has been heard of him at all, until this notice of his death.

In this rapid notice of Mr. Yancey's connection with the Southern cause it is not meant to exalt him as a man of great intellectual power or of commanding influence. He was the eloquent advocate rather than the original thinker. It is doubtful whether he had any administrative capacity, or nature ever had destined him to live in peaceful times and take part in the business of government. He was unrivalled as an intellectual partizan, dexterous in debate, imperturbable when under any excitement, and possessed of a natural faculty of eloquence which made him a brilliant speaker, if not in the severe sense of the word an orator. The charm of his speeches lay in that most attractive quality which pervaded his whole character. He was a sincere man, and spoke with the always persuasive tongue of one thoroughly in earnest. His heart and his conscience were wholly in the Southern cause, and his time was given to it without a selfish thought or a moment's repining over the sacrifices it cost him. Simple in his tastes and habits, he struggled all his life with narrow fortunes, the res angustie domi; but the temptation of office never swerved him, nor was he ever suspected in the worst days of party violence of having done an act or shaped an opinion with a view to his own personal gain. His public life was that of an honest patriot, and his private life without reproach. He loved his native South with a changeless devotion, and he laid down his life for her as perfectly and as bravely as though he had perished in the trenches at Vicksburg.

A DARING ADVENTURE.

The Mobile Register of the 24th July publishes the following interesting letter from the father of Lamar Fontaine, author of "All quiet along the Potomac to-night:"—

Lamar is continually in the saddle, and employed in very hazardous enterprises. His last feat of arms was the most daring he has yet performed.

He left my house May 24th, under orders from General Johnston, to bear a verbal despatch to General Pemberton in Vicksburg, and to carry a supply of percussion caps to our troops in that besieged city. I parted with him, hardly hoping ever to see him again alive; for I knew that Vicksburg was closely invested on all sides. The enemy's lines of circumvallation extend from Snyder's Bluff on the Yazoo to Warrenton on the Mississippi, and the rivers and their opposite shores are filled and lined with their forces.

He was well mounted, but was burdened with forty pounds of percussion caps, besides his blanket and crutches. He has no use of his broken leg, and cannot walk a step without a crutch; and in mounting his horse he has to lift it over the saddle with his right hand. But he accomplishes this operation with much dexterity, and without assistance. I loaned him a very fine sabre with a wooden scabbard to prevent rattling, and a very reliable revolver, which has never missed fire when loaded by me.

The family were called together for prayer, and we prayed fervently that the God of our fathers would shield him from all danger, and enable him to fulfil his mission to Vicksburg successfully, and give him a safe return to us all. I then exhorted him to remember that if it was the will of God for him to live and serve his country, all the Yankees owned by Lincoln could not kill him; but if it was the Divine will that he should die, he would be in as much danger at home as in Vicksburg, and death would certainly find him, no matter where he might be. I charged him to use his best endeavours to kill every one of the jackals who should attempt to stop his course, or come within the reach of his sword or pistol.

He crossed Big Black river that night, and the next day got between their lines and the division of their army which was at Mechanicsburg. He hid his horse in a ravine, and ensconced himself in a fallen tree, overlooking the road, during that day. From his hiding-place he witnessed the retreat of the Yankees, who passed him in considerable haste and confusion. After their columns had gone by, and the night had made it safe for him to move, he continued his route in the direction of Snyder's Bluff. As he entered the telegraphic road from Yazoo City to Vicksburg, he was hailed by a picket, but dashed by him. A volley was fired at him by the Yankees. He escaped unhurt, but a Minié ball wounded his horse mortally. The spirited animal, however, carried him safely to the bank of the Yazoo river, where he died, and left him afoot. He lost one of his crutches in making his escape. This was jerked from him by the limb of a tree, and he had no time to pick it up.

With the assistance of one crutch he carried his baggage, and groped along the Yazoo until he providentially discovered a small log canoe, tied by a rope, within his reach. He pressed this into his service, and paddled down the river until he met three Yankee gunboats coming up to Yazoo City. He avoided them by running under some willows overhanging the water, and lying concealed until they passed. Soon afterwards he floated by Snyder's Bluff, which was illuminated, and alive with Yankees and negroes, participating in the amusement of a grand ball of mixed races. He lay flat in his canoe, which was nothing but a hollow log, and could hardly be distinguished from a piece of drift wood, and glided safely through the gunboats, transports, and barges of the amalgamationists. He reached the backwater of the Mississippi before day, and in the darkness missed the outlet of the Yazoo and got into what is called "Old River." After searching in vain for a pass into the Mississippi, day dawned, and he discovered his mistake. He was forced to conceal his boat and himself, and lie by for another day. He had been two days and nights without food, and began to suffer the pangs of hunger.

At night he paddled back into the Yazoo, and descended it to the Mississippi, passing forty or fifty of the Yankee transports. Only one man hailed him, from the stern of a steamboat, and asked him where he was going. He replied that he was going to his fishing lines. In the bend above Vicksburg he floated by the mortar fleet, lying flat in his canoe. The mortars were in full blast, bombarding the city. The next morning he tied a white handkerchief to his paddle, raised himself up in the midst of our picket boats at Vicksburg, and gave a loud huzza for Jeff Davis and the Southern Confederacy, amid the cries of our sailors, who gave him a joyful reception, and assisted him to General Pemberton's quarters.

After resting a day and night in the city, he started out with a despatch from General Pemberton to General Johnston. He embarked on his same canoe, and soon reached the enemy's fleet below the city. He avoided their picket boats on both shores, and floated near their gunboats. He passed so near one of those that through an open port-hole he could see men playing cards, and hear them converse. At Diamond Place he landed, and bade adieu to his faithful "dog-out." After hobbling through the bottom to the hills, he reached the residence of a man who had been robbed by the savages of all his mules and horses, except an old, worthless gelding and a half-broken colt. He gave him the choice of them, and he mounted the colt, but found that he travelled badly. Providentially, he came upon a very fine horse in the bottom, tied by a blind bridle, without a saddle. As a basket and an old bag were lying near him, he inferred that a negro had left him there, and that a Yankee camp was not far distant. He exchanged bridles, saddled the horse and mounted him, after turning loose the colt.

After riding so as to avoid the supposed position of the Yankees, he encountered one of the thieves, who was returning to it from a successful plundering excursion. He was loaded with chickens and a bucket of honey. He commenced catechising Lamar in true Yankee style, who concluded it best to satisfy his curiosity by sending him where he could know all that the devil could teach him. With a pistol bullet through his forehead, he left him, with his honey and poultry, lying in the path to excite the conjectures of his fellow-thieves.

He approached with much caution the next settlement. There he hired a guide for fifty dollars to pilot him to Hankerson's Ferry on Big Black River, which he wished to reach near that point without following any road. The fellow he hired proved to be a traitor. When he got near the ferry Lamar sent him ahead to ascertain whether any Yankees were in the vicinity. The conversation and manners of the man had excited his suspicions, and as soon as he left him he concealed himself, but remained where he could watch his return. He remained much longer than he expected, but returned and reported that the way was open, and that no Yankees were near the ferry. After paying him he took the precaution to avoid the ferry, and to approach the river above it, instead of following the guide's directions. By this he flanked a force of the Yankees posted to intercept him; but as he entered the road near the river bank, one of them, who seemed to be on the right flank of a long line of sentinels, suddenly rose up within ten feet of him and ordered him to halt. He replied with a pistol shot, which killed the sentinel dead, and wheeling his horse round, galloped through the bottom up the river, but the Yankees sent a shower of balls after him, two of which wounded his right hand, injuring four of his fingers. One grazed his right leg, cutting two holes through his pantaloons, and another cut through one side of my sword scabbard, spoiling its beauty, but leaving a mark which makes me prize it more highly. Seven bullets struck the horse, which reeled under him, but had strength and speed to bear him a mile from his pursuers before he fell and died. Lamar then divided his clothes and arms into packages, and swam Big Black River safely. He did not walk far before a patriotic lady supplied him with the only horse she had—a stray one, which came to her house after the Yankees had carried off all the animals belonging to the place. On this he reached Raymond at two o'clock in the morning, changed his horse for a fresh one, carried his despatch to Jackson that morning, and rejoined us all by an unexpected visit the same day.

IRONCLADS ON THE MERSEY.

Though it is well known that several ironclads are in course of construction in various parts of the kingdom for foreign Governments, and though one has already sailed for Russia and another for Denmark without occasioning surprise, the public suspect that any vessel of war built on the Mersey must be intended for the Confederate Government. For a considerable time past mysterious assertions have been circulated respecting two ironclads building in Messrs. Laird's yard, and the Federal spies have never lost sight of them. A few days ago it was currently reported and believed that one of these vessels had slipped away to sea clandestinely to join company with the Florida, off the Irish coast. That such was not the case a visit to Messrs. Laird's yard made evident. There at present lie the two suspected vessels side by side, with the French flag floating over the one nearest completion. Messrs. Laird make no mystery about El Tousson and El Mounassir, as the ships are named. They are undoubtedly built on French account, and it is understood that the French Vice-Consul has given the Collector of Customs satisfactory explanations respecting them. El Tousson, which was launched some time ago, will be ready for a trial trip in a month or six weeks. El Mounassir was only launched on Saturday, but already a portion of her machinery is on board. Perhaps there are not two more formidable frigates afloat. They are 230ft. over all, 42ft. beam, with 19ft. 6in. depth of hold. Tonnage, 1,850 o.m.; horse-power 350. They will combine speed with good sea-going qualities. They are very flat-bottomed, with exceedingly fine ends, and will sit low in the water. Their draught when loaded will be about 15 ft.; estimated speed, 11 knots. The stem is so formed that the vessel may be used as a ram, and the stern, which overhangs, affords protection to the screw and rudder from shot or collisions. The rig is that of a bark, the masts, which are telescopic, and the lower yards, being of iron. The armour-plating on the sides of the vessel is 4½ inches thick amidships, and rather less at the ends. The plates, the joining of which together is imperceptible, are fitted into a teak backing of great strength. The deck is of 5in. teak protected with iron. The bulwarks let down in case of action, in order to allow the turret guns to fire over them. They have two cylindrical turrets on Captain Coles' principle—one before and the other abaft the engine-room, heavily plated. These turrets are made for two guns each. The pilot-house is formed of teak and iron. At either end of the vessel, are raised decks, which afford excellent accommodation for the officers and crew. In the captain's cabin provision is made for two heavy stern guns, and heavy guns can be trained from the forecastle deck. These vessels have capacity for 300 tons of coal. All the machinery is below the water line. Several experienced naval officers who have inspected the vessels have expressed opinions most gratifying to their designers.—The Times.

SACKING A SOUTHERN CITY.

The Daily Express (Petersburg, Virginia) of August 5 quotes from the Atlanta Appeal the following account of the sacking of Clinton, Louisiana, by the Federals:—

They arrested the citizens and took them to the Masonic Hall, leaving none but the women and children at the houses, and where there was no one the houses and everything in them were broken open and examined, and when anything suited the fancy or taste of the searcher he appropriated it. From some houses they took every suit of gentlemen's clothes, and wherever a gold or silver watch was found it was pocketed. Many ladies' breastpins found their way into the pockets of the Illinois cavalry. Under the pretext of searching for arms, they broke open every store and office in the town, scattering the goods and papers in every direction, and loading some of them in waggon. The windows and show cases were ruthlessly smashed.

Some of the soldiers rode their horses into the stores and into some of the offices. The officers in command could not fail to see this, and knew that their men were pillaging the town. A great many of the men urged the negroes, wherever they met them, to run away, and some they forced to go. They burned the depot and machine shops, and the machinery of the Louisiana penitentiary stationed here.

With pistols in hand, and presented, they demanded the watches and money from some of our citizens.

They visited the residence of Mrs. Lee, and presenting a pistol to her head demanded all the money in the house. They cursed and abused her very much. They put a pistol to the breast of the Rev. Mr. Hamlin, at his residence, and demanded his watch, threatening to shoot him if they did not get it. They did the same with Dr. E. Delong.

A portion of the men who were detailed to guard the citizens saw Captain Hayden with a gold watch; when the citizens were dismissed they followed him to his home, and presenting their pistols forcibly took his watch and chain. On the Monday evening following, five of them went to the residence of A. D. Palmer, about four miles from town, during the night, and inveigled the old man from his house some distance, and then pretending to have an order from General Banks to take him and his papers and box to General Banks, they forced the old man to give them his money box and papers, robbing him of six thousand dollars. A few days since they robbed Mr. Geo. Keller, near Jackson, Louisiana, of fifteen thousand dollars.

These are the men that fight according to the laws of nations and respect private property. Every town they enter they pillage.

THE KENTUCKY ELECTION.—Evidence of the true character of the infamous victory won by the Administration in the late August election in Kentucky is thick in the columns of all our western exchanges. In the town of Bloomfield, when the polls were opened, says a letter to the Cincinnati Enquirer, an Indiana captain was present, with a squad of twenty-five soldiers, armed with carbines, revolvers, and sabres. The captain declared the town under martial law, announced to the judges of the election that Hon. C. A. Wickliffe, Democratic candidate for governor, is a "disloyal man," and that he would allow no vote to be cast for him. He furnished a list of names—the candidates of the "so-called" Union party—declared them loyal and that votes might be recorded for them. He said that if the judges would indorse other candidates as loyal men votes might be given for them, but that the judges would be held responsible, and that if any man voted for should hereafter be declared disloyal by the military authorities, the judges would be punished, but what the punishment would be he was not authorized to say. In no case would a vote be allowed to be cast for Mr. Wickliffe. The judge, overawed by the military, and no one feeling competent to endorse the loyalty of a long list of candidates personally unknown to them, and not willing to incur a threatened military penalty as yet undefined, allowed votes to be cast only for the ticket furnished them by the aforesaid Indiana captain. After a few unsuccessful efforts to vote for Mr. Wickliffe, the Democrats gave up the contest. In the precinct there are perhaps 150 voters, but only nineteen votes were cast—all for the Bramlette ticket. Old men who have been voting for forty and fifty years were denied the privilege of voting yesterday, while mere youths, just out of their minority, freely voted. Men of character and influence, among whom was an old gospel minister (not a pulpit political wrangler), who had been a legal voter fifty-seven years, was refused the right to vote, while a young man, known to be a thief, cast his vote for Bramlette and Co. Men of large wealth, who pay heavy taxes to support the State and national Governments, were not allowed to vote for a representative in the national Congress or for State and county officers, while "squatters," "spongers," and men from whom the National Government will never receive a dime, and the State Government nothing more than a head tax, voted without let or hindrance.—The Montreal Commercial Advertiser.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Boulevard-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

The INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the paper made:—

At Liverpool, to WM. KNOX, Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings, At Paris, to Messrs. PEREIRE and MULLER, 52, Rue du Château d'Eau, Paris.

New York and Charleston.

FOR the moment the attention of the Federal Government seems to be mainly divided between two points—New York and Charleston. A force nearly equally strong has been detailed from the main armies to act upon these cities. One of the most important towns in the South, and the richest and most populous community in the North, are alike threatened by Federal arms; and although the resistance offered by the Empire City seems unlikely to be of a very determined character, yet the fact that in the third year of the war it should be necessary to despatch a powerful fleet and army to retain New York within its allegiance to Federal authority, is a striking proof of the extremities to which the Washington Cabinet is already reduced. Nothing is heard of Governor Seymour now that the draft is in operation. He may be organising resistance; he may think that he has done enough for popularity, and that it would be imprudent to risk Mr. Vallandigham's fate, and contents himself with the last resort of timid politicians—a protest. But he has done the South a good turn. Henceforth New York and the Lincoln Administration are at mortal feud. She will provide permanent occupation for a Federal division during the war; and any reverse, any signal exhibition of weakness, will give the citizens of New York an opportunity of which they will not be slow to avail themselves. There seems to be no reason to doubt that the draft will go on. Whether the drafted men will fight is another question. By the time the conscripts have reached the camp, desertion will have sadly diminished their numbers; and President Lincoln will find that his triumph over the Democrats has not been worth its cost; that the 20,000 or 30,000 unwilling soldiers whom he has pressed into the ranks are no compensation for the alienation of the city which has hitherto so freely lavished its treasure and its blood for the war. So far, however, Mr. Lincoln has triumphed in New York. The Federal press is confident that an easy victory also awaits him at Charleston; but, considering how often the speedy downfall of the Palmetto City has been announced in vain, it would be well for the journalists of the North to moderate their expectations. That Fort Sumter will be breached by the Parrot guns on Morris Island is extremely probable. But Fort Sumter is only an outwork of the defences, and, as events have proved, a very weak one. The progress of the siege, if it has proved nothing else, has solved the question of the superiority of modern artillery over stone forts; but the real defences of Charleston are its improvised fortifications, of which Fort Wagner is an example.

After weeks of bombardment by his land and sea forces, General Gilmore has decided that Wagner cannot be taken except by assault. It is by this time far stronger than at the commencement of the attack. Fresh enfilading batteries on James Island would render an assault far more hazardous than the last. So it seems that Fort Wagner is to be left alone, and that, Fort Sumter having been crushed, the Federal iron-clad fleet is to push boldly up the harbour for Charleston itself. But Sumter will only be evacuated when it is untenable. If the Confederates cannot hold it under the fire of the Federal batteries on Morris Island, much less can the Federals do so under the fire of the guns at Cumming's Point and Battery Bee. It can never be used as an offensive work by the besiegers, even if the Confederates abandon it. But if Fort Sumter is the main obstacle to the ingress of the Federal squadrons, what do they expect to do with the sand batteries which at every available point line the shore as far as Charleston itself, and of which Wagner is a specimen? With the torpedoes and other obstructions in the harbour? With the long lines of fortifications which must be actually carried by assault before Charleston is taken? The town may ultimately fall, but at a loss of life far beyond the object gained. It will never be occupied by the invader. It will not avail, as New Orleans has done, for a starting-point for fresh Federal expeditions. It will not offer, as New Orleans did, victims for the brutality of a Butler. The Federal triumph will culminate with a great city ruined, burned, and desolate, a fitting monument of Mr. Lincoln's war policy. Its charred beauty will send a keener pang into every Southern heart, and will quicken the hatred of every Southern patriot, but the Federal triumph will be a barren one. In the meantime, it is satisfactory to see that the blockade of Charleston is more than compensated by the activity of blockade-runners at Wilmington. Within a few weeks, rifles, cannon, powder, and military stores sufficient for an army of 120,000 men have been safely landed. As the season advances, the difficulty of closing up the Southern ports by blockade will increase; so that even the loss of Charleston will be less severely felt. Savannah, Mobile, Wilmington, and Charleston must all be destroyed before the Federals can claim any substantial gain, any real advance towards their ultimate object.

The requirements of New York and Charleston have confessedly so far weakened General Meade's army as to compel him to abandon all aggressive movements and resign himself to an attitude of defence. It seems probable that before many weeks are over General Lee will have resumed the initiative. Notwithstanding the losses of the campaign in Pennsylvania, a distinguished British officer, who left the army of Virginia some days after the battle of Gettysburg, states that it is "as full of fight as ever—much stronger in numbers, and ten times more efficient in every military point of view, than it was when it crossed the Potomac to invade Maryland a year ago." General Lee may reasonably conclude that the Army of the Potomac is a much safer foe to attack now than it will be when the newly-raised levies have raised its strength to 150,000 men. Occupying as he does the Shenandoah Valley, with the mountain passes defending it, he holds a position most favourable for attack, and as soon as the intense heat of the summer has somewhat subsided the threatened advance may be made. It is a settled rule in war that the very best defence consists in taking the offensive when occasion permits. If General Lee sees an opening, we may be sure he will seize it. It would be idle to discuss the programme imputed to him by the Northern press. The Federals see some movements taking place of which they have no certain information, and their pens readily strike out a line of operations for the Confederate General. But as yet there are no signs of immediate action. The reported concentration of a large force under Longstreet in the Shenandoah has a menacing aspect; and we shall not be surprised to hear, if this report is true, that Meade has fallen back from his advanced position on the Rappahannock. A direct attack upon Lee's army he cannot contemplate; and to follow up the retrograde movements of the Confederate left, with an army of 40,000 under Longstreet in the Shenandoah, would be running a tremendous risk for no apparent object. The choice of a general action thus rests with General Lee. His opponent is in no position to become the assailant; but a movement of Longstreet's forces across the Shenandoah, or one of those skilful flank marches for which the Confederate army is famous, may at any time compel General Meade to leave his intrenchments, and fight a battle to secure his communications with Washington.

A Confederate victory near Port Hudson, a successful guerilla raid into Kansas, in which "Jim Lane" and $2,000,000 worth of property are reported to have been captured, constitute the only military incidents of the latest news. There is a general inaction in the Federal camps, north, south, east, and west; but the work of death goes on. Typhoid fever of the worst form is making fearful ravages amongst the Federal garrison at Vicksburg, and the besiegers at Charleston have to contend with the same deadly foe. The climate is fighting for the South as effectively as its armies; and that which should have been a season of repose for the worn-out and debilitated armies of Grant and Banks is even more fatal and demoralising than the hardships and exposure of the late protracted campaigns. Is it wonderful that 20,000 soldiers and a fleet of gunboats are needed to enforce the draft at New York?

The Threat of War.

A LETTER which appeared in the Times of Monday last must have caused great surprise to all who know the writer, and great annoyance to all who respect and esteem him. Mr. N. W. Senior is not to be classed with those Americanised Englishmen whose passionate sympathy with the Federal cause blinds them alike to the simple principles of justice and to the honour of England. We have no reason to affirm that he is in any sense a Northern partisan. We do not know that he is not, in common with almost all English gentlemen, a well-wisher of the South. We believe him to be before all things an Englishman, thinking more of the rights and interests of his country than of either party to the war. It is the more astonishing to find him coming forward in the very same manner in which Mr. Cobden, Mr. Forster, or Mr. Bright might do, to urge upon the English Government the necessity of displaying greater zeal in the one-sided enforcement of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and strengthening his argument by repeating the wild menaces of instant war or deferred vengeance which have been lavished upon us by American statesmen, demagogues, and journalists ever since the affair of the Trent. Mr. Senior is, as we all know, in the habit of talking very earnestly to all men from whom he thinks that political information is to be gleaned, and of recording the information he elicits in journals, one or two of which have already been published. It seems that he had, at the commencement of this year, held much conversation with his acquaintance on the subject of American feelings towards this country, and that he thought the opinions offered of sufficient importance to quote them to Mr. Dayton, in an interview which he had with that gentleman in May. The Federal Ambassador to Paris took this opportunity, as was only natural, of abusing England for the escape of the Alabama and Florida; and his abuse appears to have made a serious impression upon his hearer, who now, alarmed at floating rumours that more vessels are being built for the Confederates in British dockyards, calls anxiously for instant Government interference to avert a quarrel between this country and the Northern States. We are not a little surprised by this conduct on his part; we cannot but think that his warmest friends will regret it most keenly. We have learned to endure from certain persons who ought to act and feel as Englishmen, the language of menace and denunciation directed against their Sovereign and their country; we have heard English-born orators utter the threatenings of American vengeance; and we have listened with indifference, because we expected nothing better from those who so offended. But we did not expect this from Mr. Senior; and we are at a loss to comprehend the motives which could have induced him to publish a letter altogether so unworthy of his reputation.

We should like to inquire a little more closely into his authority for the facts which he so confidently asserts. He is told that Confederate men-of-war are building in the Clyde, and are already built in the Mersey; and, being "told" so, he assumes without further parley the truth of the assertion, and rushes into print to claim for the commerce of New York the protection of Earl Russell. Well, we "are told" a very different story. We are positively assured, by those who ought to know, that there are no vessels whatever built or building for the Confederate Government in British ports; that that Government, disgusted with the course pursued towards the Alexandra, has altogether abandoned the attempt to create and equip, at a vast expense, vessels which may not be allowed to get to sea; and that no more vessels will be built on their account either in the Clyde, or in the Mersey, or elsewhere within British jurisdiction. We do not know on what authority Mr. Senior believes the reverse; but we are strongly inclined to suppose that he writes, as he would have the Government act, simply on suspicion; and that he is as ill acquainted with the shipbuilding adventures of the Confederates as Lord Russell with the rules of diplomatic courtesy, or Mr. Adams with the proceedings of Federal recruiting agents in Ireland.

Whatever may be the case, however, as to the question of fact, Mr. Senior's account of his conversation with Mr. Dayton deserves notice as showing that the revilings of England, and the frantic menaces against her, which fill the columns of the Northern journals, are not the mere outbursts of vulgar demagogism or popular excitement, but represent the real feelings and intentions of men thought worthy of being sent "to lie abroad for the good of their country." Talking to a well-informed Englishman, the Ambassador could hardly dare to rant, as Yankees are wont to rant, about the annexation of Canada, the enfranchisement of Ireland, the annihilation of the maritime power of Great Britain. He was forced to admit that a declaration of war would be on the part of his country an act of simple insanity. But he perseveres in the assertion that war is inevitable if England will allow the Confederates to buy ships from her subjects as she allows the Federalists to buy cannon. The Northerners "will ruin themselves in order to ruin England." This may be so. It is probable that this is really the feeling of the lowest and most ignorant rabble of the American cities. They do not know what war with England means. They do not know that England could sweep their flag from the seas, could bombard their seacoast cities, could relieve the Southern ports from blockade, could enforce an effective blockade of the Northern coast, and within six weeks oblige every garrison established within the Confederate States to surrender at discretion. They do not comprehend that war with England means the immediate cession of Missouri, Kentucky, and Maryland. They half believe the nonsense talked by their demagogues, and are almost willing to add to their present task the tremendous adventure of a war with England. But we can hardly think that their noisy voices would prevail against the determination of the classes who know that war with England means ruin, total and immediate; ruin, commercial, financial, and political; unless, indeed, the mob should be joined by the class to which Mr. Dayton himself belongs—the professional politicians who have staked their fortunes upon the restoration of the Union, and who may possibly imagine that they can withdraw the stakes if they provoke England to interfere. It is, then, not impossible that the North should declare war against us; for it is not impossible that the interest of the band of political adventurers now at the head of affairs may coincide in that direction with the madness of the mob. But it is certain that war will be the ruin of the North, and therefore that she will not undertake it unless she is mad—driven mad by the fury of her populace and the craft of her Government. And it is certain that when she is fairly in the mood for war it will signify little whether we have or have not given her any provocation; whether more Alabamas have gone forth, or more Alexandras been arrested. We know that the rage of the North against this country has never been measured by our misdeeds, or what they conceive to be such. It is regulated not by English provocations, but by American circumstances. It breaks out furiously in ill-fortune; it is indulged defiantly when fortune has turned; during the heat of a great struggle it disappears altogether. Just now there has been a peculiarly fierce outbreak of spleen against us, totally unconnected with the Alabama or with any other vessel; and one American paper goes so far as to threaten us with the confiscation of the West Indies. Not that we have given them any new provocation, but simply that they are now in a sanguine mood, and, fancying the South subdued, are eager to fall upon an unoffending neutral. With such a people, we cannot prevent war by concessions. They will attack us whenever they dare; so far as we are concerned, it would be as well if they should attack us at once. They are hardly likely to be much weaker, or we to be much better prepared, than at present. We abhor the idea of war; but assuredly we have no reason to fear it. The worst that it could inflict on us would be the destruction of a few Canadian villages, and the raising of the general rate of insurance to a level with that at present paid on vessels trading with neutral ports in Mexico or in the West Indies. It would give us cotton; for it would end at once the blockade which alone keeps cotton from us. It would give us access to the vast and most lucrative market of the South. It would give us an opportunity of securing to ourselves the territory out of which we were so infamously swindled when the frontier line was drawn between Maine and New Brunswick. It would give us a chance of possessing ourselves of a good winter harbour and a constant access to Canada. In a word, the prospect of war is one which, were we, like France, a military, or, like Russia, an encroaching Power, would rejoice our hearts. As it is, we shudder at it, but assuredly not with fear.

But, come war, come peace, it is not for England to guide her course by the threats of foreign Powers; it is most unworthy of an Englishman to allege those threats as a reason why we should adopt or abstain from any action whatever. Above all, when a stronger Power is at war with a weaker, it is simply infamous to ask us to do an injury to the latter in order to avoid the vengeance of the former. Let justice be done though the heavens should fall; if it be our duty, as a matter of international obligation, to stop certain proceedings of the Confederates, let us do it whether or no the Federalists desire it at our hands; if it be not strictly our duty, then let us refuse to do it though all the world should threaten us with war. The probability of war, in a question of this kind, is utterly irrelevant; and those who introduce it must be content to lie under the imputation of a degrading fear of evils far less terrible than the disgrace involved in concessions refused to remonstrance and yielded to menace.

The question with regard to the seizure of vessels supposed to be destined for the Confederate States presents itself in three aspects: as a question of justice, as a question of municipal law, and as a question of international obligation; and it is worth while to examine it briefly under each of these heads.

First, then, it is clearly just that, in regard to matters in which both parties make the same claims upon us, we should grant or deny the same things to each. If one be allowed to buy rifles and powder, to refit in our ports, to obtain coal from our wharves, so must the other. If we grant to one what we refuse to the other, we are guilty of a gross violation alike of equity and neutrality. Secondly, in regard to demands which the one party does make, and the other, from its situation, does not make, it is plain that we should deal equally with each. If we so interpret our neutrality as to grant what the one party requires, and refuse to the other all of which it has need, we do not indeed cease to be neutral, but we are certainly unjust. Now, our neutrality has hitherto been so interpreted as to give immense advantages to the Federalists. Their harbours are open, and they have a vast commercial marine, therefore they do not need to bring prizes into our harbours, and they have great interest in excluding therefrom the prizes of the Confederates, who, with no commerce and closed harbours, most urgently require that our ports should be open to their men-of-war and captures. Here, for peace sake, we interpreted our neutrality as the Federalists desired it. We have refused recognition to the Confederates; we have recognised an invalid blockade of their harbours; we have allowed their enemy to infringe the neutrality of our own waters. Herein we have given advantages to the Federalists of immense importance to them; it is quite clear that we ought, if possible, to settle this last point so as to make some amends for all this. Again, as a matter of natural justice, it is scandalous that we should supply to the stronger the strength of which he stands in special need—arms and ammunition—yet refuse to the weaker the element of strength in which he is deficient—armed ships. The distinction between cannon and ships is artificial, not natural; a question of law, not of justice; so far as equity is concerned, it is clear that the belligerent who asks us to sell him cannon ought not to complain if we sell ships of war to his adversary.

But the Federals put in a claim on our gratitude. They say that they, during our former wars, refused to allow their citizens to join our enemies or furnish them with armed ships, and therefore we ought to return the favour. This would be just, were the facts as they are stated. But the truth is that, as is proved by incontestable evidence, the United States never have acted a faithful part by us in this respect. They allowed their citizens to join the Canadian rebels, not one by one, but in bands, actually armed with weapons from the Government stores. They allowed a ship sold to the Russian Government to quit their ports in 1855, and she was even protected against search by an American cruiser. With these facts in view, the pretence of former merit set up by Mr. Dayton appears singularly impudent and mendacious.

As a matter of municipal law it is clear that the Foreign Enlistment Act forbids the equipment or arming of ships of war to prey on the commerce of a friendly Power; and it is clear that if ships for the Confederate service are "equipped" or "armed" within British jurisdiction, we have the power and the right to stop them. But no Foreign Government has any rights or claims under this Act, or is entitled, merely on the ground of its existence and apart from questions of international law, to ask us to put it in force. And, of all Powers, that which is systematically recruiting in Ireland for its armies, and which mans its navy with British seamen, in defiance of our Foreign Enlistment Act, is dis-entitled to claim the benefits of the law which it habitually conspires to evade and to violate.

As a matter of international law, it is laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States that armed vessels are lawful merchandise; and that, though they are, of course, contraband of war, there is nothing in the law of nations to prevent the citizens of a neutral country from selling them to either belligerent, whether in their ports or in his. This was decided in the case of an Alabama or Florida furnished to Buenos Ayres in its struggle with Spain, and manned and commanded by American citizens. We have no means of knowing, when a vessel leaves our ports, whether she is intended to run the blockade of Mobile, or to be armed like the Alabama in mid-ocean; and therefore, so far as international law is concerned, it is clear that we cannot be called upon to arrest her departure.

But, above all, it is certain that the conduct of the Government in such a matter ought to remain entirely unaffected by the prospective consequences of their course. They ought to look only to the law and the justice of the case, irrespective alike of Confederate sympathies and of Federal menaces; and, in trying to terrify them with rumours of impending vengeance, Mr. Dayton is acting a very childish, and Mr. Senior a very imprudent and un-English part.

An American Cawnpore.

WHATEVER may have been said by the English advocates of the Federal cause, who have never kept scrupulously within the limit of truth nor cared much to preserve any semblance of consistency between their own arguments and assertions and those of their Transatlantic clients, we must do the American Abolitionists the justice to admit that they have never concealed the true purpose which they had in view in calling upon the Government to proclaim freedom and preach insurrection to the Southern slaves. They never pretended to expect 'civilized warfare from revolted negroes; they never professed to intend only to recruit with coloured fugitives the ranks of the Federal army, and to impair the resources of the South by withdrawing from it the services of useful and industrious labourers. They never disguised from their countrymen the true direction of their hopes. They openly declared that they wished so to alarm the Confederate soldiers—not for their communications, not for their supplies, not for the country in their rear, but for the safety of their homes, their women and children,—that they would desert in large numbers in order to hasten to protect their families against the brutalities to be dreaded from insurgent slaves. Mr. Lincoln did not pretend to care for the liberation of the negroes. On the contrary, he manifested a brutal and ostentatious contempt of their interests. He proclaimed emancipation as a military necessity; that is, he avowed that he had failed to conquer the South by force of arms; that she had routed his troops, despised his ravages, and defied his blockade; that all his superiority in numbers, artillery, and naval power had proved unavailing; and that he was forced to invite the aid of the slaves to assist him in his monstrous attempt to reduce to slavery eight millions of freemen. Nor did he affect to expect that their aid would be given in the form of legitimate co-operation in civil war. He invited them to procure their freedom as best they could, and promised that they should not be molested in any means they might adopt for that purpose. He believed, as all the Abolitionists believed—though he knew a little more, and, therefore, felt rather less confidence than they did—that his proclamation would lead to a general servile insurrection; that the negroes on every plantation at a distance from any considerable Confederate force would rise, murder their master's children, burn his house, and commit all those unutterable atrocities of which none are capable but men whom passion has lowered below the level of humanity, and who retain only enough of manhood to intensify and direct their brutal instincts. He knew what had happened in St. Domingo; he knew what had been done in India; and he knew that the negro, as a creature far lower in the scale of being than the Sepoy, would outdo the horrors of Cawnpore or Delhi, if he could once be roused into armed rebellion against his master. He knew all this; he believed that all this would happen in every corner of the South; and with this knowledge and this belief, he deliberately issued his invitation to pillage, outrage, arson, and murder. The Abolitionist pulpits of New England resounded with praises of this unprecedented crime; with prayers and thanksgivings so awfully blasphemous, that Europe shuddered to read the most moderate of them. Preachers, self-styled Christian, men and women bearing the semblance of the English race, and speaking the English tongue, united in giving thanks to God for the prospect of devastation and massacre before them. They gloated over the expected tidings of blood; of infants torn from their mother's arms and dashed against the stones; of children impaled on bayonets and roasted at the ashes of their burning homes; of women subjected to shame unspeakable and inexpiable; of old men slaughtered on the hearthstone, after witnessing the extermination of their household. They foresaw these things; they delighted in them; they gloried in them. Deliberately they proclaimed the extermination of slaveholders as the watchword of the war; "deliberately, calmly, and as Christians" they accepted the declaration that a St. Domingo massacre was a military necessity, and declared that "they would rather see every woman and child in the South perish" than that the South should achieve her independence. Europe heard in incredulous disgust; the little remnant of honest patriots in the North shuddered with shame and horror. Happily the hopes of these Christian congregations and their ministers were disappointed. The divinity to whom such prayers as theirs are addressed was not allowed to work the will of his worshippers; nor, while there is a God in heaven, do we fear to see the work of Satan so awfully triumphant upon earth. The North was spared the guilt of such a massacre as earth had never yet seen; the South escaped the fulfilment of a menace which sounded rather as if uttered by fiends than by men; and Europe, too, escaped the eternal and ineffable shame of standing silently by, and permitting the murder of thousands of white women and children to be wrought by negro hands, directed by the mandates of a government still recognised as an equal by the great and civilised empires of the Old World. The negroes were loyal to their masters, as their masters had deserved that they should be; and Federal influence had not yet spread far enough to corrupt that loyalty, and avail itself of their excitability and ignorance to turn a happy, docile, and contented peasantry into a horde of frantic, lustful, bloodthirsty savages. Yet the guilt of the intention was not the less horrible because the blow missed its aim; the attempt was not the less infamous and dastardly because, made in utter ignorance of the conditions of success, it proved a complete and ignominious failure.

Something the Federalists did accomplish. They recruited their armies with a few thousand negroes, of whom some are now doing congenial duty in Georgia and Florida, burning defenceless towns and destroying deserted plantations, while others, driven like sheep to the slaughter, stood between the men of Massachusetts and the guns of Port Hudson, and died, fighting with teeth and claws, in the manner of wild beasts, by the bayonets of a foe who had made an effort, even at the last moment, to save them from the cruel mercies of their cowardly betrayers. Another band of these unhappy wretches, apparently at the instigation of the white chaplain of their regiment, have recently signalled themselves by a service of the very kind expected of them by their Boston friends. Led by this chaplain, a party of armed and uniformed blacks from Island No. 10 demanded of Mr. Beckham the surrender of one of his slaves, the child of a fugitive woman. The demand was of course refused, and the party retired. But afterwards eighteen of these men, without their chaplain, but apparently with his sanction—inasmuch as one of them carried the reverend gentleman's pistol—returned to the place. They murdered old Mr. Beckham and his son—the first a man of eighty, the second of middle age—and four children of the latter; three girls, the eldest fourteen, and a little boy of two years old. The two men were horribly mangled by stabs, and shots, and blows from musket-butts; the four children were driven into the water at the point of the bayonet, beaten the while with clubbed muskets, and so drowned. "Better that every woman and child in the South should perish, than that the Union should not be restored." This incident is but a just and logical commentary on that text; these miserable negroes have but carried out the teachings of their political patrons and spiritual pastors.

Several of the misguided wretches have been arrested by a body of Federal cavalry; and as they are negroes, for whom there is scant justice and no mercy in the North, they may probably expiate their crime as it deserves; and for aught we know, Mr. Lincoln may take credit to himself, at this cheap rate, for the enforcement of the laws of war and the maintenance of military discipline. But for Federal judges to order these assassins to execution will only be to redress one murder by another. These negroes have only done what white Federalists have done before them; what those troops did who shot a Missourian citizen in presence of his wife on his own threshold; what those troops did who murdered several citizens of Tennessee because a Federal General was killed in a skirmish in their neighbourhood; what Butler did at New Orleans, and Burnside lately at Sandusky; what Milroy threatened and McNeill executed. Murder is, with Federal troops, a regular mode of warfare. We might suppose that it would be considered a forbidden luxury to negroes if we did not know that the negroes were wanted rather to murder than to fight. These ruffians did only what they were intended to do; only what is expected and ought to be expected of all the debauched slaves who, whether as camp-followers or as so-called soldiers, are retained in the pay and under the influence of the Yankees. Left to himself, the negro will rarely harm any man, most rarely of all, his master or his master's family. But fired by the harangues of the Abolitionist preacher, plied with drink by Abolitionist officers, armed, accoutred, encouraged to violence, robbery, and murder during many months, he becomes a pliant instrument in the hands of his seducers. There is no fear of a negro outbreak at Charleston or Mobile; but no prudent man will venture to say that there may not at any moment be a negro revolt at New Orleans; and if such should occur, every one knows what its watchword will be. The unarmed men and helpless women of New Orleans may then expect the fate which was threatened to the white people of St. Vincent; the fate which befel the Europeans at Meerut, Delhi, and Cawnpore. For what may happen there, as for what has happened at Beckham's Landing, the preachers, generals, statesmen, and above all the President of the Northern States are solely answerable. Not by his own hand, but by his contrivance, and of his malice aforethought, ABRAHAM LINCOLN murdered those unhappy children; and if ever murder were likely to call down on the assassins the execrations of men and the vengeance of Heaven, it is that which the President of the United States has just wrought, by the hands of his negro soldiers, in that desolate home on the banks of the Mississippi.

The perpetration of a crime like this—the prospect of a thousand outrages of equal atrocity—cannot, humanly speaking, affect the issue of the war. No country was ever conquered by dint of assassination; no people was ever reduced to submission by the slaughter of women and children. But one thing will be accomplished by the recurrence of these tragedies. Hitherto the President and the generals of the Confederacy have resolutely refrained from shedding blood except on the field of battle. They have been provoked by every species of outrage; by the deliberate murder of peaceful citizens; by the assassination in cold blood of prisoners of war; by massacres committed by excited soldiers and executions calmly ordered by generals in high command; but hitherto, though they have threatened reprisals, they have never carried them into effect. This cannot go on for ever. No matter how chivalric may be the temper of Lee and Johnston, no matter how intensely abhorrent to Mr. Davis may be the execution of prisoners once admitted to quarter, it will be simply impossible for them to refuse the just demands of the people and the army that blood shall be atoned by blood. If they did resist, the only result would be that on the field itself no quarter would be given by the exasperated soldiery. Another question will be set at rest by the massacre of Mr. Beckham's family. President Lincoln lately had the audacity to demand for negro troops and their officers the privileges of civilised soldiery: and some European observers, perhaps, sympathised with the demand. We shall hear no more of that, at least from any sober and honest reasoners. It is a little too cool to ask the rights of soldiers for men who are, on any view of their case, either traitors or revolted slaves; but no man in his senses will pretend to say that uniformed murderers, such as Mr. Lincoln's negro mercenaries have now proved themselves, are entitled to be treated as prisoners of war. It is not likely that quarter will ever be given to negro troops; we suspect that English soldiers, under such circumstances, would give none to any Federalist.

ON THE FRONTIER.*

It is certainly matter of regret that the author of "Guy Livingstone" did not succeed in his purpose of making a campaign with the Confederate army in Virginia. We have few writers better qualified to do justice to such a subject; and his narrative of a year's service under General Lee would probably have given us a better idea of the character and conditions of Virginia campaigning than we are likely to gain from the letters, clear and able as they are, of the two gentlemen who are actually present with the Southern armies as correspondents of the two principal English newspapers. We are bound to add, that this book gives us a more pleasant idea of the writer's character than we had derived from his novels. There is too much of what Mr. Kingsley's friends call "muscular Christianity," and his enemies "animal heatheism," about "Guy Livingstone;" he, and his brother heroes, have in their nature a good deal of the blusterer and still more of the bully; there is a brutal insolence in their pride of physical power which savours not of the champions of the lists but of those of the prize-ring, and their valour seems less that of gentlemen than that of athletes. The effect of these books on the reader's mind is certainly not favourable to the author. He would generally be pronounced to resemble Mr. Kingsley and Mr. Hughes too much to be liked as a man or respected as a writer; if he do not share their Pharisaic insolence and their intolerable presumption, and do not, like them, set up as a moral teacher without having learned the first elements of practical ethics, yet he represents himself as a more earnest worshipper of mere brute force, and in a coarser sense, than Mr. Carlyle himself. "Border and Bastille" will go far to remove this unfavourable impression. We find that the author, when he speaks in his own person, speaks with a dignity, temper, and good taste which are wholly lacking in his heroes, and shows himself what he fails to make them appear. The book, it is needless to say, is well and vigorously written; it is also fair, though without the slightest affectation of impartiality. The writer went out a warm Southern sympathiser, willing to risk his life in the Confederate cause; two months of imprisonment endured at the hands of the Federal Government have not softened his dislike to the "Black Republicans," nor cooled his admiration for the countrymen of Stonewall Jackson. But he does full justice to the Yankees; sometimes, as we think, a little more than justice; and we believe that there are few of his statements in regard to the particular faults and dangers of the North which any honest man who knows anything of the country would care to contradict.

He left England in December last, and after a stormy passage across the Atlantic, and a hasty visit to New York and Washington, he reached Baltimore. Provided with excellent introductions, known as a successful novelist, favourably regarded as a volunteer in the good cause, he was received with open arms and exuberant hospitality by the social aristocracy of that charming city. Of his sojourn there he speaks in terms of the warmest gratitude; for the excellence of the Madeira, the social delights of the long evenings and the cheerful ease of the supper—a meal now unknown on this side the Atlantic, but still preserving its existence and its charms in a land where men dine early—for the beauty of the women and the kindness and courtesy of the men of Baltimore, he can find no adequate expression of praise. Many pleasant weeks he spent there, while awaiting a favourable chance of passing the frontier. As he was determined to take with him a horse and the accoutrements of a horseman, he could not go by the lower Potomac, which could only be crossed in a boat, and was obliged to select a more easterly route, and cross the river at a point where it was fordable. This involved some delay and considerable risk; more than one fruitless attempt having to be made. At last, furnished with an experienced guide, who had already piloted to Richmond Lord Hartington and Colonel Leslie, and forwarded from one friendly house to another, he passed the frontier, and was making his way into Virginia, having, as he imagined, passed beyond the outermost pickets of the Federal army, when the party, led by a Virginian well acquainted with the country, were challenged by some "Home Guards." Disregarding the challenge and pressing on, the author had his horse shot under him, and himself received a slight wound in the knee, apparently from the same ball. He was thus forced to surrender, while the guide made off on foot, only to be captured a few hours later with a mass of dangerous papers in his possession. The captives were sent to Wheeling; and thence the author was forwarded to Baltimore for identification. From Baltimore he was passed on to Washington, and there consigned to prison. Here he seems to have been fortunate. Though his guards stole newspapers and cigars which were sent to him by friends at the Legation, they allowed him, like their other captives, to purchase for himself, at exorbitant prices, both food, and drink, and tobacco; he had only one companion in his room; and although against the rules of the place, he was allowed to keep a light burning in his room all night, or as long as he pleased. Nevertheless he suffered terribly. Irritation, anxiety, ennui, and that hope deferred which makes the heart sick, so preyed upon his spirits that he sank into a state of utter listlessness; while something which seems to have resembled what is called "low fever" gradually reduced his physical powers to that degree that the strong man, capable of sustaining the fatigues of a campaign, and weighing in good condition some fourteen stone, could not climb the prison stairs without pausing, in utter exhaustion, to rest and take breath. His sight was so much impaired that reading became impossible. "Even now, a month after my enfranchisement, though keen Atlantic breezes and home comforts have worked wonders, I cannot write five consecutive sentences without a respite." Others, weaker, and imprisoned for a longer time, must have suffered still more; especially as many of them were subjected for months together to such physical torments as were entirely spared to our author. There were women, and even children, imprisoned in that very place; there have been men, already grown old, confined in crowded dungeons for a twelvemonth or more, by the mere fiat of the Federal Government, without such grounds of reasonable suspicion as existed in the case of a prisoner taken in an actual attempt to pass the lines. Those who are inclined to think lightly of the punishment inflicted on free citizens, for no legal offence, at the pleasure of such ministers as the swindler Cameron or such generals as the courteous Schenck and the heroic Butler, will do well to read the pages in which a man who, when first captured, could rend a broad linen band tied round his arm by bending the biceps muscle, records the sufferings he underwent in eight weeks of imprisonment, pure and simple, without one unnecessary hardship superadded. At the end of that time he was ready enough to accept his release on condition that he should not revisit the United States "during the rebellion," to abandon his schemes, and to return to England.

Some portions of his observations, and especially those which relate to the constitution and defects of the Northern armies, and to the temper and position of the State of Maryland, are well worthy of attention. They are not altogether new; but they come with renewed force from one who puts his views in a clear light, who thinks distinctly, and forms his conclusions with due caution and reserve. The slovenliness of the appearance presented by the Federal soldiery particularly struck the author. Officers and men alike had the slouching, most unsoldierly gait of the Yankee civilian, so well described by a Yankee satirist.

The most of you—this is what strikes all beholders—
Have a mental and physical stoop in the shoulders.
Though you call yourselves free as the winds and the waves,

You've the gait and the manners of runaway slaves.

The clothing and accoutrements of the soldiers are dirty and rusty, and the general appearance of troops on home duty, with no excuse for dirt and carelessness, is totally devoid of that "smartness" which distinguishes good European and especially English troops. The cavalry are wretched. They are ill-mounted, on miserable animals, dear at the government price of £20, which are so ill-cared for and left so completely ungroomed that no one can wonder at their dying by thousands in the camp. The saddle is good; but the stirrup is heavy and short, and closed like that of a lady's saddle, so that the soldier cannot rise to his height to give force to the blow of his sabre. And the Yankees are never horsemen. Where Englishmen ride, they drive, and drive very well; but the majority of them never learn to sit a horse, and the original vice of bad horsemanship besets their cavalry still. On the other hand, the Southerners are used to ride far and fast and across country. They are born and bred to the saddle, and the South could probably furnish a larger number of first-rate riders than any other civilised country. Hence the vast superiority displayed by the Confederates, whenever the cavalry of the two countries comes into conflict; a superiority which, in some districts, will tell with terrible effect on an enemy entangled in a hostile land and at a distance from his base of operations—which ought to tell, perhaps, more than it has done in the improvement of a victory once achieved.

Of the moral quality of the Northern forces our author has a very low opinion. The absence of military traditions; the heterogeneous character of the people; their habits of equality and contempt of subordination; their determination to carry into the camp the feelings and privileges of civil life—all help to make the task of disciplining a Northern levy into anything like an effective army exceedingly onerous. In our author's opinion the native Americans have behaved better than the Irish and Germans—a judgment which is, we suspect, somewhat too hasty and general—but they have not behaved well. They will fight energetically when they choose; they skirmish well, and they are not bad at a rush. But they are not steady in line of battle; they totally lack enthusiasm and self-devotion; they think for themselves, and criticise the proceedings of their commanders in an unsparing manner; and above all, they have neither respect for nor confidence in their officers. How should they? Their officers are not, as in France, men trained to soldiership and military skill; nor, as in England, gentlemen of birth and breeding, superior in physique and intellect and position to their men; nor, as in the South, men who have proved their merit either to their comrades at home or to their commander in the field. They are appointed by political favour, and political favour in America belongs not to the best but to the worst classes of the people; especially now, when a republican government has completely realised Byron's definition of democracy as "an aristocracy of blackguards." From this aristocracy are chosen the officers of the Federal army; the best of them such men as Banks, a noted but not disreputable politician, the remnant of that sort of which Butler is the typical representative—often cowards, mostly scoundrels, always incapables. If an exception be found here and there, in which an officer of volunteers is a gentleman and a soldier, he is almost sure to belong to the regular army. With bayonets that think, and swords that dangle where manacles would be more appropriate—with soldiers who can scarcely learn to salute a field-officer, and field-officers that—

Stick a Union mask on to State-prison features, it is rather more wonderful that Meade and M'Clellan should have acquitted themselves honourably than that Hooker and Burnside and M'Dowell and Pope should have come to signal shame.

To the loyalty of Maryland these pages bear ample testimony. In Baltimore the writer found the hospitable salons almost emptied of the "prime of manhood." Every family of social rank had sent its sons into the Confederate ranks, rarely and uncertainly to hear of their fate; 12,000 Marylanders had recruited the Southern army, and of 9,000 pressed by the Government at Washington, only 100 remained in its service. Except in the western counties, where the Unionists are strengthened by the influence of the railroad population, and where the secessionists have been somewhat cooled by Southern requisitions, the State is Southern to the core. Whatever her citizens individually could do for the South, they have done; and if they refused to rise when Lee entered the State, they only acted with common prudence and discretion. A large Federal force was among them, ready to repress insurrection before it could gain a head; the Army of the Potomac was between them and their friends; success was hardly to be hoped for, and failure would have involved the whole population—and especially the women and children—in helpless subjection to the furious vengeance of the victors. The retreat of the Confederates fully justified the prudence of the Marylanders. The Federal Government appreciates their temper accurately enough, and maintains among them to this day a tyranny like that of Russia in Poland or Austria in Venice. This volume contains numerous instances of the caprice and meanness of the military rulers of Maryland, which prove alike the conviction they entertain of the inveterate hostility of their subjects, and the deep cause which those subjects have to hate them. The feeling of the more reserved and temperate among them found vent in the address of an Episcopalian clergyman of eminence, when the command went forth that the President should be prayed for:—"My brethren," he said, "we are commanded this day to intercede with the Almighty for the President. Let us pray. May the Lord have mercy on Abraham Lincoln's soul!"

AN English officer who was present with the Confederate army contributes to Blackwood a narrative of the Battle of Gettysburg and the campaign in Pennsylvania, which has the rare merit of being confined to such details as fell under the observation of the author. The description of the difficulties incident to taking part in that campaign, even as a spectator, reminds the reader that it is not the field of battle only that tests the heroism and endurance of the Southern soldier. No wonder that the Confederates have so often been triumphant over superior numbers. Fighting is the least arduous of their duties, for they go into action hardened by a training such as their lavishly-equipped foes could scarcely bear. Our "English officer," after a miserable ride upon a broken-down hack, came up on the sixth or seventh day with the head-quarters of the army, and was very kindly received, first by General Longstreet and afterwards by General Lee. On his way he had been struck with the cruel ravages of the war. In every direction were to be seen the blackened ruins of farm-houses. There was abundant evidence that the Federals had done what they could to glut their vengeance and to satisfy their barbarous passion for destruction. The house of Mr. Mason, the Confederate Commissioner, had long ago been gutted, but that did not satisfy the insatiate spite of the Yankee. Under the direction of Milroy, whom our author fitly compares to Butler, the very foundation of Mr. Mason's house has been dug up, so that literally not one stone is left standing upon another; the debris has been carted away and only a hole is left to mark the site where the house once stood. During the northward progress of the Southern army the Yankees, relying on the forbearance of the generous foe, indulged in all sorts of petty insults. The Chambersburg ladies laughed derisively at the ragged Texans, and one of them stood at the door of a house with a huge Yankee flag adorning her ample bosom. Several companies passed without taking any notice, but at length a Texan said to her, "Take care Madam, for Hood's boys are great at storming breast-works when the Yankee colours is on them," and upon that the lady withdrew. An illustration of Northern savagery, and an exceedingly characteristic one, is recorded in the article before us. Whilst in Pennsylvania a Southern officer saw a corpse covered with a sheet lying in a verandah. He inquired of the mistress of the house if it was the body of a Confederate or a Yankee, and the woman, who, like the Baltimore virago who tortured a dying Confederate by waving the Federal flag in his face, was an Abolitionist, answered, "If it was a rebel do you think it would be here long?" Beholding everywhere the evidences of such fiendish ferocity, the English officer could but admire, not only the humanity and chivalry of the Confederates, which prevented them from retaliating in kind, but still more the excellent discipline which prevented any retaliation at all, and made the vast Southern army respect private property. The Pennsylvanians were not particularly grateful, but their ingratitude was not the result of their love for the Union. Our author says, "they are the most unpatriotic people I ever saw, and openly state that they don't care which side wins, provided they are left alone. They abuse Lincoln tremendously." On the 1st of July our author witnessed the conclusion of the battle that was fought on that day. Nearly 6,000 prisoners and ten guns were captured, and so far as that particular action was concerned, the Confederate victory was complete. Nor were the Southern generals unprepared for the task that they thought awaited them on the 2nd. General Longstreet, with whom our author supped, told him that he knew the enemy's position was very formidable, and that he would doubtless entrench himself during the night. On the 2nd, victory again inclined to the Confederates, who bivouacked at night on the ground occupied by the enemy in the morning; but on the 3rd the Federals had the advantage, that is to say, the Confederates made the attack and were repulsed. On this day, whilst our author was wending his way through the woods in the direction of Longstreet's head-quarters, he met wounded men coming from the front, many asking in piteous tones the way to a doctor or an ambulance. The less severely wounded were helping their more unfortunate comrades, but not one sound man did the English officer meet who, under the cloak of humanity, had shirked the deadly fight. Soon the number of the wounded increased, until at length they came on like "the crowd in Oxford Street in the middle of the day." When our author came up to General Longstreet, who was seated on a fence at the edge of a wood, he saw a regiment advancing in good order, as he thought, to the attack, and observed, "I would not have missed this for anything." Then Longstreet, who was calm and whose manner betrayed none of the emotion that he must have felt, replied, laughing, "The devil you would? I would like to have missed it very much; we have attacked and been beaten; look there." Our author describes the moment as highly critical; not that there was any danger of the Confederate army being routed, but an attack at that juncture would have caused considerable disaster. It was a time to test generalship and discipline. Longstreet gave his orders as quietly as if he had been at a review. One officer told him he could not bring up his men again; he bade him sarcastically to let them remain where they were, for the enemy were about to advance and would save him the trouble. General Lee, quite alone, was going about cheering up the men, not denying that a reverse had been sustained, but telling them to rally. At his bidding, even the slightly wounded bound up their wounds and took up a musket. He encouraged the officers that came up to him, by telling them that he alone was to blame. Even trivial matters, at this harassing crisis, did not escape his attention. He said to our author, "This has been a sad day for us, colonel, a sad day; but we cannot expect always to gain victories;" and then advised him to get into some more sheltered position. He observed an officer whipping his horse for shying at the bursting of a shell, and called out, "Don't whip him, Captain, don't whip him. I have got just such another foolish horse myself, and whipping does no good." The result of all this calmness and conduct was that the men were rallied and brought into position with "much less noise, fuss, or confusion of orders than at any ordinary field day." General Lee withdrew, says our author, because he was short of ammunition, and he was not pressed by the enemy, but carried with him into Virginia an enormous booty. We have given a very imperfect sketch of the article, which is full of information and interesting anecdotes. The simple habits and manners of the Confederate generals invest them with a grand antique heroism, and no one can read the narrative before us without feeling still greater respect for such men as Lee, Longstreet, and Ewell.

Fraser contains an article entitled, "Our Manufacturing Districts under a Cloud." What an agreeable way of putting a disagreeable matter! A cloud is a temporary inconvenience, and, however black, has a silver lining. When it passes away the crops are heavier than they would have been if the sunshine had been continuous. Those who like to take a pleasant view of affairs had better not read any more of the fourth article in Fraser than the title. There is just sufficient revival in Lancashire to make us aware how much our cotton trade has been crippled. Despite the splendid harvest with which we have been blessed, the prospects for the coming winter are gloomy enough. Nor is that the worst. The hope of amelioration waxes fainter and fainter. The stock of cotton goods is everywhere becoming rapidly exhausted, and consequently there are some orders. It is, however, a puny trade. We cannot supply our fabrics so cheaply as formerly. The price of the raw material is excessive, and Surat is a wretched substitute for New Orleans. "The work is proportionately more trying and less remunerative to the operative. It is calculated that in a mill where a decent Surat is used, and the machinery is adapted to it, the cloth is about two-thirds of what it would have been with American material." So the operative, the millowner, and the whole trade suffer. We cannot sell a dear fabric in the place of cheap fabric, and we cannot produce a cheap fabric without the aid of the cotton-fields of the Confederate States. The Federals bully us about the Alabama, but surely they have their revenge in the condition and prospects of Lancashire. Our neutrality has cost us more than any war we have waged.—"The Periodical Press of the United States" treats on a subject that is not very well understood in Europe. There are an immense number of papers published—in New York 851 periodicals, of which 72 are daily papers—and this development is not due to the public demand but to the political system. The press in the United States does not represent the public opinion, but the opinions of its proprietors and editors. The most remarkable exception is the New York Herald, which has a large circulation, the result of its able management and of representing the passion of the hour. But party papers, though not always commercially successful, have their reward. After the election of Mr. Lincoln "seven of the editorial staff of the New York Tribune were selected to fill important appointments." It is not surprising then that the Tribune and such papers are so earnest in advocating the extermination of the Southern people. May not the most obscure writer hope to get a share of the imperial booty? It is unnecessary to comment on the peculiarities and character of Northern journals. The Federal organs published in London are fair specimens of their transatlantic contemporaries, except that they are willing to sacrifice their country's welfare for the sake of a foreign power, and that, time-serving as are the Union editors, we know of no instance in which one of them has been brought over to advocate a policy detrimental to the real or supposed interests of the United States.—We cannot agree with "A Plea for the Free Discussion of Theological Difficulties." Every man, no doubt, ought to be at liberty to express his opinion on all things, and especially on religion; but it does not follow that a clergyman should be free to express opinions that are opposed to the doctrine of the Church. If his views change let him leave the ministry. The liberty claimed by some clergymen is to express individual opinions opposed to the doctrines of the Church, and at the same time to receive ecclesiastical salaries. They desire to be very honest, not at their own, but at the Church's expense.

The Cornhill has a very charming, but withal a very pathetic essay, on "Going to the Dogs." We hear very much in this country about self-made men, and England is undoubtedly remarkable for the number of her citizens who attain to fortune and reputation from very humble beginnings; as yet, however, we have not a volume on the lives of men who have unmade themselves—of men who had good starts in life, who were bred in the lap of luxury, and who have spurned Fortune's favours, have been reduced to penury, and who have gone to the dogs. If such a book should be written, it will be found that the essayist in the Cornhill is right in ascribing this kind of decay and ruin not so much to profligacy as to that worst of all vices, idleness. The outcast complains that in days gone by he was invited to enjoy the luxuries of the season and that now he vainly begs for a loaf of bread. "The same man who will spend pounds to be genteel wont spare a penny to be generous. Very strange is it not? There is nothing between turtle-soup and starvation." It is very sad that people do not compassionate their former friends in the hour of adversity, but it is not strange. A man has a right, if he chooses, to feast his friends, but it does not follow that he is bound to find them in daily bread if through their own folly they fall into poverty. What poor relations call unkindness and ingratitude is very often nothing more than the refusal of their rich relations to comply with their unjust demands—"The Opera, 1833-1863," points out how, in what is called "grand opera," the music is made subservient to the dramatic action, and gives a very gloomy picture of operatic prospects.—"How we slept at the Châlet des Chèvres," shows what toil enthusiasts of mountain climbing make of pleasure, especially when ladies are of the party.—"Richelieu's Shabby Suit," is a very graphic account of the dissolute manners of the age of Louis XVI.—An essay entitled "Anti-Respectability," criticises Mrs. Norton's novel of "Lost and Saved" rather severely in its moral aspect. The writer observes, that it is natural and necessary for society to treat the immoral men leniently, whilst no mercy is shown to immoral women. A man, either lawyer, doctor, banker, or author, may go into society, though his domestic conduct be very blamable, for that is a thing apart, but a woman can never be disassociated from her private life.

The Churchman's Family Magazine contains the first part of "Notes on the Anglo-American Church," and we regret that the subject is not treated at greater length. The history of the American Episcopal Church may well encourage those who think the Church of England in danger from the attacks lately made upon her by those who ought to have been her zealous defenders. When Englishmen went to America as colonists they carried their religion with them, but strange to say, they were denied the privilege of a bishop—Virginia and Maryland being included in the See of London—and consequently no one could be ordained without crossing the Atlantic, which was in those days a formidable undertaking; and the baptismal service became a reproach, because it was a palpable absurdity to enjoin sponsors to bring children to the Bishop for confirmation, seeing that there was not a Bishop on the continent. It would not be a fair inference from this that there was a lack of Christian zeal in the Establishment. The missionary work of the clergy in America was severe and trying, yet missionaries were never wanting. But there was about the same jealousy against extending the episcopacy to the New World as there would have been in so extending the Parliament. The bench of Bishops was regarded as a body politic and the special bulwark of the throne. Our profession of faith was catholic but our ecclesiastical system was national, and a hundred years ago the term national did not embrace our colonies. In addition to this grievance, the Episcopalians in America had to suffer a relentless persecution at the hands of the Puritans. Those advocates of liberty of conscience prohibited the use of the Common Prayer, and banished from the colony those who used it. "Not only Churchmen, but Seculars, were punished. To be convicted of being a Quaker was to incur the loss of an ear (by statute); a second conviction and a third involved further mutilation. And the boring through the tongue with a red-hot iron—even death—was inflicted upon many. Anabaptists were whipped and fined; the observance of Saints' days, and, curiously enough, the making of mince-pies, prohibited." Nevertheless, in spite neglect from England and the persecution of the Puritans, the Anglo-American Church was increasing in numbers at the time of the declaration of Independence, to which period the present article brings us.

"Servitude for Life," (a brief dialogue), by Mr. J. M. Ludlow, appears in Macmillan, and is, we suppose, intended as a reply to Mr. Carlyle's American Iliad. "Thou mayst make a great noise, but thy braying will never be like the roaring of the lion." Mr. Ludlow is vain enough to suppose that he can reply to T. C. in T. C.'s peculiar style. A reference to page 389 of Macmillan will show that Mr. Ludlow's vanity is infinitely greater than his ability.

Besides the continuation of Mr. Ainsworth's romance and the second part of a story entitled "Six Weeks at Hunsdon Manor," there are several pleasant contributions in Bentley. There is a smart chapter on the incredibility of history, but we incline to think that the present historical scepticism is more ridiculous than our former credulity. It is better to have the gold, even if we cannot get it quite free from dross.

London Society continues its sketches of "London Editors and Reporters," including in the present number a notice of Woodfall and Perry, the pioneers of our system of parliamentary reporting. Perry was first engaged on the Advertiser, and to that journal he devoted all his time and talents for a guinea a week. London Society is good, considering the season, but like all its contemporaries is palpably affected by the prevailing dullness.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

RICHMOND, July 25.

THE week has been singularly quiet. In no quarter of the Confederacy, so far as we know, has there been any serious shock of arms. Perfect quietude has reigned in the Capital, unbroken by even so much as a startling rumour. The pause in stirring events affords us the opportunity of reading the detailed accounts of those sanguinary operations, the announcement of which by telegraph so excited the public mind during the previous fortnight.

The fighting at Gettysburg on Friday the 3rd of July was the bloodiest that the war, so full of gory conflicts, has yet witnessed. Our loss was certainly greater on that day than we have anywhere before experienced. It is admitted that the attempt to dislodge the enemy from the formidable position they occupied beyond the town was a mistake, and yet there is little doubt that had Pickett's division been properly supported in its final charge, or had it embraced all the brigades which belong to it, the result would have been different. Two of these brigades, that of General Corse and that of General Jenkins, were on other services. Otherwise, the battle of Gettysburg might have been decisive of the war. Lee might have dictated terms of peace in Washington or Baltimore, and the reverses of the South-West would have given us as little concern at this moment as last year's clouds. But the discussion of the "might have been" is as idle in warfare as in love. We have only to look to actual results, and consider the future as they bear upon it. Calmly regarded, there is nothing in the failure of General Lee's plans in the recent invasion of Yankee territory to dispirit the Confederate people. It was neither a defeat nor a disaster. It resembled rather one of Paul Morphy's tours de force on the chess-board, in which his attack has been foiled, but which has left him in good heart and with pieces enough to bring his adversary ultimately to checkmate. General Lee just escaped achieving a success that would have been conclusive of the whole struggle. As it is, we have lost many gallant spirits, but the noble army which the enemy so much dreads is intact, crowned with the éclat of imperishable deeds, and ready to strike the blow which shall annihilate the foe whenever that foe shall engage it in the open field. To this moral advantage must be added large material advantages of the invasion. A wagon-train, thirty-five miles in length, was safely brought across the Potomac. Immense droves of cattle, and several thousand horses were driven over at the same time. For three weeks, General Lee subsisted his army upon the enemy, and the troops themselves, throwing off the listlessness of the camp, gained in health and animal spirits by active campaigning in a cultivated, breezy, and salubrious region of country.

Jackson, having been evacuated by General Johnston, and occupied by the army of General Grant, has in turn been abandoned by the enemy. The great body of Grant's troops are on their way northward, and it is supposed that the purpose now is to assail Richmond with an overpowering force from the south side, while a simultaneous attack is attempted upon the often tried route of Manassas. It seems probable now that Mobile will not be invested, and Richmond is the only other point for the employment of this North-western army. Three weeks will determine whether this conjecture is well founded.

The assault upon Battery Wagner made on Saturday, the 18th inst., was boldly conceived and daringly adventured. From daybreak until eight o'clock, P.M., a terrible cannonade had been kept up by the fleet of iron-clads upon the fortification, with little damage to the works or the garrison, our loss being only four men killed and fourteen wounded. Four monitors, two mortar-boats, and the ironclads united in this bombardment, and the fire was so tremendous as to shake the windows of the houses in Charleston. Scarcely ten seconds intervened throughout the day without some deafening discharge, and as the evening shadows gathered over the bay, a circle of flame might be seen around the end of Morris Island. The enemy's calculation had been that this furious incessant thundering maintained for so many hours, if it did not make serious breaches in the outer wall of the fort, would so dishearten and demoralise the garrison, that they would make but feeble resistance to the storming party to be sent against it at nightfall. But they soon discovered their mistake, when, advancing in the dusk of evening, they received from the line of the parapet a hail of bullets which carried death through their ranks and strewed the sand with the corpses of the foremost assailants. Again and again the heavy columns came forward only to be swept down by the well-directed volleys of General Taliaferro's unflinching marksmen, until at last a considerable body of the Yankees, who had escaped the bullets, ascended the wall and engaged in a hand-to-hand encounter with the defenders of the stronghold. The struggle was desperate but momentary. In two minutes' time, the last of the storming party had been hurled into the ditch below, and the columns that had advanced half an hour before, with such insolent confidence of assured victory, were flying through the darkness in terror and confusion. Our loss during this weary Saturday was twenty-four killed and seventy wounded. The loss of the enemy was probably not far from 2,000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners. 800 bodies were buried by our troops under flag of truce. There are 300 wounded prisoners in the hospitals at Charleston. 94 privates and 6 officers belonging to white regiments, and 20 negroes belonging to Colonel Shaw's famous black regiment have been sent to the military prisons in this city. Colonel Putnam, of New Hampshire, formerly of the Topographical Engineers in the old United States army, acting as brigadier-general, and Colonel Robert G. Shaw, of Boston, commanding the negroes, were killed in the attack. In lamenting the dead who fell in the Fort and in exchanging congratulations upon the glorious result, the Carolinians indulge a sentiment of deep regret, shared by their brethren throughout the Confederacy, that the gallant and gifted Langdon Cheves, who constructed the works at Fort Wagner, could not have lived to witness the noble and successful defence of them. He was killed several days previously by the explosion of the first shell thrown from the enemy's fleet.

Since this disastrous repulse, no second attempt has been made to carry Fort Wagner by storm. The fire of the Monitors has been kept up continuously from day to day, but without effecting any decided injury to the defences. It is asserted by our engineers and now admitted by the enemy that the reduction of Fort Wagner would not, as was at first supposed, render the reduction of Sumter an easy undertaking. A concentrated fire of 150 heavy guns could be brought to bear upon Fort Wagner from Charleston harbour—a fire quite sufficient to prevent the Yankees from erecting other works or placing other guns in position at that point.

On Saturday, the 18th instant, a cavalry raid of the enemy was made upon Wytheville, on the line of the Virginia and Tennessee railroad, by a force 1,000 strong, under command of one Colonel Toland, of Ohio, the same who, eighteen months ago, paid $500 out of his own pocket for a horse to be presented to himself by his friends for gallantry, &c., as a means of obtaining for himself a commission as brigadier-general, and caused his photographic likeness, in the style of the carte de visite, to be printed on his official envelopes and at the top of his regimental orders. The worthy Toland had calculated on meeting with no resistance in Wytheville, and thought to destroy the property there, with the railroad depots, &c., without rebel molestation. His surprise may be imagined when his first charge through the streets was met by a shower of musket balls, which sent his horsemen flying in precipitation the other way. The Confederate force did not exceed 120 men, and was wholly made up of militia and citizens. Toland was killed in the first fusillade, and will never be brigadier of Lincoln's; another colonel and a major also fell at the same moment. The fight was maintained obstinately from street to street for two hours, when the superior numbers of the Yankees enabled them, acting as infantry, to overcome the militia and compel them to retire. During the night the raiders burned the county gaol and the offices of the commissary and quartermaster, and in the morning they departed. Their loss was ten killed and twenty-five wounded, the latter being prisoners in our hands. The spirited defence of Wytheville will have a highly salutary effect in teaching the Yankee cavalry in Virginia a lesson of prudence. Since the fight there, we have learned that the whole of Toland's force has been captured at a point north-west of Wytheville.

A much more serious and successful raid was made by a smaller body of Yankee troopers on the 20th of July upon Rocky Mount, a station on the line of the Weldon and Wilmington railroad. They tore up the track for a considerable distance, burned the railroad bridge over the Tar River, destroyed a large cotton factory and its valuable machinery, and took 5,000 bales of cotton, which, being unable to carry it off, they reduced to ashes. Besides this they captured a train on the Tarboro' branch of the Wilmington road, in which they found two carloads of ammunition and 30,000 lbs. of bacon. This they also destroyed. There being no military of ours within striking distance at the time of these outrages to prevent or punish their commission, the Yankees, who were about 600 in number, went back safely, after accomplishing their purpose, to the sea-coast, whence they came.

The Lincoln Government threatens that in the event of the execution of Captains Sawyer and Flynn, now under sentence of death in the Libby prison in this city, as a measure of retaliation for the hanging of two Confederate recruiting officers in Ohio by General Burnside, General W. H. Fitzhugh Lee (son of the Confederate Commander-in-Chief) and Captain Winder (son of General Winder, commanding Department of Henrico in this city), shall share the same fate. General Lee and Captain Winder are now in close confinement in Fortress Monroe. This menace has excited much feeling here, where our brave unfortunate officers are much beloved. I am wholly ignorant of the purpose of the Administration here in this delicate and solemn matter. I am sure that President Davis was most reluctant to resort to measures of retaliation in the beginning, and that he will not take the lives of Captains Sawyer and Flynn without an earnest attempt to save them by an understanding with the Lincoln Government upon the whole subject of unmilitary outrages and palpable violations of the usages of civilized warfare. The visit of Vice-President Stephens to Fortress Monroe, which would have been extended to Washington, but for the prohibition of the Federal authorities, was designed, as you know, to effect this purpose. But I am equally sure that no threats of the Yankee President will move President Davis one hair's breadth from what he conceives to be the line of his duty, and were his own son in a Federal fortress, he would none the less execute the two officers who have been allotted to the gallows should he consider the public interest demanded it. Upon the enemy, who have set at defiance all the restraints of humanity and of civilization in their treatment of Confederate prisoners and non-combatants, rests the responsibility, should the strife become one of merciless destruction to "all ages, sexes, and conditions." The New York Tribune boasts in a recent issue that "thirty-two splendid mansions" were lately burned to the ground by black and white regiments in South Carolina, and a Washington correspondent of the New York press telegraphs from the Federal capital that "thousands of rebel wounded (from Gettysburg), are yet unprovided with shelter or surgical treatment." Let the intelligent Englishman decide which belligerent will be to blame should the black flag be raised, and the struggle in America become one of unparalleled horrors!

General Kemper was not killed at Gettysburg, but lies dangerously wounded in the hands of the enemy. General Armistead is reported as having died of his wounds in the neighbourhood of the town a few days after the battle. General Pettigrew was not hurt on the field, but was killed, almost instantly, in a skirmish on the Potomac, while guarding the rear of Lee's columns on their return. His remains have been sent to South Carolina.

Mrs. Reagan, the estimable wife of the Postmaster-General, died in this city on the 22nd instant.

The weather is excessively warm, but the general health of the country is good, and little fever has appeared in the army.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, September 1.

THE report that Mr. Seward had protested in the name of the Northern States of the late American Union against the establishment of a monarchy in Mexico, is somewhat strengthened by a series of articles which have appeared in all the papers on this subject. As far as I have been able to learn, no formal document has been presented by Mr. Dayton, but the substance of an official conversation at Washington has been forwarded by the French Minister there. On Saturday the Patrie had an article on the Monroe doctrine and Mexico, which was followed next morning by a leader in the Constitutionnel, from the pen of M. Limayrac, which may be regarded as the expression of official opinions. Everyone knows how carefully M. Limayrac avoids language which could be interpreted to say more than is wished. Speaking of the circular of the 3rd of March, sent by Mr. Seward to the Northern agents in Europe, he says:—

The Secretary of State at Washington bases his reasoning on a strange confusion of ideas. According to him American society is one, entirely one, and Mexico must, therefore of necessity feel the same vocation for Republican Government that the United States do. There are here as many errors as words. Unity is far from existing on the American continent, and there are to be found there as many different tendencies as there are different races. Mr. Seward should have shown that the political mind of Mexico was the same as that of the United States, by proving first that the Anglo-Saxon has the same habits of thought and feeling as the Latin race. Even then all would not have been proved, for he must next have explained how the Republican form of Government has produced prosperity in the United States and ruin in Mexico.

A little reflection will lead to a more logical conclusion. By what right can a country where the people is sovereign, the land par excellence of self-government, object to leave a neighbouring people free to choose the government that suits it? Are not the United States on friendly terms with the Empire of Brazil? Why then should they fear the establishment of a second empire which would open to their commerce and manufactures a new market? Such feelings would be contrary to their principles and interests, and we have too good an opinion of the cleverness and liberality of the United States to doubt that when the first surprise is got over, they will acknowledge that France has done her duty in this matter, and that Mexico has the right to do in it as she pleases.

The Siecle and other papers of the same colour of course think it only "natural" that the Republican Government of Washington is alarmed at the establishment of a monarchy in Mexico, the more so, if it be true that one of the first acts of this Government will be to recognise the South."

There seems no doubt that there is great want of cordiality in the present attitude of the French and North American Governments, and everything tends to show that it is not likely to improve. The Emperor has taken the first opportunity to communicate officially with the Government at Richmond in sending his formal thanks for assistance rendered to a French man-of-war by the Confederate authorities, and the proverb says that the first step is the most difficult. It has been taken very adroitly and in a way which rendered no communications with allies necessary, while it lost none of its significance. The dearth of cotton which is daily more and more felt in France, while for the first time for many years Europe is independent of the agricultural produce of the North, may soon lead to fresh communications. The Congress of the Princes at Frankfurt has also produced an incident which shows an ominous readiness to give and take offence. The American consul hoisted the Mexican flag by the side of the stars and stripes during the gala days. The French Minister, when his remonstrances were unlistened to, lodged a protest against the usurpation with the local Government.

The Polish question, although the newspapers continue to devote a large space to telegrams and letters professing to come from the seat of the insurrection, is decidedly put aside for the present. The Patrie of last night announces in large type that Russia has sent fresh instructions to the Ambassador in Paris, that a constitution is about to be given to the whole Russian empire, and that Poland is to receive more extensive privileges than the notes of the three Powers demanded. The presence of the Prince of Hohenzollern at Chalons is said to be connected with this new phase of things. In a second note the Patrie declines the responsibility of this news, but adds that the delay in the publication of the last French note in the Moniteur gives some confirmation of its truth. The solution thus given to a difficulty which a month ago seemed to threaten a general war will, no doubt, be satisfactory to public opinion in Europe, but it will not satisfy the radical party, which has done so much to stir up popular passion, and if one-half of the news published as coming from Poland be true, we may doubt whether these or any other concessions will suffice to disarm the insurgents. As a practical answer to the accusations of cruelty brought against the Russian authorities, the Nord, the Russian organ here, publishes a long list of men and women hanged or tortured by the insurgents. The only thing that seems certain in the news from Poland is, that the direction of the movement has passed from the hands of the aristocratic to those of the democratic party.

The Emperor returned to St. Cloud last Wednesday, and has presided at the Cabinet Councils. Of course nothing positive is known of the subjects deliberated on, but rumour points to Mexico and America as having furnished the matter in debate. This much is probably true, but there is little likelihood that anything was settled regarding the time for recognising the independence of the Southern Confederacy. Public opinion has long been prepared for this step, but the exigencies of diplomacy which have so long delayed it may still retard the action of France. From information I have just received, I am inclined to think there is truth in the report that the new Government in Mexico will be the first to recognise its neighbour. The French Government perhaps considers this the most eligible way of introducing the new Power to the notice of diplomatic Europe.

The Presse of this evening expresses itself as follows on the Monroe doctrine:—

No one is more opposed than ourselves to political intervention; but we are consequent and do not limit the application of our principles to one hemisphere. Had President Monroe raised himself to a higher sphere of thought, free from petty covetousness and narrow ambition, had he thought, not of America only, but of all humanity; had he invoked, not a privilege, but a right; had he claimed non-intervention in the name of a principle, in general terms, we should be the first to applaud him. But to base a principle on egotism, privilege, and isolation, this is what we cannot understand. Why should America be excepted from intervention more than Asia, or Africa? And why does America, which throws in our teeth this declaration, show herself so ready to contradict it in practice with her military expeditions to Japan, China, and elsewhere? The events of the last years have unfortunately proved that the Monroe doctrine was far from being absolutely disinterested. In proclaiming it, the United States were animated by a secret covetousness, demonstrated by repeated annexations, or attempts at them. American liberty inspires us with sympathy; but this cannot blind us to such contradictions in practice. When truth speaks, sympathy must be silent. It is because we love the liberty of the transatlantic Republics that we grieve to see it disfigured by such stains.

The France, after explaining that the Monroe doctrine, under cover of claiming "America for the Americans," in fact means America for the North Americans, goes on:—

There are many things wanting to this theory before it can become part of the law of nations. It wants the acquiescence of the States of the Old World and the approbation of the people of the New one.

"It is a brave thing to stick a pole in the middle of a road, with notice of 'No Passage this way,' but you must make sure that the passengers will obey your injunctions, unless you are strong enough to enforce submission. But Europe has never accepted the Monroe doctrine, or even done it the honour of discussing it.

As to the population of America, especially those of South America, as the Monroe doctrine in its application to them is simply a pretext for invasion or absorption by the United States, and as they neither wish to be invaded nor absorbed, they have put little store by the political maxims which are in such favour at Washington.

"America for the Americans" is a very good cry so long as it pleases the people of America to be governed by men of the New World. But by what right can the United States pretend to impose their institutions and Government in Mexico, Brazil, La Plata, Peru, Canada, if these countries wish for other institutions and other governors? The principle of national independence will ever rise superior to this tyrannical Monroe doctrine.

It is an insult to modern civilisation. The Chinese walls of exclusiveness are falling in the extreme East amid the applause of all enlightened nations, and the American Democracy seeks to rebuild them in the New World! And whilst the spirit of liberty and progress tends to bind together and unify modern societies, the American republicans seek to segregate them in savage isolation.

It might have been the policy of the red-skins and ancient savages of the New world, but that it should be proclaimed by that enormous mass of Europeans who have invaded America, and have nothing American but the name, would be madness, if it were anything but fantastical eccentricity.

And yet the American newspapers write gravely about the Monroe doctrine in connection with recent events in Mexico.

The Pays, which is considered to be M. Drouyn de Lhuys' organ, in the article signed "Villars," has the following on the reported Russo-American treaty.

Among the many rumours which have circulated in the last few days, we must remark that of an offensive and defensive alliance between Russia and the United States.

We may first observe that the newspapers which have contributed to spread the report, have no other grounds for the story than mere rumour. No authentic document has been brought forward in support of their allegations.

Let us for the sake of argument admit that such a treaty has been planned. Which of the two Powers would it serve? What effect could it have?

If Russia were engaged in a continental war, what assistance could it receive from America? What forces could the United States place at its disposal, and how could they be brought into the field?

If, on the other hand, the United States had declared war against France and England, could a Russian fleet force the Sound, guarded as it would be by French and English fleets? If Russia even had the hope of accomplishing this, would she weaken Cronstadt and uncover her ports and shores, to send her forces to the succour of her allies in the Atlantic?

Nothing, on the one hand, indicates that the treaty in question exists, or has ever existed or been thought of; on the other, if signed, could be of no practical use.

In fine, the facts we have elsewhere referred to, (an understanding on the subject of Poland between Russia, Prussia, and France), and which seems to alter the respective positions of Russia and France, render unimportant the rumours of a treaty concluded between the former power and the United States. It is enough that we have stated what value we attach to these reports. We should scruple to take up our reader's time by saying more about them.

AFFAIRS, FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, September 3.

Notwithstanding the Bank returns are becoming weekly more favourable, the rate of money continues so well supported, within a fraction of the official minimum, that it is questioned whether the Directors will possess sufficient courage to reduce the terms of discount. The tendency is undoubtedly in that direction; and some few sanguine parties think the alteration is not far off, and, if a change is likely to take place throughout the next month or six weeks, that it will in all probability be almost immediately effected. Should a variation be deferred to the date of the October dividends, the Directors will have been induced to stay their hands because they decline to be instrumental in encouraging speculation, which for the instant seems destined to revive, particularly in the foreign stock department. The absorption of capital for harvest operations has been considerable the last four or five weeks, but in addition it is now generally admitted that business in Manchester and Liverpool has been pushed forward vigorously, leading to the use of a largely increased proportion of accommodation. The Board of Trade returns indicate a steady improvement in most branches, and with the end of the year the comparison of our mercantile progress will not be discouraging. New Loans are talked of for Turkey, Portugal, and some other countries; there will also be an endeavour to launch fresh projects associated with banking and miscellaneous adventures, but the great object will be to regulate these affairs in such a manner as not to interfere with the already augmented condition of the stock and share markets, otherwise a disturbance will be induced, which cannot fail to end in embarrassment. The terms for the negotiation of first-class paper are, 3½ to 4 per cent.; the Joint Stock Banks do not make advances under 3½ per cent., but it is nevertheless at the same time admitted that the bankers and brokers are not short of capital, being altogether, on the average, well supplied.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

Gold continues to be sent into the Bank to a large extent, the amount taken this week, including £65,000 to-day, being £425,000. On the other hand, there have not been any withdrawals. The arrivals of bullion have also been large—viz., £576,909; of this only £68,846 is from America, the remainder being from the West Indies and the Brazils. Of that from the West Indies £202,994 was in gold, and £261,579 silver. There has been a fair demand for bar silver for transmission to the East, and the price remains steady at 5s. 6d. per ounce. There have been more inquiries for Mexican dollars, a quantity having been required for China, and the price has consequently advanced to 5s. 3½d. per ounce. There is still only one gold ship at present reported to be on its way from Australia—viz., the Anglesea, with £145,000. The Ripon steamer, which sailed to-night, takes out £113,181 for India and China.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 40,00,000 rupees in Bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were—to Calcutta, 22,70,000 rupees, to Bombay, 16,00,000 rupees, and to Madras, 1,30,000 rupees. The declared minimum price was as before, 1s. 11½d. per rupee on Calcutta, and 1s. 11½d. on Bombay and Madras. The applications within the limits amounted to 295 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta at 1s. 11½d. will receive about 41 per cent.; on Bombay at 1s. 11½d. about 85 per cent. All above these prices and all tenders on Madras will receive in full.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The market for English Securities has been exceedingly buoyant, although there has not been any particular activity as regards dealings. The more favourable aspect of the Polish question, with greater confidence on the Paris Bourse, and the satisfactory results of the harvest, all combine to keep up prices. Consols closed this evening at an improvement of ¼ per cent. as compared with this day week, being at 93½ to 94 for both money and account. There is, however, not the slightest variation in Exchequer Bills, the price remaining at 1s. 10d. to 2s. prem. In Foreign Securities a rather considerable business has been transacted, with a general tendency towards a further improvement in values. Greek Stock has been largely dealt in, the accounts from Athens being looked upon as more satisfactory, consequently quotations have advanced between 2 and 3 per cent. The dealings in Mexican have also been to a considerable extent, a speculative movement having again become apparent in consequence of the report of a new loan being in contemplation, in which France, it is said, will take an interest. The Emperor of the French, it is also reported, is acting in perfect accord with the Government of this country, and has arranged for the organisation of the civil service in Mexico to protect the revenue and regulate its distribution. There has consequently been a further advance in the stock of from 1 to 1½ per cent. Spanish Stocks remain comparatively steady, but with a tendency to improve, and in most descriptions of Turkish an advance has been established. The latest quotations were—Greek, 36½ to 37; Mexican, 39½ to 40; Spanish Passives, 34½ to 35½, and the Certificates, 13½ to 13¾; Turkish Old Six per Cents., 93½ to 94½, and the New do., 70 to 70½.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Again there has been a very large business transacted in American Government and Railway Securities, but the variation in prices has not been to any great extent—the chief alterations having occurred on the arrival of the respective mails from New York, and the rise or fall has been according to the reading of the news, whether favourable or otherwise. The only exception has been in the case of Erie Shares, which had oscillated between 75½ and 84. The following are the dealings recorded:—United States Six per Cents., 76½, 76½, and 76½. Do. Five per Cents., 69. Virginia State Six per Cents., 41½. Atlantic and Great Western Railway (New York Section), 75. Do. do. (Pennsylvania Section), 75, 75½, 76½, 75½, 76, 76½, 76½, 76½, 76½, 77, 76½, and 77½. Erie Shares, $100 all paid, 73½, 76½, 77, 84, 83, 82½, 82, 84, 84½, and 83½. Do. Seven per Cent. Preference, 74½. Illinois Central Seven per Cent., 81½ and 81. Do. $100 Shares, $90 paid 10½, 10½, 8, 9, 8½, 9, 8½, 9, 8½, and 8 dis. Do., do., all paid, 79½, 80, 80½, 80, 81½, 82, 80½, 81½, 80½, 81½, and 81½. Michigan, Seven per Cent. (Sinking Fund), 81½. New York Central, Six per Cent., 74. Do. do. Seven per Cent., 65. Do. do., $100 Shares, 87½, 88, 87½, 89½, 90, 89½, 90, 89, 89½, and 90. Pennsylvania, $50 Shares, 44, 44½, and 44½. Do., Six per Cents., 73½, and Philadelphia and Reading, $50 Shares, 40.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

Soon after our last issue, a renewal of bear sales caused a decline in the value of this loan. It was, however, of short duration, and the gradual absorption of the stock by the public in moderate amounts is exercising the natural influence of steadying prices. On the 1st inst. the dividend of £3 10s. 1d. became due; and the stock has been since dealt in at 26 to 25 dis. ex div. To-day the market has ruled dull, and the closing price is 28 to 27 dis. ex div. On the 1st September an instalment of 15 per cent. on the dividend was paid. On the 1st October the last instalment of 15 per cent. becomes due.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Business in the Railway Share Market has not been particularly active during the week, and the fluctuations in prices have not been to any material extent. There was a great want of animation in the early part of the week, which is to be in some measure accounted for by the half-monthly settlement then in progress. There has since been rather more doing, but nothing of a speculative movement is apparent. The only alterations of any moment have been an advance in Caledonian, Midland, and North British of about 1 per cent.; of ½ per cent. in Chatham and Dover and South-Western, and in Great Western and Sheffield, of about ½ per cent. But in Great Eastern and Lancashire and Yorkshire there has been a decline of ½ per cent. In Foreign Railway Shares, although there has not been a great deal doing, the general tone of business is good, and prices are fairly supported. In the Shares of British Possessions the demand has been tolerably good, at steady quotations for nearly all descriptions.

BANKING AMALGAMATION.

An announcement has just been made that the Union Bank of England and France are about to amalgamate with the English, Belgian, and Netherlands Bank, which possesses a powerful directorate, and an influential connexion in Holland and Belgium. The amalgamation will not only consolidate the various interests, but will put an end to any anticipated rivalry, and also raised the united capital to £2,000,000 sterling. The first ordinary meeting of the Union Bank of England and France will take place on the 14th inst., when it is expected the details will be made public.

THE GENERAL CREDIT COMPANY.

It is announced that a combination has been entered into between the General Credit Company of London and the Credit Anstalt of Austria, the latter company having already been established between six and seven years, with a paid-up capital amounting to about £6,000,000 sterling. It is provided that each company is to have the option of subscribing for one-fifth share in whatever undertaking the other may introduce and they are to act as agents for each other, the one throughout the Austrian dominions and the other throughout Great Britain, her colonies and dependencies.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The only Joint Stock undertaking brought forward this week has been Martin's Patent Anchor Company, which is established to manufacture and provide anchors of a novel description, patented some time since by a Mr. Martin, and for which he obtained a medal at the recent International Exhibition. Its chief improvements over the anchors in present use are, that it takes hold instantly, and with a holding power 100 per cent. greater than ordinary anchors; it can neither foul nor become fouled, and is also much lighter and cheaper. The required capital is £50,000, to be raised in 10,000 shares of £5 each.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the general half-yearly meeting of the Victoria (London) Dock Company, Mr. C. Morrison in the chair, the report of the directors was adopted, but there was no dividend declared. It appeared from the report that during the past half-year 1,417 ships, measuring 503,775 tons, entered the docks, showing a decrease of 130 ships and 48,489 tons as compared with the corresponding six months of last year. The falling off is accounted for by the decrease in colliers and coasting vessels, amounting to 171 and measuring 68,014 tons. The question of compensation with regard to the steelyard premises had been referred to arbitration, and the directors of the Charing Cross Railway Company, in consideration of having immediate possession thereof, had paid a deposit of £25,000. They had finished the improvements for increasing their security against fire.—At the half-yearly meeting to-day of the Canada Agency Association an ad-interim dividend at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum was declared.—At the half-yearly meeting of the Railway Passengers Assurance Company, also held to-day, a very satisfactory report was presented and accepted, and a dividend at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum declared.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The suspension was announced on Monday of Messrs. Jonathan Brandon and Co., engaged in the Brazilian trade. Their liabilities are expected to reach about £50,000.—The suspension of Messrs. Long and Ralte, of Mining-lane, was made known yesterday by a circular transmitted to their creditors, in which they say that "in consequence of our late partner, Mr. Robert Thomas Wallace, having fraudulently accepted and in combination with other parties circulated a number of bills of exchange, in the name of our former partnership of Long, Wallace, and Ralte, and as we are ignorant of the full amount of such bills now in circulation we regret we are obliged to suspend payment."

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In the Produce Markets the variations have been trifling since our last, but the general tendency has been in the direction of increased dullness. Meanwhile the clearances, both for consumption and export, are of sufficient magnitude to indicate a healthy undercurrent of trade, and to promise a speedy recovery of the demand to its recent moderate proportions. The only exception to the present quiet tone is in the Cotton Market, which, influenced still by the progressive improvement in the manufacturing departments, is continuously active, with prices again 1d. to 1d. per lb. higher. The weather having become less favourable for harvesting, the depression in our corn trade has ceased, and American wheat and flour, in common with other descriptions, are firmer at the currency of last week. The Provision markets have become dull throughout. Beef is firmly held, stocks being light. In bacon scarcely anything is doing. Most kinds of foreign butter have fallen considerably, the rains having favoured production. The nominal quotations of American are accordingly reduced 2s. per cwt. Petroleum continues in demand, and is again the turn dealer, refined Pennsylvania bringing 2s. 4½d. on the spot, and 2s. 5½d. for winter delivery. Sperm oil is unsaleable, except at 20s. per ton decline. There is not, however, any great pressure to realise, the improvement in our cotton manufacturing trades being in favour of consumption. Lined oil is also the turn cheaper. With continued heaviness in the tallow trade, North American imports of common qualities are 3d. to 6d. lower. American lard at the moment attracts very little attention. Tobacco is still firmly held, although purchased only for absolute and pressing orders. The present high rates for American are, however, regarded with less confidence, as they are causing traders to fill up their orders as far as possible from other descriptions. American spirits of turpentine are quoted 98s. to 100s.; but with French offering at 64s. these figures are quite nominal. Fine American rosin is firm at 30s., to 37s., and common at 23s. to 31s. per cwt. Gums of all kinds maintain their value. A parcel of Gedda has been brought on offer this week, but being held above market rates is still undisposed of. Drugs generally meet a fair demand, several additional orders having, it is said, come to hand from Russia. Camphor has risen to £7 12s. 6d. per cwt. for China. Turkey opium is also rather dearer. American oil of peppermint remains without essential change, and meets a moderate inquiry. In chemicals a fair demand has prevailed for all the preparations of soda. Iodine maintains the recent advance. Dyes are in steady request, with prices of most descriptions firm. Turmeric has again risen considerably, as much as 40s. per cwt. having been paid for Bengal; but the market is now quieter, and the closing rate is 2s. under the highest point. The periodical sales of cochineal have passed off with considerable spirit; good Honduras silvers making 1d., and blacks 1d. to 2d. per lb. advances. For iron the demand is well sustained, and the exports are in excess of last year. Tin is dull of sale, and English is offering at £2 under the rates officially quoted.

The following are the current prices of the principal articles of American commerce with this country, compared with the rates current at this time last year:—

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, September 2.

A very large demand for cotton has again prevailed at Liverpool during the past week. All classes of buyers have continued to purchase heavily, and apparently with greater confidence than for some time previously, but the chief elements of strength have been the very favourable accounts with regard to the state of business at Manchester, and the equally satisfactory reports with regard to the issue of the harvest. The arrivals during the week have been very large, and the excitement amongst buyers has been considerable, owing in some measure to the low ebb to which the manufactured article has now come, not only at home, but in nearly all the foreign markets; consequently prices have had a strong advancing tendency on all descriptions. The latest official returns make the arrivals as follows:—From the East Indies 19,370 bales, of which 16,321 were from Bombay; from the East 8,189 bales; from Nassau 1,868 bales—this, of course, is American, the produce of the numerous fleet of blockade-runners, now running between the Confederate ports and Nassau, and from Lisbon 141 bales, making a total of 29,568 bales. Since this return, however, was made up, there have been additional arrivals, but of which no official account is yet given. The sales during the week have reached 59,000 bales, of which 27,000 were taken on speculation, and for export. The total sales this year have been 1,511,990 bales, against 2,111,340 bales in the corresponding period of last year; the total imports this year 990,072 bales, and 660,997 last year; there having been exported down to the present time this year 290,350 bales, and to the same period in 1862 300,183 bales, whilst there were taken for consumption 841,600 bales and 920,300 bales respectively. The computed stocks are about 247,450 bales, against 63,410 bales at the corresponding period last year. The latest closing quotations were—for American descriptions, 21½d. to 23d. Surat, 13½d. to 22d. Egyptian, 23d. to 24d. Pernambuco, 23½d. to 24½d. and Maranhão, 24d. to 24½d. The accounts just received from the Levant report the appearance of the cotton crops in the neighbourhood of the Dardanelles and Gallipoli to be very favourable.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, September 1.

Our market during the past week has been very excited, and a large amount of business has been transacted in almost all kinds of yarns and cloths, and in many cases, spinners and manufacturers are well under contract at the extreme rates paid by buyers. To-day business has been rather quiet as compared with the previous portion of the week; but this is owing to the almost independent position that producers have been placed in for a time, by the reduction of stocks during the past few days, and the contracts in hand, for future delivery. Much more business would have resulted had sellers been in a position to deliver in something like reasonable time. The advices from all our foreign markets are such as lead us to believe that a good demand will be kept up for some time.

(From Mr. Sam Mendel's Prices Current, September 1.)

MANCHESTER, September 1.

In America the war continues with unabated bitterness, and the end appears to be still far off; in the meantime the Federal operations do not appear to have released a supply of cotton, and we must evidently continue to depend on shipments from other sources, and it will be well if the result prove equal to the anticipations recently put forth as to the increase we are to have after the close of this year. After making allowances for the increased waste on Indian as compared with American staple, it will be evident that three days' working does not amount to half production, or this extent of wages for the operatives, and we can only anticipate the coming winter with apprehension of serious distress in this district; therefore, it is desirable to see preparation made in good time to meet the calamity, if required, and which there is too much ground to apprehend.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a marble Statue, heroic size, of the General for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "Stonewall" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

AMERICA.

BATTERY Wagner taught us that earthworks are an effectual defence against modern artillery. The fate of Fort Sumter proves that masonry, even when faced with cotton-bales and backed with sand-bags, is powerless to resist the attack of guns now in use, and it must be remembered that we have not yet arrived at perfection in heavy ordnance. At a distance of 2½ miles, 4,500 shots were fired at Sumter from a battery of Parrott guns, of which 2,623 took effect. At the latest advices, however, Sumter had not surrendered or been captured, and Colonel Rhett, with a few soldiers, kept the Confederate flag flying over the ruins. But though Sumter was destroyed, the Confederate fire was not slackened. Forts Moultrie, Gregg, and Johnson; the batteries on James' Island, whither the guns from Sumter have been moved; the battery on Sullivan's Island; and the Battery Wagner were continually belching forth shot and shell. All these must be silenced and taken before the Federals can claim the victory. On the 21st, General Gilmore shelled the city without giving due notice for the removal of the women and children. General Beauregard and the foreign consuls protested against this, and demanded more time. The City was shelled again on the 23rd.

Little is said about the Federal losses. Commander Rogers and Paymaster Woodbury were killed in the Catskill, but the total mortality in the fleet is carefully concealed. The land forces are suffering severely from sickness and from the Confederate fire. Whilst the draft is being enforced it is necessary to suppress such unpleasant details. The Federals may succeed in capturing the ruins of Charleston, but they will have to pay a terrible price for their triumph.

There is great dissatisfaction in the North at the slowness of the operations of the fleet, which consists altogether of forty vessels. How this fleet has been kept at bay we may gather from the fact that on the 23rd of August two blockade-runners entered Charleston.

Civilised nations have long discarded the maxim that all things are fair in war, and act upon the principle that only those deeds are lawful which injure the military power of the enemy. According to this rule, the shelling of Charleston was an act of wanton barbarity, for the destruction of that city could not in any way conduce to the capture of its defences. With equal right General Lee might have destroyed every town and hamlet in Pennsylvania through which his army passed. Then again, the use of "Greek fire"—that is, throwing shells filled with liquid and unquenchable fire—has been avoided by all civilised nations. The New York Daily News observes, "It has been left for this Administration, which claims to be waging war in the cause of philanthropy, to conjure up this liquid demon as a fit ally to their purpose of extermination." Can we wonder that throughout the South there is an outcry for retaliation, and that the Confederate soldiers are somewhat dissatisfied that they are not allowed to avenge themselves on the ruthless foe?

General Rosecrans attacked Chattanooga on the 21st August. Two steamers lying at the wharf were destroyed but the Confederate defences were uninjured. General Joseph Johnston was in command of the Confederates. We have no Southern account of the affair, but the Northerners admit the failure of the assault, and we expect that the oft-repeated story of "none killed and one wounded" is not quite correct.

It is stated that President Davis, after consulting with the Governors of the States, has called for 500,000 negro troops; the negroes to receive for their services their freedom and fifty acres of land at the end of the war. If this is true the numerical superiority is shifted to the side of the Confederates. The negroes, who hate and despise the Yankees almost as virulently as the Yankees hate and despise them, will fight bravely and zealously under the leadership of their masters. The negroes are at this juncture incensed at the brutal conduct of the Federal commanders to their coloured soldiers, and particularly with the barbarous neglect of negro families who have been left to starve and die. The Nashville correspondent of the New York Times says: "Women, old men and children, are in a sad condition; disease and disorder prevailing, and the poor creatures dying by the hundred." The negro-roasting in New York is not forgotten, and if President Davis gives the word, the coloured race will not be slow to avenge their wrongs.

A late private letter from Virginia contains the gratifying intelligence, that a very painful question is likely to have an unhopied for solution. It will be remembered that two Federal captains are held in Richmond under sentence of death, in retaliation for the two Confederate officers hung by Burnside in Kentucky, on the charge of recruiting in Federal territory. To prevent their execution, the Federals, by a sudden raid, succeeded in capturing two hostages: the wounded son of General Lee and also a son of General Winder. As it was not doubted that they would execute their threat of wreaking vengeance on these two officers, the President's duty, though clear, became peculiarly painful. It appears, however, according to the writer, that in the meantime two Federals have been captured in the act of recruiting on Confederate territory, precisely the same offence unjustly charged against Burnside's victims, and have been summarily executed. It is hoped, therefore, that the ends of justice will be considered as sufficiently obtained, and that the two officers in Richmond will be released from the doom overhanging them.

The Federal operations against New York are satisfactorily progressing. No wonder the drafting has hitherto proceeded without disturbance. Mr. Lincoln has sent a sufficient force to awe, at least for the moment, his "rebellious" subjects in the Empire City. The land forces at New York are estimated at 30,000 men, and to co-operate with the army there is a small but efficient fleet of gun-boats. No pains are spared by the Federal Government to provoke a conflict, and sooner or later it will succeed in so doing. Practically, New York is as completely under martial law and as subject to military authority as is New Orleans or Vicksburg.

The drafted Germans have held a meeting in New York, and denounced the conscription as inhuman. A committee was appointed to confer with Governor Seymour, and to take measures for testing the legality of the Act. Forcibly conscripting mercenaries is a novel measure. Does it ever occur to the Federal authorities that though a horse may be forced to the water he cannot be compelled to drink?

The Northern press is busily engaged in inventing recipes for cooking the hare of Southern "rebellion," quite unmindful of the well-known caution of the cookery-book, that the hare should first be caught. The New York World, the least rabid of the Northern papers, devotes its entire impression to lengthy essays on "The Conditions of Restoration," "Can the United States Treat with the Southern Confederacy for its Dissolution?" "Can the President release himself from the Emancipation Proclamation?" &c. Among other modes of settlement it suggests one which is the least foolish we have yet seen from a Northern source, viz., that the Southern war debt should be assumed by the Union, by exchanging the Confederate scrip at its market value for United States' Bonds; and it hints that this measure, "by its tendency to produce good feeling, would save an equivalent expense in maintaining troops in the South." All the other papers think the best way to weld together the fragments, when re-united, is by a foreign war, for which France or England, or both, would furnish the occasion ready made.

A strange story is current about four Confederate war vessels entering Wilmington during the last six weeks. The Federals have given the South a large fleet of phantom ships. One reason is, that the Federal navy can better contend with such vessels than with the Alabama and Florida; and watching phantom ships is a good excuse for safe inactivity.

We trust for the credit of human nature that the report of the horrid atrocities at Lawrence, Kansas, is at least a gross exaggeration. That it comes entirely from Northern sources makes it more than doubtful. If such crimes have been committed, the perpetrators were not Confederate officers or Confederate soldiers. That is not the way in which the South wages war.

Mr. Seward has addressed a very long circular to the United States consuls in Europe. The gist of it is, that the Federal arms are everywhere victorious; that the rebellion is nearly crushed out; and that the one thing needful for the restoration of peace is for foreign nations to withdraw their support and favour from the Confederates. Mr. Seward repeats his former letters with just a few changes of expression. There is, however, a trifling discrepancy between the present effusion and his reply to the French proposal of mediation. In February last, he described the "rebellion" as "an insurrectionary party which is located, and is chiefly adjacent to the shores of the Gulf of Mexico;" on the 12th of August, six months later, he observes that "no great progress has been made by our arms in the East," but that in the West "50,000 square miles have been reclaimed from the possession of the insurgents." The insurrectionary party must have been rather extensive.

According to the Morning Post of Tuesday, Earl Russell has "caved in" to Federal bullying, and is determined to detain the steam rams, upon the suspicion that the French firm for whom they are built may possibly sell them to the Confederates. Mr. Senior says, the Confederates want a war between England and the United States. If so, they ought to be particularly grateful to Earl Russell, for this "caving in" is sure to precipitate hostilities.

Some of the discharged volunteers are complaining of the treatment of the Federal War Department. They were, to suit the convenience of the Government, mustered out of service at periods varying from one to five weeks previous to the expiration of their term. Upon applying for their bounties they are told none are due, because they did not complete their term of service. This must be the blunder of some minor official. There is no reason why the Federal Government should swindle its volunteers. Greenbacks cost nothing.

The Federal Government, so says the New York Herald, "has selected an agent or agents to go to Europe to operate largely to augment the present tremendous volume of emigration hither." The word "additional" is wanting in this notice, for the Federal Government already has several active recruiting agents in Europe.

Governor Letcher has called an extra session of the Virginia Assembly for the 7th September, for the purpose of increasing the force of the militia and for, if possible, devising some remedy for the deterioration of the currency. In his proclamation, the Governor expresses his confidence in the patriotism and power of the people to repel the invader.

In the North the demand for war with France is becoming louder every day. The most insulting articles appear in the press about French institutions, French policy, and the French nation.

The Florida is still in Brest repairing damages. Neither threats nor insults can induce France to evince a warm neutrality for the North.

A steamer being loaded with ammunition at Vicksburg was blown up, owing to a negro letting fall a percussion shell. Out of 160 men on board only five escaped. As substitutes are rather scarce, and a man is worth from $300 to $500 in the North, the accident is regretted.

ENGLAND.

At a meeting held last week of the Mansion-house Committee, a letter was read from Dr. Lees, the Mayor of Ashton-under-Lyne, and Chairman of the Central Relief Committee, in reference to the condition of the operatives in that town. The letter stated that the committee had been compelled to curtail relief in a manner which produced great hardship and suffering to some hundreds of poor distressed operatives, who had previously had a share of the Mansion-house Fund. The men who had been connected with the classes until about two months ago were in extreme distress, and on applying to the Board of Guardians had been offered the workhouse, or oakum to pick as a labour test. Others who had never received parish relief were actually starving, and the committee had no means to relieve them. The harvest work would soon cease, and there was every prospect of increasing distress in Ashton. The public works would not employ 5 per cent. of the people wanting bread. Many manufacturers and owners of property were so reduced that compulsion would have to be resorted to for the payment of poor-rates. The shopkeepers were equally reduced, and the owners of cottages were paying rates by mortgages.

During the month of August, the emigrants conveyed in ships sailing under the Passengers' Act from Liverpool to the United States, numbered 493 cabin, and 6,477 steerage passengers; and in ships not sailing under the Act, there were 743 persons. The total number of emigrants during the present year up to the end of August, was 93,904, against 5,493 up to the same period of last year.

The colleague, and, as is usually supposed, the partner of Mr. Bright, in sentiments, in triumph, and in disaster, has turned out a defaulter. Member for the same borough of Birmingham, brought up as it were at the very feet of the Apostle of Republicanism in its wildest and most frantic form, of Northern Abolitionism, despotism, and avarice, Mr. Scholefield has avowed opinions diametrically opposed to those of Mr. Bright. He has been entertained at the Birmingham Retail Brewers' Protection Society, and has made a speech in which he has declared that the principal point on which he and his colleague differed was with respect to the American civil war. Mr. Bright looked upon it as a war for the emancipation of the slaves; he (Mr. Scholefield) thought that when an impartial history came to be written on the conflict, it must be stated to be, on the part of the North as against the South, the most cruel and causeless war that was ever waged by a powerful against a weaker nation. He believed that when men talked of emancipating the slaves by force of arms they talked of that which was the most difficult measure of emancipation that could possibly be. He hated slavery, but he believed from the bottom of his heart that slavery was not to be abolished by force of arms. It must be abolished by the same means which we, in this country, employed in our own colonies—by remonstrance, and by putting our hands in our pockets to compensate those whom we had induced by our own laws to consider slaves as their property.

The review season at Aldershot has come to a close, the last field-day having taken place on Thursday, the 3rd September. All those who are interested in the welfare of the English soldier will learn with pleasure that the Aldershot Mission-hall and Soldiers' Institute is finished. The first stone was laid in February last, by the Earl of Shaftesbury. The building is extremely handsome, in the early Anglo-Gothic style, and is furnished with a reading-room, smoking-room, library, coffee-bar, and other offices, together with a lecture-hall capable of accommodating 500 persons. The object of the Mission-hall is to furnish the soldier with methods of recreation calculated to prove more attractive than the vitiating temptations of the camp.

After the destruction of the Anglo-Saxon by the Confederate man-of-war, the Florida, her Majesty's paddle-sloop Geyser, Captain Pechell, proceeded to the coast of Ireland, to protect British interests in that direction. She cruised near Queenstown and the south-western coast, but saw nothing of the Florida, nor received any information concerning her. She has, therefore, returned to Davenport. The Florida is now lying in Brest Harbour repairing damages, and a notification has appeared in the Moniteur that the French Government has decided that the Florida shall be permitted to procure all necessities for placing her in a navigable state, but not munitions of war.

The sporting world has been entertained and the respectable world considerably shocked by a prize-fight between Mace, the ex-champion, and Goss of Wolverhampton. The fight was for the enormous sum of £1,000. It was fixed to take place at Wootton-Basset, in Wiltshire, and the company assembled for the special train at Paddington Station between two and four o'clock in the morning of Tuesday the 1st of September. A scene of lawless violence, disgraceful to a civilized country, took place at the railway station. A narrow lane for the ticket-holders was formed and guarded by an organised gang of pugilistic special constables. The fourteen carriages of the train were speedily filled with their 500 occupants who had secured places. In addition to these an enormous crowd of vagabonds was congregated about but outside the platform, and was kept in check by the pugilistic guard. These fellows, who had come partly to witness the departure and partly for more lucrative purposes, seized every person who entered the station and plundered him of his money and jewellery, using the utmost violence and shouting with derisive laughter. When the train was full the pugilistic guard was called off to take their places, and on their withdrawal a furious rush was made by the poorer ruffians to reach the train, and an attempt was made to burst the barricade. As the train drew off some twenty men jumped on the foot-boards and clung to the carriages. Soon after the ring had been formed at Wootton-Basset, and before the fight had commenced in earnest, the police appeared, and the company beat a retreat to the railway, returned to London, and proceeded by ordinary train to Purfleet. About five o'clock in the afternoon the ring was again formed, and the fight commenced. Nineteen rounds were necessary to decide the contest, and in the last round Goss was knocked into a state of insensibility.

A lady, a native of London and the wife of an English gentleman and afterwards of the Count de Silly, died in October last, and in her will made a bequest in these words:—"I give and bequeath to Her Majesty the Queen of England a sum of 100,000*l.*, to be employed for the benefit of the London poor." The Queen decided to accept the legacy, and thereupon the general legatees required the signature of Her Majesty to be affixed to a formal document and summoned her to appear. The case came before the Tribunal of the Seine. The general legatees argued that the legacy must be paid to the Queen personally, and that she must become the almoner of the sum left at her disposal. Consequently, the Queen ought to sign a special procuration; on the other side it was argued that the money should be paid to the Ambassador, and a case was cited in which a legacy to the Pope had been paid to the Nuncio. The President of the Tribunal, M. de Beniost-Champy, decided in favour of Her Majesty, declaring that an ambassador represented his sovereign in a supreme degree, and that all he said and did was substantially said and done by his sovereign.

It seems that the want of a Church Parliament, in the most ample sense of the words, is making itself felt in England. The Houses of Convocation are insufficient for the purpose. They can scarcely be said to represent the general body of the clergy or the laity in any manner. In view of this defect in the Church system it has been decided to hold a congress of clergy and laity under the auspices of the Earl of Derby, the Duke of Marlborough, Lords Ebury and Lyttelton, Lord John Manners, M.P., Mr. Bazley, M.P., Mr. C. Buxton, M.P., Mr. Hubbard, M.P., the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of Oxford and Manchester, and many other noblemen and gentlemen. The congress will meet at Manchester in the course of the month of October. A service in the Cathedral, to be held on Tuesday, the 13th of October, will precede and inaugurate the meetings, which are to take place in the Free-Trade Hall. Papers will be read and discussions held on such subjects as Church-extension, Supply and Training of Ministers, Lay Co-operation, the Church in Ireland, the Law of the Colonial Church and the Supply of Native Ministers, and Day and Sunday Schools. Papers will also be read and discussed in sections, on Free and open Churches, Clergy Discipline, Modes of augmenting Small Livings and Tithe Redemption, Rural Decanal Meetings, and Diocesan Synods and Convocation.

The seventh annual meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science will commence at Edinburgh on the 7th October. The presidencies of the departments are filled up, Lord Curriehill being over that of Jurisprudence, and Mr. Nassau Senior over that of Education. The remaining departments are those of Punishment and Reformation, Public Health, Social Economy, and Trade and International Law. The system of convict discipline and the question of belligerent rights will be fully discussed. Immense preparations are being made for the hospitable reception of the visitors. It may be mentioned that a society is in process of formation for the purpose of advancing pharmaceutical chemistry. Its labours will, it is hoped, result in raising a great body of persons engaged in the art of preparing medicines after the prescription of the physician, into the truly responsible position which their duties require. At present the position of the pharmaceutical chemist in England is far below that occupied by persons of the same profession in many parts of the Continent.

The British Association continued its labours through last week and brought them to a close on the 4th September. On Tuesday, 1st September, after an amusing account from Captain Grant of his doings with the Royal personages dwelling on the line of his travels, a paper on Iron Ship Building was read by Mr. C. M. Palmer in the Mechanical section, and a paper in the Physical Science Department by Mr. Glaisher, on the vexed question of Temperature, and its regular diminution in high altitudes. A general meeting of the committee was held; and, on the motion of Sir R. Murchison, it was decided that Bath should be honoured with a visit in 1864. Sir Charles Lyell was appointed President, and Lord Portman, the Marquis of Bath, Mr. William Tite, M.P., Lord Nelson, and three other gentlemen were nominated Vice-Presidents. On the following day an interesting discussion arose in the Geology and Ethnology department, a paper being read by Lord Lovaine, describing certain Lacustrine habitations recently discovered in Wigtonshire. Professor Wilson, of Toronto, and Sir Charles Lyell made a few remarks on the subject, but the more interesting debate arose on a paper by Mr. Wallace, on the Varieties of Man in the Indian Archipelago. Mr. Jukes held that the human race had existed for at least 100,000 years, and Dr. James Hunt alluded to a recent German work on anthropology, in which the author stated that man had existed for no less than 35,000 years, and that there was every reason to believe that he had existed for some millions of years. In "Mechanics" some light was thrown on a method of defence which has been used more than once in the American war. Captain Douglas Galton drew attention to Mr. Chalmer's target, which has the metal placed in a form suited to resistance, and a cushion of wool interposed between the target and the ship. It consists of, first, a thick front plate, as the top flange of a beam; second, of ribs to support it, as the web of a beam; and, third, of a plate of iron to hold up the ribs, as the bottom flange of a beam; and the ribs are supported laterally by timber to prevent their lateral deflection. Between this and the side of the ship a cushion of timber is interposed. Mr. James Nasmyth thought that for armour plates to answer the end for which they are designed, they must be backed by some elastic substance, and in his opinion the substance best adapted to give the requisite elasticity was compressed wool. Captain Maury held that in America cotton bales had failed in resisting cannon balls, though at the outset much reliance had been placed on them. It seemed, however, to be admitted that there might be a wide difference between cotton and wool. On the 2nd of September an enormous party journeyed to Whitley Sands to see the practice of the Armstrong guns. Those used on this occasion in shell practice were both 12-pounders, one a breech-loader and one a muzzle-loader, but rifled on the shunt principle. The targets were placed at a distance of 16,000 yards, and the object was to illustrate the murderous effects of the Armstrong segment shell among troops lying under the cover of hills, out of sight, and apparently out of the reach of artillery. About eighteen rounds were fired, and on inspection it was found that there was scarcely a spot the size of a man's hand in which the fragments of the shell were not imbedded, or through which some of its segments had not been forced. It was clear that companies of troops exposed to such a fire must have been literally torn to pieces. The practice of the shunt muzzle-loading gun was the best, the shell from the breech-loader often falling short. Two other excursions equally well attended were made on the last day of the meeting—one to the iron district of Cleveland and another to the lead mines at Allenhead. The former party, 300 in number, was entertained at a banquet at Middlesborough, under the presidency of the Mayor, and the latter, 200 in number, was entertained by Mr. Beaumont.

Her Majesty the Queen of England has been residing at Rosenau, Coburg, for upwards of three weeks. She has constantly visited and been visited by the Duke and Duchess of Coburg and the Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse. Last week the King of Prussia paid a visit to Her Majesty and remained with her two hours. The Queen returned to England this week, having crossed the Channel from Antwerp.

THE CONTINENT.

A PAMPHLET entitled "France, Mexico, and the Confederate States," of which we elsewhere give a notice, has been published in Paris by Dentu. It has been received very favourably. The Emperor has gone to Biarritz, and is expected to return to Paris about the end of September. The only item of political news in Paris is a proposed Mexican Loan. The Mexican General Marquez has been made a Commander of the Legion of Honour.

The King of Prussia has once more dissolved the Chambers. The reason given for this proceeding is that the King found the Chambers unyielding; and that at the present moment, when there is a tendency on the part of the German Confederation to reduce Prussia from the position she has hitherto occupied, it is necessary that she should be united. It does not seem to occur to King William or M. Bismarck that the decadence of Prussian influence in the German Confederation is due to their illiberal policy. The King and his adviser also forget that a union between the Crown and the people may be readily effected by giving up antiquated notions of prerogative and accepting the Constitution as the basis of government. The new Chambers are to be convoked so as to discuss the budget within the current year. No one supposes that the coming elections will result more favourably for the Court.

The balance of military success is, according to this week's telegrams, rather against the Poles. [Sokolowski defeated the Russian General Kostanda at Kalisch on the 29th of August. On the other hand the Poles were defeated on the same day at Kruszya, and on the 3rd inst. at Oleszow. Sympathy for the Poles is as active as ever. In Rome the Cardinal Vicar announces it to be the desire of the Pope that special prayers shall be offered up for unhappy Poland, which his Holiness observes with grief to have now become the scene of sanguinary massacres. Poland, always Catholic and a bulwark against the invasion of error, deserves that the Almighty should be implored to deliver her from the evils by which she is afflicted. Petitions should be put up that, while retaining her character, she may remain faithful to the mission God has given her, and may maintain the Catholic banner thoroughly intact.

The Emperor of Austria entered Vienna on the 4th instant. His reception was enthusiastic, and it is evident that his subjects cordially endorse his project of reform.

The International Statistical Congress met on the 6th instant at Berlin. It was opened by an address from the Minister of the Interior. The members were received on the 7th by the King.

The Emperor of Russia has issued a decree that from the 13th instant the peasants of the Ukraine shall be proprietors of their lands, paying a certain amount as purchase-money to the State.

An interesting political trial has just been concluded at Naples. The Princess Sciarra Barberini and Cavaliere Quattromani, who is perfectly blind, were charged with conducting a treasonable correspondence with the ex-King of Naples. According to the act of accusation the Princess arrived in Naples December 29, 1862. During her stay she received several visits which awakened or confirmed suspicions of her Bourbonist tendencies. On her leaving for Rome, on the 9th of January, the Questura appointed two delegates of police to follow her, in consequence of information that she would be the bearer of a clandestine correspondence. On arriving at the frontier town, Isoletta, the Princess was invited to leave the carriage, as her passport was not en règle, and to give up all papers whatever that she might have with her. One letter, which she carried in the pocket of her dress, was directed to the ex-Ré Francisco and signed by Michele Roberti. It was full of expressions of devotion and of entreaties to continue the enterprise in which the ex-King was already engaged, invoking on it the blessing of Heaven. The delegates determined, on reading this letter, to interrupt the journey of the Princess, who returned, and arrived in Naples on the same evening. Roberti, who had been Councillor of State up to 1860, and for many years the preceptor of Francisco, had been selected by the Princess during her residence in Naples as her legal adviser. On the eve of her leaving for Rome, Roberti requested that she would take a letter for him to the ex-King, and as Roberti, in answer to the demand of the Princess, assured her that it was merely a congratulatory letter on the beginning of the new year, she consented. In a carpet-bag was found a packet of letters entrusted to the Princess by friends and acquaintances, and one in particular by her friend, Cavaliere Quattromani, the other prisoner, directed to the Duke Caracciolo di Brienza; inside this were several other letters, two of which were of special interest, one to Monsignor Gaetano di Ruggiero, and another to Padre Clarence di Viterbo, "nel Convento di Ara-Caeli, Roma." Both those letters were written for the most part in cipher, and the Duke of Brienza was requested by Quattromani to distribute the letters enclosed. In addition to those letters, Quattromani declares he gave the Princess another directed to a person called Chardar, of which letter or name no traces have been found. After the lapse of some days the letters in cipher were intercepted, and found to refer to money sent to the ex-King, with the names of the contributors. A "council" is spoken of, and the admission of many "brothers" on the morning on which the letter was written. The defence of the Princess was that she was unacquainted with the contents of the letters. After a three days' trial she was acquitted, but the Cavaliere Quattromani was found guilty, and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment and a fine of 500 francs.

EGYPT.

THERE has been a massacre of the whites on the White Nile. Several boats-full of traders were set upon by the blacks and slaughtered. These traders are charged with crimes which justified the vengeance of the natives. According to the testimony of Captains Speke and Grant and other travellers, armed bands are sent out from Khartoum, who murder unoffending villagers, make slaves of the women and children and steal the cattle. It is to be hoped that this occurrence will induce the Egyptian Government to take effective measures for repressing the atrocious practices of the white traders.

INDIA.

It appears that we are drifting into a war in India. There is in Afghanistan a dispute between three parties in reference to the succession, or rather to the division of the authority of the late Ameer, which will inevitably lead to hostilities in Cabul. It is announced that a camp of exercise will assemble at Lahore, and an army of observation at Peshawur, and that these British forces will, in all probability, have something to do. Why we should take any part in the disputes of the Khans is an inscrutable mystery, as it is no interest to us who wins or who loses.

The accounts of the cotton crop in India are very discouraging to those who believed that that country could supply the place of the Confederate States. In Mysore Territory the laudable efforts of the Government have, we are told, ended in disappointment. The cotton crops in Agra have been destroyed by excessive and continuous rain. In Berar, where the prospects of cotton are favourable, the grain crops are not sufficient for local consumption, and the misery and loss attendant upon this will do much, hereafter, to discourage the increased cultivation of cotton.

NEW ZEALAND.

THE natives of Waitara, or Waikato, have declared war, and take the field 5,000 strong. General Cameron has withdrawn his troops for the defence of Auckland.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, September 7.

THE sudden rise of all the French funds and stocks during the last week vouches sufficiently for the universal belief that all risk of war is for the present at an end. Even in England an improvement of 1 per cent. in the Three per Cents. within a week would be a great rise, but here it is even more significant of public confidence in the continuance of peace. The Three per Cents. are not the object of the speculation on which everybody, from the steps of the throne down to the chiffonier who seeks his fortune in the gutter, builds his hope of wealth. It is only when some change of policy produces a heavy fall or a sudden rise that those who are in the secret beforehand secure golden wind-falls in this stock, because it is generally held for investment, and its daily fluctuations are consequently restricted in ordinary times to narrow limits. It is, therefore, the more significant that it has risen so rapidly, and has been followed with more than equal steps by all the other forms of securities, as they are called in the jargon of the market. The Credit Mobilier, the great speculative stock, whose merits are about to be tested in England, has advanced upwards of 1 per cent. in the last few days, and there are bets that it will be worth 1 per cent. more at the end of the month. But this is little when compared to the Credit Colonial, a new stock only authorised on the 31st of last month. Yesterday, the shares (£5 paid up) were worth £38, having advanced £5 in one day, with every probability of a further rise. Notwithstanding this optimistic position taken by the Bourse, it is still very uncertain whether the Franco-Prusso-Russian alliance, as the more than sesquipedalian language of the day calls it, will come to anything. Even the France, which first announced the good tidings, begins to fear that the "party of resistance" has the upper hand in the councils of St. Petersburg. The report, if it have done nothing else, has had the effect of giving an impulse to the money market, which had long been stagnant. The solution of the Polish difficulties may be as distant as ever, but the more distant it is believed to be the better for the bulls. At all events, all chance of war is deferred to next spring, and next spring, to the understanding of speculators, is as distant as next century,—there may be so many ups and downs in the interval.

The Polish question being thus satisfactorily disposed of—for the present, at least—public attention is again directed to Mexico and the American war. A pamphlet, having for title "France, Mexico, and the Confederate States," was published here last Friday, and, advocating as it does an immediate recognition of the Confederate States, it created a great sensation. It was received as the anonymous indication of the intentions of Government, and the sensation, though not the result of any dissentiment with its conclusions, seems to have been greater than was desired. The Pays of Saturday was, therefore, "authorised to deny its official inspiration," and the Mémorial Diplomatique endorsed this statement next day. Public opinion—but this reminds me of a story which is beginning to go the rounds of the papers. A costermonger plying his vocation in one of the Paris streets had a "difficulty" with his donkey. The donkey would not go, and he, perhaps ignorant of the wisp of straw or carrot theory, instead of gently enticing it to follow him, applied the argumentum baculinum with a stick, to which its hide was probably no stranger. A humane or zealous sergent de ville, the policeman of Paris, coming up, commiserated the donkey, and remembering the authority invested in him by the Gramont Act (for the protection of animals) warned the costermonger to stay his hand. He only hit the more loudly; the sergent de ville threatened; the other, incredulous of Gramont Acts, only redoubled his blows. His donkey remained stationary, but he was arrested and conducted to the station-house, which was close at hand. "And my cart," said he. "Be easy," said the minion of justice, "I will take it home for you." "All right," said the prisoner, "and let me have news of you." Leaving him in safe custody the sergent returned to perform his promise. "Gee hoop," said he to the donkey. Donkey said nothing, but did not stir. Then he took him by the bit, thinking to pull him forward. Donkey advanced his forelegs at an angle which plainly showed that he had studied the theory of greatest resistance. His protector began to get impatient, and admonished him with his cane, accompanied with some oburgations which would look ill in print. Donkey changed not his attitude, and like a wise donkey turned deaf ears to insults which it was better not to hear. In the end the humane sergent lost his temper, doubtless heated by his own unheeded observations, and followed them up with blows applied with so good a will and in such unaccustomed places, that discovering at length how he had changed masters, poor Donkey made up his mind to move on. Two hours afterwards the sergent de ville, both hot and sorry, appeared before the commissaire to excuse and plead for his prisoner.

I was saying that public opinion is obstinate, and the Epoca of Madrid arrives with an article written before the pamphlet we have been speaking of could have reached there, which seems to confirm the first impression it had caused:—

In our opinion the recognition of the Confederate States by France and probably by England is close at hand. The movement will, perhaps, be thought opportune when a Government offering some chance of duration is established in Mexico. For our part we have always thought that the Emperor Napoleon's views in Mexico were not confined to the setting up a strong Government there, but were a part of a project to oppose a barrier to the encroaching policy of the United States.

It is possible that the recognition by France will be preceded by that of the new government of the Central State or vice versa, in either case it must lead to a formal rupture on the part of the Cabinet of Washington with France and afterwards with Mexico. We should be prepared for the important events which seem likely to bring Europe and America into collision.

The Mémorial Diplomatique, which has now entered the fifth month of its existence, has in this short time acquired considerable authority on all questions in which Austria and France are concerned. It this week has a second article on the re-establishment of monarchy in Mexico, in which it is stated that this contingency was the subject of diplomatic communications even previous to the signing of the short-lived alliance with England and Spain, and that an Austrian prince was then pointed to as the most eligible candidate for the new throne. There is no reason to believe that the King of the Belgians has discouraged the acceptance of the crown by his son-in-law; on the contrary, says the Mémorial, his advice has been that he should raise no unnecessary difficulties in the way of an offer so freely made and which promises so brilliant a career of usefulness. The sole conditions which the Archduke has appended to his acceptance are, the confirmation of the vote of the Notables by the people and the moral and material aid of the Western Powers. In fulfilment of this second stipulation negotiations are already almost concluded for a loan, which, it is said, will be for twenty-four millions sterling, secured on the mines of Sonora. With this, all outstanding obligations to foreigners will be settled, a part of the French war indemnity will be paid, and there will still remain enough to defray the cost of reorganising the public services. The regency is already busy in raising an army of 30,000 men, the accoutrements for which have been furnished by the French Government.

The Mémorial gives also the first part of a very long report presented by a commission to the Assembly of Notables, on the form of Government in Mexico. It fills nearly eleven closely printed columns of small type, and passes in review the whole history of the last forty-two years. Nor does the commission confine itself to Mexico, or even to contemporary events. The grandiloquent exordium reminds one of that of the advocate in the Plaideurs,—"Avant la création du monde." With a strange jumble of natural theology and modern instances, it shows that in the chain of nature a mite has some connection with the imperturbable course of the sidereal revolutions, and that the fall of Louis Philippe and the creation of the French Empire were destined in the order of Providence to arrest the erratic course of those of Mexico. Of these it proceeds to give an account, showing that the first proclamation of a republic in 1822 was the result of youthful inexperience and passion, and that their subsequent history is but a series of scandalous revolutions and shameful seditions. The conclusion of the report, so far as it is yet published, touches on the inaptitude of the Latin races to flourish under republican institutions, and the end will, no doubt, insist on the restoration of monarchy.

You will see that the American war is closely connected in the ideas of the French public with that of Mexico, and accordingly the newspapers have in the last few days contained more constant references to the events of the war and the question of recognition, than had been the case for some time previously. The Patrie published last week an interesting article on the exploits of the Confederate Navy, which contained, indeed, no new facts, but presented them in a compact narrative. The France gives a sketch of the military organisation of the South, showing the number and relative rank of the general officers. The President, an old West-Pointer, is commander-in-chief. There are five generals with rank corresponding to that of marshal of France: Cooper, J. E. Johnston, Lee, Beauregard, and Bragg. There are also eight lieutenant-generals, forty major-generals, corresponding to generals of divisions, and 178 brigadier-generals, among whom is one Frenchman, the Prince de Polignac.

The Pays contradicts the report that the United States Minister here has either remonstrated against the hospitality shown the Florida, or threatened to hand in a protest against the occupation of Mexico. It adds that the Minister of Foreign Affairs might have reminded Mr. Dayton that the treaty of 1778 between France and the United States authorises in time of war the admission of French privateers into the American ports, and of Americans into the French ones. The France announces the departure of sixty-five of the Florida's crew from Brest to man a new vessel which is about to sail from England. This is probably a canard, for the captain of the Florida is not in the habit of announcing his movements beforehand; but it is another proof of the sympathy with which the cause is regarded here. M. de Montholon, lately French consul-general at New York, sails in the next steamer as minister to Mexico.

THE UNION AND EMANCIPATION SOCIETY.

MANCHESTER, Sept. 9.

THERE is a society here whose howl is for Union and Emancipation. Union, avowedly, by means of fire and sword; and Emancipation, it would seem, by any process, if it be only summary enough—a simple condition, which, I need scarcely remark, beautifully includes the rope and lamp-post variety. An association with this kind of a platform cannot well help being rather a phenomenon. Alike the creature and catpaw of the Washington officials, its fawnings, its trucklings, its falsehoods and its pliant capacity for dirty work in general have from time to time fetched a sympathetic snort, half of gratitude and half of contempt, from that no doubt remarkable personage whom the Rev. J. R. Balme in his moments of finer frenzy apostrophises as "The War-house of Liberty," though matter-of-fact mortals may fail to identify any such "fearful wild-fowl" in Mr. Seward. Whether or not, poetically, our cute Yankee attorney may like any beast in particular, in or out of the Book of Job, there can be little doubt that in his own everyday likeness he is himself alone, as a dealer in statesmanlike utterances in American prose. In this latter character he has recently favoured us with another of his peculiar manifestoes, which, in this instance, sets in a tolerably strong light the relations between the Cabinet at Washington and the Union and Emancipation Society in Manchester, and which will therefore very well serve my turn in inviting the last-named of that singular pair of institutions to take a little public airing with me. Mr. Seward begins his message by thanking in a general sort of way his familiars in England for the zeal with which, under the anti-slavery cloak, they are trying to do their spitting in the Federal cause. But seeing that Northern Abolitionism cannot be made a trump card in this country, and that evidently the Broughams and the Buxtons have all along had an eye upon the attempted cheat, Mr. Seward does not hesitate to hint that he holds a much stronger hand in something else, and that really he means to win with quite another suit. Of course he does not forbid our local Emancipationists to continue to placard our walls with monstrous negroes, although he doubts we are rather of Trinculo's mind about having such "tricks put upon us with savages and men of Inde." What he stipulates for is—but here is his letter:—

Department of State, Washington,

THOMAS BAYLEY POTTER, Esq., Manchester, England.

SIR,—I have had the honour to receive from the Rev. Dr. Massie and the Rev. Dr. Rylance your address, &c. . . . The parties in these proceedings will readily understand that the attempted revolution in the United States sensibly affects this Government, and American society itself, in many ways which it has not fallen within the province of these parties to examine. While the interests thus naturally, and not improperly, overlooked in Europe, furnish the strongest possible motives to the people of the United States for suppressing the insurrection and maintaining the constitutional government received at the hands of their fathers, the President readily accepts and avows, as an additional and irresistible motive, the suggestion made by the friends of our country in Europe—that the success of the insurrection would result in the establishment, for the first time in the history of the human race, of a State based upon the exclusive foundations of African slavery. —I have the honour to be, sir, your very obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Now, gentlemen of the Union and Emancipation Society, what say you to this? You have it within the four corners of that letter that our sable friend of the noble aspect and the exoriated back, with whose life-size portrait you have been illustrating our mural literature for the last three weeks, is not only not favoured with any serious share of Mr. Seward's kindly consideration, but is absolutely sniffed at by that Bucephalus of human freedom. Possibly, when Mr. Seward sat down to write to you, he had but newly escaped from a railway car with a man and a brother in it, and, pah! there was perhaps no civet at hand to sweeten the philanthropist's imagination. Whatever the cause, the champion of the liberties of our multi-coloured species was evidently in no mood for regarding the intelligent contraband as anything just then but a very "black cuss" indeed, who, in the bloody game at Washington for a stake vastly different from the so-called redemption of a race, will have to take his chance of being promiscuously emancipated or not, either by being bayoneted into a nice warm place in the front during an assault, or strung up to the first Abolitionist-looking lamp-post at the next outbreak in New York. Thus, gentlemen aforesaid, you see it is of no use to go on telling Mr. Seward that he is snuffing the battle near or far off, in the interest of the slave. Your Bayard among the chargers tells you point-blank that he is doing no such thing. And he tells you a good deal more. Presuming, as he well may, upon your un-English John Brightism, and knowing as he well does that there is not one of you who would not cough at drinking the honest Yorkshireman's toast of "The Land we live in, and them as doesn't like it, dang 'em, let 'em leave it,"—Mr. Seward, I say, knowing what manner of men you are, first pats you on the back, and then whispers confidentially in your ear that you are naturally and not improperly overlooking the real objects of the war; which, if put in so many words, are, first, taxation of the South and of the English exports consumed by the South, in the interest of Northern manufacturers; secondly, the acquisition of unlimited power; so that, thirdly, the United States, after annexing Mexico on the South and Canada on the North, may be in a position to offer insult and injury to every nation of the earth, and especially to this our country—which begs you to accept, gentlemen, the assurance of its highest consideration for graciously conspiring to establish your Union and Emancipation Society here.

And now, gentlemen, since Mr. Seward has been good enough to let the cat out of the bag, by in some sort turning Queen's evidence against you, let me condole with you in reviewing the to-be-repented past. Your President (Mr. T. B. Potter) helped to set you going, they say, with £500. Well, that was a good round sum, though not over-much, if the political bookmaker—who has visions of succeeding Mr. Bazley as M.P. for Manchester—had only laid it on the right bird. But, you see, the anti-slavery cock won't fight; and to heel Mr. Seward's Union bird with English spurs would be to come it rather too unpatriotic. So, on the whole, Mr. Potter might as well have thrown his money down the gutter. Well, and then there was that Free Trade Hall meeting on last new year's eve, with the Mayor of Manchester in the chair. After rising from the perusal of Mr. Seward's note, what you must chiefly regret in reflecting upon that meeting is, the display you made (alas! in vain) of that little bit of theatrical clap-trap about the negro, to whom you assigned a conspicuous post of vantage in the middle of the platform. The contraband's get-up was intelligent to a fault, and he walked upon the stage like any other important dramatic personage,—say Hamlet in the first court scene after a sufficient interval; and when all the rest of you had taken your places, his going brusquely up to the Mayor, and robustiously shaking hands with his worship, and subsequently (in New York English), "with quite a number of other prominent citizens," was a highly effective touch of unpremeditated naturalness, although cynical people might set it down as a pre-rehearsed piece of not very genteel comedy. All this was very fine and very Northern—so far as it went. But you see, gentlemen, to have carried the thing to Mr. Seward's length, your first duty would have been to have kicked the contraband bodily off the platform. That perhaps would have been—though strictly above-board—not quite an English proceeding; but it would at least have saved the scandal of a respectable member of the British House of Commons, a man of Mr. Bazley's position both in the House and out of it, lending his face to such a contemptible piece of stage play as the other performance amounted to. Whatever was the political influence you brought to bear upon the honourable gentleman for that night only, it does him credit that you have not been able successfully to put the same screw upon him since. As that was his first, so his friends hope it will be his last appearance in such a character. The Mayor, too, got a pretty sharp wiggling from the Guardian next morning, and I am glad to see that his worship has from that time forth given you and your doings a decently wide berth, never having betrayed the city's trust by taking any more Union and Emancipation chairs, whether as Mayor of Manchester, or, as he styled himself on last year's eve, plain Abel Heywood.

Your next public attempt to flinch an expression of un-English feeling was a dodge every way worthy of you and your employers; and, no doubt, it quite squared with your notion of English honour to fix for the day of its perpetration the wedding-day of the Prince of Wales. But the attempt signally fell through. Somehow or other the people, hungry though they were, got it into their heads that you were about to humbug them through their bellies. They suspected a trick in the pains you took to set out that model of the Federal ship George Griswold. The companion model of the Confederate war-steamer Alabama, with the black flag run up, and the death's-head and cross-bones thrown in by way of sensation, thickened the suspicion. The ominous coincidence of the presence of the "relief ship's" chaplain clinched the whole business, and no wonder Stephenson Square broke out into flat rebellion. In vain the bewildered parson prayed aloud until he perspired; equally in vain did he bethink himself to ask Lancashire men to join him in a "little hymn." Prayers and proposals about hymns, big or little, were borne frustrate on the wings of the rising storm. The position held by the bakers' vans, with their contents of 16,000 loaves, was carried by assault, and for two mortal hours the Federal flour, which you thought to have thrown like dust in our people's eyes, was indignantly tossed about before your own, poetical justice being amply satisfied with a well-aimed volley of substantial quartern loaves delivered at the platform itself. Before dismissing this painful subject there is just one question, gentlemen, which I should like to ask—Was that bread really made of George Griswold flour? People do say that that flour was duly placed in the keeping of the Central Relief Committee, and if so, I am slow to believe that a body of English gentlemen, with Earl Derby at their head, could have wittingly given you a grain of it for purposes of base political huckstering on the day the Prince of Wales was married. If the bread was not bona fide Griswold, say so. If, on the other hand, it was made from the spurious Union and Emancipation article, and paid for partly out of Mr. Potter's £500, say so. Repentance is idle without confession. Besides, when a thing is a swindle in its essence and its object, it can't be made much worse by being owned a swindle in substance and form.

Your subsequent demonstrations and what came of them may possibly form the subject of future condolences as occasion may seem to serve.

EL TOUSSON AND EL MONASTIR.

The first exploit of these two vessels of war, which have now almost arrived at completion in Mr. Laird's building yard, will be to run the home blockade of legal difficulties before they are allowed to proceed on their destined career, whatever that may be. Whether they can successfully navigate the channel beset with shoals and rocks through which the Alexandra was steered, remains to be seen. There is now, we believe, little doubt that, under the terms of the Foreign Enlistment Act, they are to be detained by Government. The allegation against them is, that they are fitted out for the purpose of carrying on hostilities against the United States. On the other hand, it is contended that they were built by order of a French house for the late Pasha of Egypt, who gave the firm a commission for the coining of a large sum of money in France, and for the construction of two steam-rans in England. The money was duly coined, and received in Egypt. The vessels were in course of construction when the Pasha died, and his successor repudiated that part of the contract. What the French house intends to do with them is not known. The accusation is, that they are destined for war with a friendly Power. They will consequently be detained, and a court of law will determine whether, under the terms of the Foreign Enlistment Act, the detention is legal, or whether the owners can recover them from the hands of the Government.—The Morning Post.

If there were "evidence of the fact" that these vessels are actually destined for the use of the Confederate States, and also a certainty, or a reasonable amount of probability, that this would bring the adventure within the scope of the Foreign Enlistment Act, nobody can deny that Lord Russell might "exercise his power of detention" and forbid the ships to leave the port. But, unfortunately, neither of these conditions can be easily satisfied. That there is not, or was not, sufficient evidence of the fact we know from the avowal of Lord Russell himself; and that there is nothing positive in the applicability of the Foreign Enlistment Act to the case must be inevitably inferred from the experiment tried upon the Alexandra.—The Times.

SLAVERY IN AMERICA.

(From the Church and State Review.)

There are some subjects upon which we cannot enter but with a reluctance amounting almost to pain. Just such a question is that now before us. If there be a name more abhorrent than another to our English ear, it is that of "slave." There needs no eloquence of denunciation, no artful painting of individual horrors, to rouse against it our warmest and strongest feelings. But the truth has to be spoken, and we must needs give the subject, painful as it is, a fair and patient investigation.

Let us then at once admit that, whatever may be the reality of American slavery, our preconceived notions of it have proved as yet very far from the truth. It was, indeed, almost inevitable that it should be so. A matter of which we could have no personal knowledge, and of which, therefore, our ideas must necessarily be taken only at second-hand, could hardly fail to be misunderstood; whilst, in this instance, misconception was undoubtedly aggravated by the directly hostile nature of the only source from which even this second-hand information was derived. How serious this misconception has been the events of the last few years have, in some measure, shown; and we shall do well, before entering into the question, to consider briefly the nature and extent of the error thus proved in the outset against our calculations.

If there was, then, a point on which all, whether here or in the United States, had confidently reckoned, it was on the hostility of the slaves to their masters. How, indeed, could it be otherwise? Were one tithe of the statements currently reported of their condition but founded upon truth, this hostility was as inevitable as oppression and cruel wrong could make it. Yet what has the event shown? The armies of the North have marched and counter-marched over many hundred miles of Southern soil; but the negroes, instead of welcoming them, have, for the most part, fled at their approach. The proclamation of freedom has been boldly reprinted in Southern newspapers, and circulated from white to black and from black to white throughout the Confederacy, but not a plantation has risen to claim the boon. The planters have fearlessly entrusted their dearest interests to the slaves whose vengeance they were supposed so abjectly to dread. The negroes, thirsting to wash out in their master's blood the memory of their wrongs, have tilled his fields, and watched over his home and tended his wife and little ones while he was far away fighting against the friends who were to set them free. Is all this natural—is it even credible? If the relation of master and slave in the Southern States were really as we have deemed it, is the negro nature so angelic—nay, so Divine—as to repay such evil with such good? We would gladly think it, even at the cost of an enforced tribute of admiration for a system that could nurture such a frame of mind. But we know it is not so; that it is not our deduction, but our premises, that have been at fault. The position of the slave is not as we have pictured it. He is not a struggling and down-trodden serf, writhing under the lash of a cruel task-master, stretching chained hands to Heaven in agonized prayers for deliverance. Rather is he a simple-hearted, docile, affectionate child; impatient often, like other children, of constraint, and yet more impatient of work; needing guidance, and even correction, and conscious of his need; capable, no doubt, of being trained to a higher and nobler life, but, for the present at least, best and happiest, and, in truth, most contented, as he is.

Nor, if thus mistaken in our estimate of the slave, have we been much nearer the truth in our portrait of his master. The two errors have, indeed, gone hand in hand. The hideous cruelty which oppressed the one must needs, as we rightly supposed, have "demoralized" the other. A bully is inevitably a ruffian and a coward, and such we confidently and reasonably expected the "Southern chivalry" to prove. On this point, at least, our misapprehensions have been effectually cleared away; and, whatever may yet be our knowledge of the institution itself, we have learnt something of the real character of its supporters. Nor of theirs alone. We have no unkindly feeling towards the North—no wish to exaggerate her defects, or gloat over her difficulties. Far from it. It is in very sadness that we are compelled to point the moral of Southern gallantry and chivalrous devotion by contrast with the sordid meanness, the uncivilized barbarity, the bitter, bloodthirsty unchristianity of the Abolition party at the North. If the tree may indeed be known by its fruit—if the test of results in character and conduct may indeed be followed as confidently as it was applied—we have here a lesson which, however sorely against the grain, it would ill become us any longer to neglect.

Yet, while thus constrained to avow our conviction that the slavery of the South is very far from the unmixed evil of our early prejudices, let us not be supposed to hold it up to admiration as by any means an unmixed good. Very far otherwise. At the best it is but a thing to be tolerated as the lesser evil for a while, and, even thus, there is in it much—very much—that requires prompt amendment. They are points but too well known to us all. The separation of families; the stern prohibition of education of any kind; the invalidity of the marriage tie; the law that subjects the child to the condition of the mother, with all the manifold evils that follow in its train—no one can deny that these are faults which cry loudly for a remedy. Our error has been, not in considering them as faults, but in confounding them too closely with the system itself with which they have in truth no necessary connection. Nor was this all; experience proves that we have erred perhaps yet more dangerously in giving to these incidental defects a prominence to which practically they are not entitled. As our acquaintance with the truth extends, we know more of the real condition of the slave in these respects, and find what the analogy of our own customs might have earlier taught us to expect from a kindred race. We see laws harsh and cruel, as in too many respects they undoubtedly are, rendered comparatively mild and harmless by the higher law of public opinion. We see especially the enactments against education, necessitated by the reckless agitation of Northern Abolitionists, in practice so generally disregarded that the Southern Church can boast of no less than half a million negro communicants. We see that, though legally ignored, the marriage tie is as a rule practically held sacred; and that to separate families, or even, without some good and pressing reason, to sell his slaves at all, is for the planter a stigma and a reproach. And most of all we find, what most of all we should have done well and charitably to presuppose, that whatever these evils may be, we are not alone in our recognition of them; that with the slave-owners themselves these questions are matters of deep and wide-spread anxiety; and that among their leaders at least there is a very general desire to mitigate and remove the evils which they, no less than we, feel as a reproach to their institutions and to themselves. In this respect, too, we are apt to judge somewhat over-harshly of the South. We must not too promptly seize on every doubtful word. In times like these, it is the hottest spirits that rush to the front, and much is said that can have no claim to be regarded as a general utterance, and that in calmer moments the speakers themselves would certainly modify, and probably retract. Much, too, must be allowed to men who, by bitter and unjust reproach, may have been led to look with too favourable an eye upon the very faults and weaknesses of the cause they are defending against such cruel odds. But with the upper classes, at least, such men are the exception, not the rule. We firmly believe that the slave-owners of the South, as they are undoubtedly the parties most deeply interested in remedying the defects and amending the errors of their institutions, so are they, above all others, most truly anxious so to do.

What, then, is our duty as freemen and as Englishmen in the face of this tremendous question? It is surely plain. If we really seek the welfare and happiness of the negro; if we even suspect that the men on whom his fate depends are not wholly the selfish monsters we have deemed them; above all, if we realise our position, and rightly measure our own power and our own impotence for good alike and evil in this respect, we shall not find it difficult to see our way. We shall know then that really to benefit the slave we must work with his master, not against him; that hard thoughts and hard words are powerless to shake the master's hold, omnipotent to clench it till it becomes indeed as galling as our fancy pictured it long ago. On us in this "old country" rests, in truth, a terrible responsibility. Those who best know the South know best also the power over the Southern mind of English opinion. Much of this power has, indeed, been lost by the manner in which we have withheld from them in their desperate struggle the recognition so earnestly coveted, so justly due, and so freely given to many without the hundredth portion of their claim. But for this the South would, ere now, have been free, and England might have won from her gratitude those ameliorations of her institutions which she is already more than half disposed to grant as a measure of justice to herself. This chance has unhappily gone by, and with it has gone much of our influence for good. Something, however, may even yet be done. By gentleness and justice; by recognising the good as frankly as we condemn the evil; by acknowledging at once the difficulties of the Southern position, and the real and sterling good that, in spite of it, has even now been so largely achieved; in a word, by doing a Christian work in a Christian spirit, we may as surely contribute to procure for the negro those ameliorations of his lot most truly calculated to promote his happiness and welfare, and finally lead him to a real and valuable freedom, as by a blind persistence in injustice and calumny, and a reckless pursuit, by any means, of a ruinous and impracticable end, we assuredly shall at once rivet the chains of the slave, and add bitterness to his bondage.

CONDITION OF JACKSON.

The Morton (Miss.) correspondent of the Atlanta Appeal thus describes the damage done to Jackson by the Federal forces:—

Jackson has a deplorable appearance. The block or square in which the Appeal-office was situated, and the one south of it on the other side of Capitol and fronting on State and Pascagoula streets, comprising, since the last conflagration, the main business houses in the city, are in ashes. These two blocks include the Episcopal Church (a neat and comfortable edifice), and the buildings from there to the Concert Hall on State-street, the Post-Office, Julian's book store, sweeping round to Spangler Row, and down to Mrs. McMaster's, including the Post Surgeon's office, Medical Director's office, and office of Commander of the Post. On the opposite side of the street the fiery destruction began with McMurray's livery stable, consuming the whole mass of buildings to Straus's store, thence to Angelle's Saloon, Griffin's Bankhouse, and thence to Leany's store, thence down to Pascagoula-street, eating out the entire block.

The next block running along State, and south in succession of the one just named, being already a pile of ruins, having been burned by the Federals during their first visit, the house-burners ceased their destruction in this part of the city. Mrs. Clifton's house is said to have been burned, but of this my informant was not certain. The Capitol was not injured, nor was the Governor's mansion, telegrams to the contrary notwithstanding. No act of wanton insult to ladies is reported to have been committed by the enemy, but houses were freely entered and sacked. The suburbs of Jackson, recently so beautiful, are all scorched, withered, and destroyed. The city itself, once so proud of its neat, cheerful, and in some places elegant appearance, is a wreck—a ruin—a blasting evidence of the savage brutality of our hated and despised foe. Attila, styled "Curse of God," could not have visited a captured town with more ruthless vengeance. Let them burn! our time will come yet! "The mills of the gods grind slowly."

The same correspondent, writing a day later, gives the following additional particulars:—

Dr. Bailey arrived here yesterday from Jackson. The half has not been told touching the vandalism of the enemy while in occupation of that ill-fated city. Every house in the place that was unoccupied, and nearly all of those whose owners remained to protect them, were sacked and gutted. Officers as high as colonels were seen to enter and steal articles of value and virtue, and carry them away. Some of these officers were heard to say, "Well, I have never stolen anything before, but I will take this." Mahogany and rosewood bedsteads, with mattresses, mosquito bars, and all the appendages of a complete and elegant couch, with bedsteads set up and the whole standing as if in a bedchamber, together with rosewood, marble-slabbbed dressing-cases, bureaux, chairs, sofas, fine tables, pianos, ottomans, mirrors, and all the costly furniture of the citizens were scattered all along the intrenchments from the southern bend of the Pearl river to the extreme northern line of the works.

On these beds the Yankees slept, and carried on their hellish debaucheries with the negro wenches of the town; played cards and gambled, ate and drank on the tables, and amused themselves among this stolen plunder during their drunken carousals in their own refined and elegant way, and at their departure broke them into a thousand pieces. One general, said to be a General Logan, carried off two fine parlour chairs from Mr. Helm's residence, telling Mr. Helm that he would return them, but he failed to perform his promise. The fine State library, in the capitol building, they hauled off in waggon, took what books they desired, and destroyed the rest. This library was one of the most select and costly in the Confederacy. Its destruction is not only a loss to Mississippi, but to mankind, and cannot be replaced.

In Mr. Hobson's residence, they cut his family portraits, mutilated everything they could not carry off; cut large square places from the centre of his carpets, and wrote vulgar and obscene sentences upon the walls. But these things seem to have been their peculiar mission in every house; for, in addition to the pillage, destruction, and mutilation of private property, the slime of their wretchedly low and libidinous language can be traced on every wall, the witnesses at once of their vulgarity, barbarism, and crime; the blasting and deformed, but still full and ample evidence that they are Yankees.

A number of private residences in the suburbs of the city are reported as burned down, but I could not learn the names of the owners. Near the business portion of the city that was destroyed, Mrs. Saunders and Mrs. Laughlin's boarding houses, and Morey's drug store, are about all that are left standing.

THE NEGRO IN AFRICA AND IN THE SOUTH.—It is clear that the negro in his native savage African state is the most brutal specimen of the human race. He has no sense of justice, no conscience, and a horrible and wild appetite for blood. Nothing can be more hideous than negro life in Dahomey, which state or kingdom is a sort of enlarged butcher's shop, where man is both the butcher and the meat. Society seems to exist for the purpose of great periodical slaughters, which are the national holidays, constituting both the amusement and religion of the people. Human nature lights up with a singular glare of ferocity in African nature, and there are a profuseness and sensuality in its sanguinary propensities which we do not see in other aboriginal tempers. Captain Grant does not describe a much better state of things in Uganda. "The lives of men and women are taken for the most trifling offences . . . and the king never looks bright and no business is done unless the day has commenced with a few being led to execution. A miserable young girl or handsome woman from the palace gates might be seen walking down the road perfectly unheeded by passers by, wailing in the most bitter, agonising tones, perhaps bleeding from a spear wound, and mournfully following a single palace guard to the place of execution. Others would have a whip-cord round the wrist and follow the man like a dog, while others pull against the cord, screaming most violently." Slavery is certainly an improvement upon such a state of society as this, because, whatever the evils of it may be, it is not simply the reign of the law of blood. Nothing can justify the slave trade, and yet, when we contemplate the mysterious history of a race of whose career in the world we have only yet a fragment before us, we may acknowledge that a Providence which brings good even out of evil has used the lawlessness of man in this instance as an engine for the ultimate improvement of the negro. Whatever American slavery may be, the negro under it is a more moral being than ever he was in Africa; he has ideas, and feelings, and sentiments which he never had before. He is no longer a brute; he knows right from wrong. He has some acquaintance with the rules of civilised life; he has been placed in contact with the European mind, and has received a sort of engrafting. All this could not, humanly speaking, have been given him in Africa. Transplantation is the condition, however shocking an one, upon which he partakes of civilisation. This has not, perhaps, been sufficiently taken into account in our estimate of slavery. It is bad enough, but let us look at it in comparison with the native savage state of the negro, from which it is a change. It is an improvement upon that state. Those who look forward to the ultimate enfranchisement of the African and his complete incorporation in civilised society, may still acknowledge a law working in the intermediate dispensation, as it may be called, of slavery. Nor can it fairly be doubted that the negro, as a general rule, has been happier as a slave than he was as a native savage. There may be particular estates on which extraordinary cruelties have been practised, but his general treatment from the planter has been far kinder than the treatment he received from his native chief, and life upon a plantation has been much more comfortable than life in the African desert and jungle. He has been better fed and better housed, he has led a regular, methodical day, and his life has approached the European domestic standard much nearer than it did in his wild state. It is quite true that his comforts and physical condition have been attended to more than his moral and religious improvement; this, of course, would depend upon the character of the owner. The great tendency has been to regard the slaves as instruments of cotton-growing. Yet even the accounts which are most unfavourable to slavery show that, somehow or other, a wild and rude but still strong form of Christian belief has planted itself in the negro mind.—Times, Sept. 5.

PRESIDENT DAVIS has no such difficulties in this way to contend with as harassed Washington when, in 1776, his whole means of resistance to the British consisted of a miserably ill-clad, ill-fed army of 3,000 dispirited men. Even if we look upon this war as a mere struggle for conquest, the North cannot be successful while there remains only a resolute minority in the Southern States determined to fight to the last. But, though faint hearts in the South may despair, they are not likely to pardon the invaders who have forced them to humiliation. Every victory that the North exults over deepens and extends the hatred which they have created in the Southern people. Fort Sumter destroyed, and the favourite city of the South bombarded and ruined, are not spectacles which will win back the revolted States into the Union. Every captured city will absorb a Northern army, and every Northern army of occupation will be a constant source of renewed hatred and enmity to the "Yankees." The Federals may go on in their career of conquest, and the cities of the Southern coast may fall into their hands one by one; but every victory adds fuel to the original flame of Secession. When two nations go to war upon some definite ground of quarrel the battles and sieges are fair trials of strength; the side which finds itself the weakest may consent to a compromise, and the two nations, which have no further disagreement, may unite again in honourable friendship. But when a nation like the South is fighting for bare existence, all terms of submission are impossible. The invader may cut deep into the country, but the soul of the national life escapes his sword, and his cruelties only quicken the pulse of the heart of Independence. The Federals may gain point after point, but they cannot conquer the hatred which they have raised and enflamed themselves. Not the least hopeless feature of the struggle, too, is the furious passion for war which it seems to be rousing in the Northern mind. The insatiable rage of conquest grows by what it feeds upon, and every capture of a city or defeat of an army only rouses an appetite for further destruction and fresh victories. So long as the Federals can fight, and get the means of fighting, so long they will be willing and eager to fight, and, beyond question, so long they will have to fight.—Times, Sept. 7.

GEORGE III. AND ABRAHAM I.—Our revolutionary fathers made the following statement of grievances against the British king:—He taxed tea. He had a stamp tax. He excited the negro to insurrection. He made the military above the civil power. He sent men into banishment and exile without the authority of law. He paid no respect to our constitutions and laws. He was a tyrant generally. Those grievances read singularly now, in view of the action of the present Republican Administration.—American Paper.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

The Siege of Charleston.

BEFORE these remarks can reach the eye of the public it is not unlikely that the fate of the capital of South Carolina may have been decided, and that either the Federal fleet is anchored close to a city of smoking ruins, or the attempt to force a passage by the iron-clads has been made and repulsed. It would be obviously idle to attempt here, thousands of miles away from the scene of action, to forecast the future, and to predict the result of the terrific struggle on which the attention of half the civilised world is fixed. But we may, by pointing out the position of besiegers and besieged, by narrating the progress of the siege, and by mapping out the different localities which have been or are likely to be the chief points of conflict, materially aid our readers in forming their own conclusions as to the future chances of the combatants and the prospects of the defence. It would be useless to deny that the destruction of Fort Sumter is a substantial gain to the Federals. Two years ago the fall of Fort Sumter would have been universally regarded as equivalent to the fall of Charleston. But the development of the defence has within that period so completely changed the aspect of the port, that what was once the chief and only defence is now only one link, and by no means the strongest, in the chain of the seaward batteries protecting Charleston; so much so, that, even although Sumter is a mass of ruins, the Southern press maintains its confident tone, and still asserts that the city is secure. It is worth while to examine the grounds on which this confidence is based. A glance at the map will show that the natural defences of Charleston Harbour are Sullivan's and Morris islands. The main ship channel runs almost equidistant between these two islands, and every vessel passing into Charleston Harbour is exposed to a cross-fire from the batteries erected thereon. But at the apex of an obtuse-angled triangle of which a line drawn from the nearest points of the two islands would be the base, is a shoal or mud bank, on which stands Fort Sumter. This fortress, which two years ago would have been declared impregnable, was raised on an artificial foundation of refuse stone from quarries in the neighbourhood, and was intended to carry three tiers of guns, two tiers casemated, and the upper one en barbette. It commanded the northern and southern channels, and was supposed effectually to block the passage into the harbour. But Fort Sumter was built to defend Charleston against a naval force; and its inability to hold out against land batteries on Sullivan's and Morris Islands was strikingly demonstrated by its speedy surrender in 1861 to the Confederates. In conjunction with these batteries it subsequently became the outer line of defence, and it was found, as was expected, superior to any attack that could be made by a purely naval force. With Forts Wagner and Gregg on Morris Island, with Forts Moultrie and Battery Bee on Sullivan's Island, all of them dominating Fort Sumter, and subjecting every vessel that attempted the passage into Charleston Harbour to a cross-fire of some 100 guns of heavy calibre, it was natural that the inhabitants of the city should feel themselves secure. But the failure of the first attempt of the Monitors to force a passage increased their sense of security and threw them off their guard. The Federal commanders were not slow to perceive this. They saw that Fort Sumter, the key to the outer line of defence, if not to be reduced by their iron-clads was at the mercy of land batteries of sufficient calibre, and they formed their plans accordingly. General Gilmore gradually accumulated troops on Folly Island, a mere sand-bank running along the eastern extremity of Morris Island, and on a day when the Confederates least expected it landed a large body of troops on Morris Island, and, aided by a powerful force of gunboats, succeeded in carrying two or three Confederate batteries, the seaward defences of the island. He failed in an attempt to storm Fort Wagner. But he had gained a firm foothold. His men set to work with the spade, and in twenty-four hours he had secured a position as strong as Fort Wagner. After some days spent in bombardment and the construction of approaches, another assault was tried, but with equal ill-success. General Gilmore knew that the fall of Fort Wagner would ensure the destruction of Sumter, and spared no pains to accomplish it. But Fort Wagner held out, and in despair the Federal commander determined to destroy Fort Sumter by land batteries, leaving to time the capture of Fort Wagner. He built formidable batteries on Morris Island, within easy range of Fort Wagner, armed them with the heaviest Parrott guns, and Fort Sumter was at his mercy. On the 17th ult. he opened fire with his land batteries and his ironclads. For six days and nights the bombardment continued almost incessantly from the land batteries, the Monitors confining their attention mainly to Forts Wagner and Gregg. In two days it was evident that Fort Sumter was overpowered; on the sixth day Fort Sumter was a heap of ruins. The shell from the Federal batteries on Morris Island swept through and through; the south-east face was irreparably destroyed, and every shot told upon the opposite wall. The Confederates had foreseen their danger and withdrew the greater number of the guns and the larger body of the garrison. A sort of forlorn hope are left amidst the ruins to hoist the Confederate flag in proud defiance of the enemy, and tell the world that the brave defenders of Sumter had not surrendered. But on the 23rd, Fort Sumter, as a defence of Charleston, had ceased to exist. The news was received with pardonable exultation in the North. It seemed that Charleston was about to meet her fate, and that the harbour was open to the Federal fleet; that the Federals had only "to go in and win." But let us look at the Confederate side of the picture. Fort Sumter is after all only one of the defences of the outer line. That line can hardly be said to be pierced so long as Sullivan's and Morris Islands are held by Confederate troops. It is not enough for the Federals to destroy Fort Sumter. To turn it to advantage they must be able to hold it. But to effect a lodgment on Fort Sumter, and to make it a Federal work, they must first take Fort Wagner and Fort Gregg, and they must reduce Battery Bee and Fort Moultrie. Fort Sumter is at present untenable. The only advantage gained by the Federals is that, in the event of their naval forces making a dash at the harbour, the guns of Fort Sumter will not be in their way. Apparently the iron-clads are in no hurry. The land forces of the Federals are already loud in their expressions of disgust at the tardiness of the navy, but Admiral Dahlgren has learnt the inequality of his Monitors to the land batteries of the Confederates, and rightly abstains from crippling his strength. In the last bombardment it was repeatedly shown that whenever the iron-clads came within 600 yards of the Confederate batteries they were quickly compelled to retire with damage; and the loss of Commodore Rogers, one of the most gallant and reputed officers of the United States navy, has doubtless formed a salutary warning. The questions immediately at issue are, whether the Federals can occupy Forts Wagner and Gregg, and whether their fleet can run the gauntlet of the batteries which line the shores of Charleston Harbour, find its way through the torpedoes and other obstacles which block up the inner channel, and anchor abreast of the quays of Charleston. The press of the Palmetto City speaks emphatically on this point—assuredly with some reason. Supposing Fort Wagner occupied and Fort Gregg safely turned, there are Forts Johnson and Ripley, which command a still narrower passage. One, if not both of these forts, has, we believe, been cased with iron, and if opposed to the fleet alone they will probably beat it off. Behind them is Castle Pinckney, and behind Castle Pinckney the batteries of Charleston itself. We do not wonder now that the Charleston people still boast their beautiful city will never be taken.

But it may be burnt. General Gilmore has ascertained that fact, and by this time Charleston may be in ashes. On the 21st, after three days' bombardment, the gallant general, finding Sumter still defiant and Fort Wagner still troublesome, threw shells charged with Greek fire into the midst of a defenceless population from a distance of 3¼ miles. There is no possible excuse or palliation of this wanton barbarity. It may delight New York and gladden the hearts of the extreme Abolitionists, but it is a scandalous outrage on humanity, and one which will justly place General Gilmore on a par with Butler and Turchin, and the other miscreants who have disgraced the warfare of the United States' army. Happily, the population can save itself, and General Gilmore's fiery missiles will only consume property. But the fact of the distant bombardment of a population only shows that the Federal general is not sanguine in reducing the defences. The real work has to be done by tedious siege operations and bloody assault. The Greek fire is but a feeble and cowardly attempt at intimidation, and will not subdue the batteries of Wagner and Cumming's Point. The next mail will probably bring us some conclusive intelligence. The Federals have no time to lose. Already the equinoctial gales are sweeping the Atlantic coast and retarding their operations; and in a week or two the siege will be left principally to the land forces. We may expect, therefore, that the bombardment of Sumter has been followed up by vigorous attacks upon Wagner and Gregg, and that virtually the issue of the battle is decided. Whichever way victory may incline, the siege of Charleston will be for ages memorable in military history, and the gallantry of the defence will hereafter prove one of the brightest pages in the annals of the Palmetto City.

Arming the Negroes.

WITHOUT placing absolute credence in the startling intelligence brought by the Hibernian, it is safe to speculate upon it, if not as an actual fact, at least as an event which has recently entered into the range of immediate probabilities. We have, in the various rumours that preceded this last direct announcement, so many indications that the question of arming the slave population has been under careful and serious consideration in the Confederate counsels. It is also certain that the same subject has been frequently discussed by the Confederates and their friends in Europe within the last few months. The Southern mind, therefore, on both sides of the ocean, has been ripening for this step, and, if not already taken, is prepared to take it.

Intelligent observers of the struggle have long been aware that as a last resort the South possessed an element of latent strength which, whenever called forth, would at once shift the numerical superiority to the side which has heretofore been the weaker, and thus end the conflict. Those who knew the temper of the Southern people knew that, if the alternative were fairly presented between independence and the maintenance of negro slavery, it would not hesitate an instant to sacrifice the latter to the former. The choice made, it is not in the Southern character to resort to halfway measures. If the measure became expedient, it would be carried out thoroughly and without delay. If negroes were to be armed, the arming would be en masse. The chief obstacle lay not in any fear of the use the negroes might make of their arms: on that subject, except in the few localities where the negro has been corrupted by long contact with the Yankees, no Southern man ever entertained a doubt. The difficulty was in the repugnance which a proud nation, regarding the bearing of arms as a privilege and an honour, must necessarily feel in extending that privilege and that honour to a servile race. But at the call of patriotism the Southerners would sacrifice this repugnance, as they have sacrificed property and life, without hesitation and without vain regrets. Our only reason for doubt, then, is, that we do not believe the stress of military necessity so great as to warrant the use of this last, though infallible, reserve. At the same time it must be remembered that the South is led by men who will not wait until driven by necessity to resort to a measure which they foresee that the public safety may require.

The force which the South can thus suddenly throw into the scale, ensuring prompt success, is easily available. Five hundred thousand would indeed comprise nearly the whole number of able-bodied negroes within the jurisdiction of the Confederacy, but these could be spared with less detriment to agricultural pursuits than any equal proportion of any other labouring population. The South has abandoned all its usual staples. Nothing now is asked from the soil but food. For the production of this, black female labour will suffice, and in health, hardiness, and strength the females of the African race far exceed the peasant women of Continental Europe. The rich lands of the cotton region are easily tilled, and the young and aged who cannot fight can grow corn and tend cattle. Nor is there any serious difficulty in organizing this force. In the South, unlike the North, the relations between the white man and the black are well defined, and are accepted by both without question; they rest upon a reciprocal confidence and a perfect understanding of each other's character. The white man, therefore, will not feel degraded or in an anomalous position in commanding negro troops. If the discipline of the plantation is less rigorous than that of the camp, it is nevertheless an admirable preparation for the latter, and has moreover the merit of furnishing, ready to hand, a class of efficient noncommissioned officers, accustomed to the exercise of delegated authority over those of their own colour, and to the responsibility for their good behaviour. Even the scarcity of arms is no insuperable obstacle. There are, probably, enough of fire-arms for a select corps of negroes, already familiar with their use; and as for the others, it may be doubted whether they would not be more effective in the field with the more primitive weapons which the blacksmith's shop on every plantation could readily forge out of the implements of husbandry. A hundred thousand negro pikemen or scythemen would probably be a more formidable body for immediate service than the same number of raw recruits entrusted with unwonted weapons. There is no doubt, also, that the greater portion of the negro levies would be quickly thrown across the Northern border, where at worst they would have to meet foes no better armed or drilled than themselves. As for the negro's courage, when supported and led by his master, not against him, we have never entertained a doubt. The Confederate negro troops will be as much superior in steadiness and effectiveness to the black levies of the North, as the Sepoys under European officers were to the mutinous hordes of Nana Sahib. Besides, what the negro lacks in that intelligence which characterises the white American volunteer, he more than supplies by implicit obedience and insensibility to danger, and he thus possesses the very qualities which professional officers are prone to consider the highest of the soldier.

If the military importance of such an enormous accession to the numerical strength of the Confederacy is almost beyond adequate comprehension, the political and social aspects of the measure assume even more gigantic proportions. It is the most complete scheme of emancipation that visionary ever dreamt of, and, though we cannot disguise the terrible danger of thus subverting at one blow the whole social fabric of a great country, it is undeniable that the experiment, if it has to be tried, is tried in this form with immensely superior practical prospects, and under fewer disadvantages. The liberated slave is spared the demoralisation of a violent change of authority and a disruption of natural ties; he does not learn the duties of freedom by those lessons of domestic treachery, of murder and arson, which the North undertook to teach him; he graduates, so to speak, into liberty, under the same guidance and protection around which the best feelings of his nature have wound themselves from his childhood. What the Yankees promised him as the reward of treason, he receives as the guerdon of honourable service; where they would have implanted corroding hatred, there grow the wholesome fruits of genuine gratitude; where they would have made him the irreconcilable enemy of the Southern white man, under whose care he has advanced from African barbarism to civilisation and Christianity, he continues, what he has always been, an humble but confiding friend, yet with titles to respect from the superior race which he never before, or by any other means, could have enjoyed.

The general belief which the mere rumour that such a step was meditated by the South has received, and the dread which it has inspired in the North, are in themselves the most conclusive refutations of the slanders which have been so industriously propagated in regard to the treatment of the slaves by their masters. Surely, if there were a tithe of that repressed antagonism which Abolitionist fictions describe as the relation between a cruelly oppressed race and their oppressors, this act of the South would be the maddest of suicides. If the inventors of these fictions really were so self-deluded as to believe them, they must scout the simple mention of such an act with ridicule. That they accept it as possible and even probable is a confession that they know the South's trust in the negro, and its reasons for that trust. If the South makes this great sacrifice we shall not be without fears for the future consequences upon its industry, but we shall have the consolation that at last this brave and self-devoted nation stands before a prejudiced world in its true light. The most bigoted partisan of the North will then no longer be able to shut his eyes to the only issues involved in this American struggle—a nation, occupying half of a continent, rising as one man, old and young, male and female, master and serf, in self-defence against a foreign yoke. Whether or no the gift of freedom be a boon to the negro, time and experience alone can show; but the only flag under which he can earn that dangerous boon will then be the cross on the white field, the emblem of hope and faith, and not the polluted and dishonoured stars and stripes, the symbol of dominion and tyranny. It will then be seen whether the professed sympathy for the slave is a genuine feeling, or only a cloak to conceal envy of the master. The hypocrisy of the North which makes the freeing of the slaves a pretext for enslaving the free man, will no longer find any so lost to shame on this side of the Atlantic as to defend it. Among the nations of the earth the Confederate States will stand distinguished for the most courageous experiment of emancipation on record, an experiment on so unprecedented a scale that the boasted self-sacrifices of other nations in distant colonial possessions sink beside it into utter insignificance. And if ever a nation gave proofs of earnestness of purpose and of a character of heroic mould, it will have been that nation which battled for years against a vastly superior foe, and which did not account wealth, dominion, cherished prejudices, both present and future prosperity—nay, its entire social fabric—too dear a price to pay for independence.

The Trade between New York and Nassau.

THE tone assumed by the Federal Government in regard to neutral trade with the Confederate States is so utterly at variance both with the simplest and most universally admitted rules of international law and with the language invariably held in former times by the Americans as a neutral nation, that one is almost tempted to accuse Mr. Seward of utter and absolute ignorance both of law and history—to suppose that he never opened even an elementary treatise on international law, or read a line of the history of his own country. It is more probable, however, that his ignorance is in great measure affected; or rather that, like all American statesmen, he expresses not his own opinions, but the feelings of his master, the mob. Mobs, we all know, care little for law, and an American mob, in particular, recognises no law that conflicts with the pursuit of American interests or the gratification of American passions. An unfortunate want of scholarship, or an accidental bias, has led American teachers to turn the attention of their pupils rather to Roman than to Greek history; and American orators and statesmen seem to pride themselves on imitating Rome in all her worst and meanest qualities; and especially in that outrageous arrogance which treated all opposition to the will of Rome as criminal, and refused to acknowledge in any foreign Power the enjoyment of equality and the possession of equal rights. The language employed by the present Government at Washington towards countries whose naval and military strength is infinitely superior to its own is ludicrously Roman. France and England are lectured in terms which might have found a fitting place in the exhortations of the Roman Senate to Achaia or Ætolia in the days of Hellenic degeneration and Roman ascendancy; and the whole tone of Mr. Seward's diplomatic correspondence is that of a man who conceives himself at liberty to dictate rather than to reason; entitled rather to lay down the law to the world than to submit to the rules imposed by the general consent of civilized Powers, and abide by the conditions of war and peace which were firmly established throughout Christendom while as yet the United States were dependencies of the British Crown. No other attitude would suit a man who is resolved on treating all neutral trade with his enemy as an offence against his own Government, and dealing with foreigners engaged in that trade as criminals, to be caught when and where they may be found, and to be punished upon evidence, not that they have violated any principle of international law, but that they have intended to furnish supplies, whether of arms or food, clothing or medicine, to the enemies of the United States. It is hardly necessary to say that this is a flagrant outrage on public law and on the rights of neutrals; an outrage which commercial powers might righteously punish with the utmost severity of war. The right of a belligerent to interfere with neutral trade is a wholly exceptional right, narrowly limited, and to be interpreted with all possible strictness. Generally, neutral trade is free. Every nation has a right to trade freely with every other; and the fact of war can only affect the nations actually engaged in it. An exception is made in favour of belligerents in special cases. They are allowed, if they can, to intercept goods of a certain class, called contraband of war, on their way to an enemy's port by sea; they are allowed to blockade an enemy's port, and, after notice given, to seize every vessel attempting to break that blockade. But this is all. A belligerent cannot extend these rights, or even define for himself their application. He has no right to make anything contraband of war which is not contraband by the general usage of civilized nations. He has no right to declare a port blockaded except under certain settled conditions; and his right in these limited cases to intercept does not deprive the neutral of his right to trade. Trade between Nassau and Charleston is perfectly legitimate; a British subject engaged in it commits no crime, is liable to no punishment either by British or American law; cannot even be detained as a prisoner of war; only, for the protection of the belligerent, he is allowed, if he can, to intercept vessels bound on such a voyage, and confiscate them with their cargoes; and he may compel the attendance of such persons found on board as may be required to give evidence before the Prize Court summoned to decide whether the destination of the vessel were or were not for a blockaded port. Subject to this unpleasant liability, neutrals have a right to carry on their trade during war as during peace. Mr. Seward writes and acts on the principle that such trade is a crime. He complains that British subjects sell arms and ammunition to the Confederates. He allows Mr. Adams to call our trade with the South "fraudulent," at the very time that he is licensing and giving protection to a precisely similar trade with a Mexican party carrying on war against France. He directs the attention of Lord Russell to the vast increase of our exports to the West Indies, and calls this "suspicious:" the word being used to imply suspicion of criminality, giving the Federal cruisers a right to watch and harass that trade. To this the answer of course is plain and simple: "Hitherto our trade with the Southern States was wont to pass through New York; you, by your own act, have closed that channel against it. We are not bound to lose our trade, which is as legitimate in time of war as in time of peace. We have found another channel for it, and naturally our trade with the great entrepot in this channel is as vastly increased as our trade with New York is diminished. In all this you have no cause for complaint. You may, if you can, intercept the trade between Nassau and Charleston; that is your right as belligerents; but it is a right which, like all privileges in restriction of freedom, must be construed strictly. We cannot listen to any complaints against our lawful trade, nor submit to any extension of belligerent rights, which you, in your days of neutrality, were the most anxious to curtail."

It is unfortunate that this answer was not given, in plain and peremptory language, on the first encroachment or the first remonstrance of the Federal Government. It would have prevented the robbery of our merchants, the outrages on our flag, the blockade of our ports, the insults to our shores offered by scores since the appointment of Captain Wilkes to the command of the West Indian squadron. For, emboldened by our tolerance, the Federal Government carried out its unwarrantable pretension to treat neutral trade with the Confederates as criminal and fraudulent in the most violent manner; arrested British ships on their way to a neutral port, and caused them to be condemned, not on any evidence that their real destination was to a blockaded port, but on proof that their cargoes were probably destined for the use of the Confederates. This is openly and avowedly the ground on which the Peterhoff has been condemned; and a more insolent and flagrant violation of international law could hardly be imagined. It was on this principle that Mr. Seward pretended to justify the systematic interruption of our trade with Nassau, and the attempt to suppress by vexation and menace our trade with Matamoros. It is on the same principle that, in a correspondence which has lasted for more than a year, he defends the measures which have been taken to intercept the trade from New York to the Bahamas.

By international law and by special treaty British subjects are entitled to freedom of trade within the jurisdiction of the United States; and in reliance on that right a commerce has sprung up, of which New York is the channel, between our home and colonial ports. Take for instance the Cunard line: this has a terminus in the Empire City and a branch line thence to Nassau, and goods are consigned to the company's care at Liverpool, to be delivered at the latter place. But it pleased Congress to pass an Act under which the treasury department entrusted the collector of customs at New York with very vague and extensive powers of preventing the export of goods which he supposed to be destined for the "insurgents;" and in the exercise of the discretion thus confided in him, the collector thought fit to take measures amounting to a virtual inhibition of all trade with Nassau. He required that no goods contraband of war should be exported thither under any circumstances; and he further required that all exporters should give bonds to an enormous amount that their goods should not pass into the hands of enemies of the United States. Now it is probably lawful for a government to forbid altogether the export of certain classes of goods to certain foreign ports: at all events this is a power which, under special circumstances, we ourselves have exercised; but then the government should declare by its own authority what goods fall within its definitions, and not leave merchants at the mercy of its revenue officers. Perhaps, also, a government may lawfully exact from exporters a bond that their goods shall actually be carried to the port of their nominal destination. But it can clearly make no stipulations as to the ultimate disposal of the goods. This would be to assume jurisdiction on neutral territory, in violation of international law, and to fetter the freedom of neutral trade. The exaction of these bonds, therefore, was illegal. It was also either irrational or oppressive: irrational, if it was intended bond fide; for what merchant, still more, what skipper,—who is only entrusted to deliver the goods at a particular port, and who then loses all knowledge of them—can pretend to pledge himself as to the use to which a future purchaser may put his wares? oppressive, if it were meant, as seems more likely, to suppress the trade between New York and Nassau altogether, or to throw it wholly into the hands of Northern partisans. At all events this was its actual effect. Shippers refused to give the bonds demanded, and their goods were detained. This would have been an injustice, and a violation of treaty, if it had been confined to the prevention of the export of American goods. But it operated also to prevent the transfer of British goods sent to New York only as a station on the way to Nassau. Ship-owners in charge of such goods were compelled to land them, and to break their contract with the merchants. For above a year this wrong has been the subject of a correspondence, which closes, in August last, with instructions addressed to Lord Lyons to present a fresh remonstrance to the Federal Government. It is clear that, as Lord Russell says, the latter is endeavouring to make the violation of neutral rights a substitute for an effective blockade of the enemy's ports; and we fear that it is also evident that until Lord Russell shows some disposition to enforce his remonstrances by arguments more weighty than any he has yet used, the Federal Government will persevere in its wrong-doing, utterly deaf to all verbal protests, and blind to the clearest demonstration of the unlawfulness of its proceedings which is not illuminated by the flash of artillery. "They manage these things better in France." Foreign statesmen, however partial to the Federal Government, marvel at and generally censure our forbearance. No one imagines that it can last; all see that Federal encroachments must eventually force us to resistance; and most believe that resistance ought to have commenced long ago.

The partisans of the North excuse its conduct on the ground of "provocation." They bid us remember how exasperating it must be to the Federalists to see the Confederates supplied with arms and clothing from British ports, and their blockade neutralized by the skill and enterprise of British seamen. They would have us enter into the feelings of a Yankee who sees us filling the warehouses of Nassau with stores which he knows to be destined for his enemy; who sees vessels clear from his own ports laden with goods destined, in however circuitous a method, to comfort the homes and relieve the sick and wounded of the Confederate States.

We grant the provocation; we admit that to men of malignant tempers the knowledge that coffee and medicines and calicoes find their way in his despite to relieve his enemy's sufferings and cheer the loneliness of his enemy's families, must be almost as exasperating, as to an honest merchant the tidings that his ship, with a cargo on board which might have brought him 300 per cent. has been captured by a blockading squadron, or to a manufacturer the sight of his mill standing still and his people starving for want of the cotton which is kept from him by that squadron's presence. And if the malignity of the Yankee were confined to words—if it exhausted itself in cursing, threatening, and blaspheming—we might allow the sufficiency of the plea of provocation. If our merchants and manufacturers were men of an American temper, they would probably do likewise. But we cannot allow the plea in bar of our claim for redress, when international law has been violated and neutral rights set at naught by Yankee "exasperation." We keep the law now that we are neutrals, as we kept it when we were belligerents; and as we forbore to exceed it then, so we have a right to insist that others shall abide by it now.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE FRENCH AND CONFEDERATE GOVERNMENTS.

The following is a copy of the correspondence between the Confederate authorities and those of the French Government relative to the assistance lately rendered at Charleston on the despatch ship Renaudin:—

Consulate of France at Richmond, Richmond, 29th July.

Sir,—On the happening of an accident on the 23rd of last February, in Sullivan's Pass, which caused damage to the steam despatch ship Renaudin, belonging to the Imperial Navy, the Confederate authorities hastened to tender to the commander of that vessel the gratuitous use of the floating dock at Charleston, and he was thus enabled to make the necessary repairs and continue his voyage.

The Government of the Emperor having been informed of this circumstance, desires, sir, that the expression of his very warm thanks should be transmitted to your Government, as well as to the authorities at Charleston.

I have the honour of enclosing to you a copy of the despatch just addressed to me by the Minister of Foreign Affairs on this subject. I am happy to be thus made the interpreter of the sentiments of my Government upon the present occasion, which affords fresh evidence of the friendly disposition and courteous spirit of which the Confederate authorities had previously given us so many proofs.

Conformably to the instructions of the Department of Foreign Affairs, as you will perceive in the enclosed copy of its despatch, I appeal to your obliging favour, sir, for the transmission to the Charleston authorities of the expression of the thanks due to them, and of the assurance that the Emperor is deeply sensible of their generous conduct, which enabled the despatch steamer Renaudin to complete its repairs.

I pray you, Sir, to accept the assurances, &c.

ALFRED PAUL,

To the Hon. J. P. BENJAMIN, Sec. etary of State, Department of State.

[Copy enclosed in foregoing.]

Paris, June 10th.

Sir,—On the 23rd of February last his Imperial Majesty's despatch steamer Renaudin, which had received the order to touch at Charleston, got aground at Sullivan's Pass, and only succeeded in escaping from this critical condition by the aid of the Milan, and of the English sloop of war Petrel. On the happening of the accident the Confederate authorities were kind enough to tender to the captain of the Renaudin the gratuitous use of the floating dock at Charleston; and he was thus enabled to make repairs that were indispensable to the continuance of his voyage. I desire, sir, that you inform the Government at Richmond how sensible we have been of the kind conduct of the authorities at Charleston, and that you pray it to transmit to those authorities the expression of our lively thanks.

Receive, Sir, the assurance, &c.,

DROUYN DE L'HUYS.

Confederate States of America, Dep. of State,
Richmond, July 31.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 29th instant, enclosing copy of a communication addressed to you by M. Drouyn de L'Huys, in which you are desired to convey to this Government the assurance that the Government of his Imperial Majesty is deeply sensible of the service rendered by the Confederate authorities in placing the use of the floating dock in Charleston at the gratuitous disposal of the despatch steamer Renaudin, belonging to the Imperial navy, when that vessel was damaged by grounding in Sullivan Pass. You further request me to be the medium of transmitting to the authorities at Charleston the warm thanks of his Majesty's Government for their generous conduct on the occasion.

The Confederate Government is much gratified, sir, at having had an opportunity of testifying to his Imperial Majesty the sentiments of cordial regard entertained by it for him and for the French people, and the President desires me to say that he fully appreciates the promptness which the Emperor has displayed in responding to the manifestation of these feelings.

I will very cheerfully communicate to the authorities at Charleston the message for them transmitted by your Government, and I receive with pleasure your own acknowledgment of the friendly courtesy which has always been displayed by this Government towards that of his Imperial Majesty.

I am, with great respect, your obed't servant,

J. P. BENJAMIN, Secretary of State.

M. ALFRED PAUL, Consul of France,
Richmond, Virginia.

"LA FRANCE, LE MEXIQUE, ET LES ÉTATS CONFÉDÉRÉS."

A PAMPHLET bearing the above title has just been published in Paris by Dentu, which, though anonymous, is generally understood to propound the views of the French Foreign Office. It is divided into four short chapters very much like the leaders of a newspaper, and its mode of composition proves abundantly that it comes from the practised hand of a writer for the press, probably of a contributor to the Patrie.

Beginning with the old commonplaces—how the French are men of action, careless of filthy lucre, who look, in distant expeditions, only to glory or at most to political influence, and whose generosity and disinterestedness contrast so favourably with the calculating and commercial genius of England!—the writer, in the first part, shows that France has only sought in this expedition to oppose the absorption of South America by the North. She has also in view to prevent the subjugation of the Latin races on the other side of the Atlantic, and to protect her own West Indian colonies.

The same interest which inclines the sympathies of France to the Secessionist States, has planted our standard on the walls of Mexico. The recognition of the Southern States will be the consequence of our intervention in Mexico; or rather, our intervention there has prepared, facilitated, and rendered possible the diplomatic act which will consecrate the final separation, the secession, of a part of the United States.

The great object of the Emperor has been to regenerate our transatlantic commerce, to restore to it, or to create for it, abundant markets.

This is the subject of the second division of the pamphlet. It describes the native wealth, agricultural and mineral, of Mexico: a soil which only asks for immigration; immigration not of mere men, but of capital and intellect. "Such an immigration has given the United States of America industry, wealth, and courage, and, we may add, it has given tranquillity to England."

Whoever has lived long in Great Britain returns struck with the flagrant contradiction between the individual genius of Englishmen, ever ready for adventures whether naval, commercial, or industrial, and the political genius of the nation, which rejects without examination all revolutionary ideas; for even admitting the superiority of its representative system of government, one cannot help acknowledging that its habits and social laws, especially those which affect property, are far from perfect.

The corollary of this argument is not drawn, but it is left for the sagacity of the reader to infer that all the wild spirits who would have introduced revolutionary ideas, and improved our laws, have been sent for their country's good to America, or the colonies.

In France the spirit of commercial enterprise is, however, awakening, and Mexico offers a wide field for it. "Whether the Archduke accept or refuse the proffered throne, or another Prince take it, or an anonymous government be established under the wings of our eagles, French interest will continue paramount."

The French army, "the purest expression of modern democracy," is there, and with it the four things which are wanting to Mexico: cohesion, order, industry, and force. "The empire which has disciplined and utilised socialism, which has conquered anarchy in France, will do as much for Mexico."

But it can only do these things after the recognition of the Confederate States.

We have sketched the first two chapters shortly to show not only the views of the French Government as expounded by this writer, but also to let English readers see the light by which the French people are taught to read the history of contemporary events. There is much sound sense in many of the views put forward. The third chapter is more interesting to readers of all classes, for the subject admits of few rhetorical flourishes, and there can be little doubt that it faithfully represents the intentions of the Imperial Government. We shall extract largely from it:—

Europe would not even now be alive to the dangers with which the preponderance of the United States threatens it, but for the war between the Northern and Southern States. Europe, tributary to the New World, had taken no precaution to prevent a crisis which she had not foreseen, and which still weighs upon her. We have learned to our cost how precarious is a trade which depends for the production of raw material of the manufacture on which it subsists, on a single market, to whose exigencies it must submit and whose vicissitudes it must share. It is to France that the separation of the Confederate States is eminently favourable, for England has no longer any interest in the cessation of hostilities, and in the constitution of a powerful State intermediary between the Federals and the Spanish-American continent. She fears for Canada, the field in which the North—once the present war brought to a close—may seek a compensation for its losses. Her trade by sea is profiting by the disturbance produced in American commerce; she sees with satisfaction the North and South weakening each other; she furnishes both parties with arms; and while the South has ceased to send her cotton, she is actively promoting its cultivation in India. England will, therefore, never take the initiative in recognising the Confederate States, and the reception which she has twice given to our proposals for a friendly intervention prevents any illusion on that score.

France, on the contrary, can look only to the South for the cotton necessary to her manufactures. . . . No cotton in the world, for price and quality, approaches that of the South. The Federals are so well aware of this, that the war they wage is for them, above all things, a war of interest. The agricultural South was preyed upon commercially by the North, which seeks at any price to retain its best customer. Emancipation is but a pretext dexterously put forward to enlist the sympathies of the unwary liberals of Europe. The Northerners, if successful, would be chary of applying the axe to the tree of slavery. They would hesitate, once masters of the negroes, to do anything which might endanger the cultivation of the cotton, for the sake of which they are waging so obstinately an unjust war. They would soon perceive that the economic condition of a country cannot be changed by a battle or a stroke of the pen. The abolition of slavery, as understood in the North, which means making the negroes food for gunpowder, or transporting them to some distant region to die of hunger, has been judged as it deserves in Europe. These ferocious exaggerations of the love of liberty are as repugnant to our ideas of philanthropy as to our habits. Enlightened men of good faith are not caught with such chaff, and Mr. Lincoln's abolition-cry no longer finds any echo among us. If we could for a moment doubt its value it would be enough that we call to mind the summary justice in which the Northerners delight, the Indian-hunts which are the fashion among them, and that recent proclamation of the Governor of Minnesota offering a reward of $25 for every Indian scalp brought in. . . .

But the first European Power which recognises the Confederacy will be in a position to secure for the negroes much more than the Federals would give if they succeeded in their attempt to restore the Union by force. And as that first Power would be France we may be sure that the cause of civilization, humanity, and progress would not be forgotten. What was difficult, nay, impossible, during the struggle, will become easy in the coming calm. The emancipation of the negroes, the entire abolition of slavery, can only be effected by peace and time; and this great social renovation, which England has in vain sought for with her right of search, will spring from our alliance with the South.

But slavery can in no case be a serious argument against recognition. France and England live in harmony with Spain and Brazil; they protect Turkey and Egypt, yet these countries seem in no wise inclined to abolish slavery. France will use her influence to arrive at a gradual abolition of slavery, but certainly she will not make it a cause of non-recognition.

The States of the North foresaw assuredly these results, and the celebrated Monroe doctrine is after all only an insurance against civilisation.

Northern pride will never humble itself so far as to acknowledge the superiority of the Southrons, yet they have given the Union her best statesmen and the majority of her presidents. Northern pride will yield only to necessity, because it has not kept pace with the age. For twenty years the Northerners have stood aloof from the concert of nations; they understand but the narrowest principles of trade, mere buyers and sellers as they are, and in their fear lest the intellect of the South destroy the ramparts they have raised against European ideas, they seek to annihilate the Confederate States.

The American war, from which we have suffered in France more than the English have done, can only be useful to us if the separation of the North and South be definitely settled, because:—

1. The Confederate States will be our allies, and will guarantee us against attacks from the North.

2. Mexico, fertilised by our efforts and safe from the attacks of the North, will answer all our expectations.

3. Our manufactories will be assured the supplies which are absolutely necessary for them.

If the American war were to end otherwise all the adventurers disbanded at the peace would have no resource but to flock to Mexico, and the harvest which we have sown would be gathered by the Northerners.

The fourth and shortest chapter goes to prove that "the American question is not one of those whose solution can be deferred."

No peace is possible with a reconstruction of the Union.

The elements are too entirely sundered to admit of re-union. The North has been proved impotent in ideas, arms, and production, and cannot absorb the South.

Therefore neither peace nor absorption, nor conquest being possible, there is only secession at the end of the war.

It is proved that the States of the South have a Government which they are able to defend and willing to obey, and that they will no longer consent to serve the commercial interests of the North; and the interests of France coinciding with theirs, France gives them her sympathies, and as a consequence will recognise their independence. Recognised by France they will be recognised by all the world. The Northerners will not then persevere in a hopeless struggle. They will take a hint, which the French navy might enforce.

Such is an analysis of a pamphlet which has already excited considerable attention, with the conclusion of which, as well as with many of its arguments, we agree. If it be, as many think, a pilot balloon thrown up to judge of the popular mind, it is unquestionably a production of considerable importance and although Englishmen may smile at the occasional onesidedness of its reasoning, they will not deny the truth of its deductions. Mr. Canning had to call the New World into political existence to redress the balance of the Old: it is now time for the Old to lend a hand in saving the equilibrium of the New.

GREEK FEDERALISM.*

MR GROTE's thoughtful and philosophic History of Greece lays great emphasis on that peculiar tendency of Hellenic policy which he calls "the instinct of city-autonomy;" the tone of thought and habit of action which referred all patriotic feeling, duty, and allegiance to the civic commonwealth, which made that the country or fatherland (πατρίς) of the citizen, and maintained between city and city a thoroughly national isolation, and not unfrequently actual national antipathy. Everywhere in Greece the city was the political unit, rarely enlarged beyond the boundaries of a single town, with the lands belonging to its inhabitants, and never extending so far that the whole people of the State—the whole body entitled to civic and political rights—could not meet together in the agora to discuss the affairs of their country and give their votes thereon in person. But both Mr. Grote and those who have succeeded him are for the most part content to mark this "instinct" as an existing fact in the political system of Greece, without directly pointing out the peculiarities of the national history out of which it probably arose, and which led the most civilised nation of the ancient world to adopt an organisation so widely different from that which in modern times prevails among those races which have assumed the hegemony of mankind. The empof modern Europe have for the most part arisen out of the conquests made by warlike tribes, to whom industry was distasteful, and who were habituated to a monarchical form of government. Their personal tastes induced them to spread themselves over a large extent of country as the masters of a vassal race; they had too little cultivation and too few civilised tastes to love the life of cities, and too much pride and self-confidence to collect within fortified towns for protection. At the same time the gradual establishment of feudal monarchy created just that kind of loose and elastic bond which was suited to their character and condition, and without imposing on them a yoke felt to be oppressive, preserved national unity in a manner which would have been impossible under republican institutions at a period when a journey from the extremities of the kingdom to its capital must have occupied weeks or months. But nevertheless "free cities," bearing a good deal of resemblance to those of the ancient world, grew up here and there during the middle ages; grew up, that is to say, wherever the hold of the monarch on his vassals became loosened to such a degree as to embolden knights and nobles to assume the privileges of petty sovereigns, to wage war on each other, and plunder their peaceful neighbours. It is probable that perils of a somewhat similar kind created the city organisation of ancient Greece. In many cases, we may believe, the germ of the city was a fortified refuge for an agricultural population in times of war; in others, as we know, it was the natural form assumed by a colony of conquerors planted in the centre of a hostile population. The cities could not well be united in a common allegiance, without some such tie as that afforded by feudalism; and nothing of the kind ever existed in Greece. The rapid development of commerce and civilisation tended more and more to increase the importance of cities, at the expense of the rural districts around them; while the spread of republican institutions, and the varied form which they assumed in different towns, confirmed their isolation, first by making union impossible—seeing that republican institutions can only prevail over a large country by means either of representation or of federalism, neither of which forms of government were dreamt of by the earlier law-givers of Greece—and secondly, by creating antipathy between the different cities which was easily ripened by border warfare into strong mutual hostility. The greater cities gradually extended their territory, either by absorption or by conquest; either by admitting the neighbouring villages and small towns to a full share in their own political being, or by reducing them to a condition of dependence. The two greatest city commonwealths of Greece present to us examples of these two processes, each on a scale immensely extensive. Sparta had extended her empire over a large portion of Peloponnesus. In the earliest ages of history, we find her ruling over subject towns and villages in Laconia, whose people—traditionally supposed to belong to a subject race—served in the Spartan armies and enjoyed civil privileges, but were politically the vassals of the Spartan people. The Pericæi were freemen; they, like the Spartan citizen, might own land and slaves; they appear to have felt as Spartans, and no disposition to revolt is traceable in their history; but they were subjects and not citizens. Conquest, within the period of historical memory, reduced Messene to the same condition; but the Messenians were always disaffected subjects. Sparta, however, as a city, remained without expansion; she was a sovereign or tyrant State ruling over an empire more or less loyal, not the capital and centre of an extended commonwealth. Athens, on the other hand, before the period of historical memory, had absorbed the whole of Attica; and every Attican had become a citizen of Athens. Athens had no subject population; she had a multitude of slaves, and a crowd of denizens, often born within her walls, and the children parents born there, but debarred by their alien blood from citizenship; but every man of Athenian blood within the boundaries of Attica was a full Athenian citizen. Athens, therefore, was by far the largest "city" in Greece; for her political walls enclosed not a town only, but a province. It would seem that a majority at least of the Dorian States had, like Sparta, their Pericæi, whose origin was traced by tradition to an alien and a conquered race; Athens is almost the only Greek city of whom we know positively that she had none; and it is worthy of remark that Athens was to the last the city that clung most obstinately to its isolated autonomy.

Mr. Freeman lays much more stress than we are disposed to do upon traces of Federalism existing in the semi-Hellenic districts of Epirus, Acarnania, and Ætolia. Here, as in Phokis, we know positively that national union existed in some form; but we are by no means so certain that that form was properly Federal; and far too little is known concerning the internal history of any of these nations to make their example useful to the historian of Greek Federalism. There are three cases of quasi-Federal organization, two of which are very lightly passed over in this volume, which, as it seems to us, would have better repaid a careful study.

The early history of the Boeotian League is unknown to us; but Mr. Freeman clearly establishes two points: first, that it had originally a Federal form, under which certain important but definite privileges were enjoyed by Thebes, as the seat of government and the most powerful of the Confederate cities; and secondly, that it was eventually converted, by gradual encroachments, into a Theban empire. It is possible that Thebes may have claimed to be the Boeotian metropolis, and to exercise over her confederates that sort of qualified sovereignty to which colonies were theoretically expected to submit, and the rejection of which gave rise to that quarrel between Corcyra and her "mother-country," Corinth, which was the immediate occasion of the Peloponnesian war. It is memorable that, as against this League, Athens appears as the earliest champion of State rights; interposing to protect Plataea against the aggression of Thebes, supporting her secession from the League, and admitting her into a close and affectionate alliance, which lasted until the destruction of the dependent city in the Peloponnesian war.

We may remark also that there seems to have existed in Greece, from the first, a species of Federal tie, rather sentimental than legal, but nevertheless possessing an important influence over the national destiny. It is quite clear that all Greek cities were supposed to be in some way under a common obligation to resist the Persian invaders; that the Medism of Thebes incurred the reproach not merely of folly and selfishness, but of treason; and that the union of the Hellenic race was sufficiently definite to have at least an honorary permanent president in Sparta. It seems clear, also, that Sparta looked upon the Confederation of the Ægean under Athenian primacy, with considerable jealousy and displeasure; regarding it, if not as a secession, yet as a Sonderbund. The bitter hostility with which she regarded all Greek federations probably rested upon the same ground. She considered herself as the chief or hegemon of a general Confederation of all Hellenic cities for defence against the Barbarian; and all separate Confederations appeared to her as infractions of this general bond, prohibited by its spirit, as separate unions among Cantons or States are forbidden by the laws of strict Confederacies. Even after the secession of Athens and her allies Sparta remained at the head of a powerful Confederation, certainly as closely united as the present German Bund. The opening book of Thucydides, which describes the proceedings taken on the complaint of the Corinthians against Athens—the debate in the Spartan assembly, the vote for war, and the submission of that vote to a Congress of the Confederates—reveals the existence, not of a temporary alliance, but of a regular, however loose, Federal bond among the Dorian States. They could, independently, make war and peace on their own account; but they had, nevertheless, a regular form of consultation on matters of common interest, and a permanent chief; and when war had once been resolved on, it seems that the principles on which it was to be conducted, the direction of operations, and the management of any negotiation for peace, would rest exclusively with the Executive of the League—the Government of Sparta.

The Athenian alliance, in its original form, appears to have been a Confederation of a very much more definite character. Its object was to deliver the Ægean sea from pirates and its coasts from Persia. It had a common treasury and common deliberations. Each State furnished a regular contingent of ships and men, sometimes commuted for money. And it was this money commutation which mainly contributed to change the League into an Athenian Empire. Athens was the Federal Executive and President of the League, possessing in that capacity the right of directing its forces and executing its decrees. On her it devolved to furnish ships and men in place of those contingents for which pecuniary compensation had been accepted. Her duty it was to compel defaulting members to pay up their arrears and fulfil their obligations. The gradual increase of her power, by the substitution of Athenian ships and crews for the contingents of cities which preferred a money tribute, and the reduction of defaulters to a state of dependence, eventually reduced the League to something like the state of an empire exercised by a sovereign State over tributaries in great part disarmed; but its original character was certainly Federal.

After the close of the Peloponnesian war, we find no more permanent and successful confederations of any kind in Greece until the Achæan cities, among whom some sort of union had in early times subsisted, came together during the wars of the successors of Alexander, and established a league which gradually drew one city after another within its influence until its rule was established over the greater part of the Peloponnesus. In its best days all adhesions were voluntary; and admission to the league was regarded as an unmixed gain even by such cities as Corinth, Argos, and Megalopolis. It secured them alike against foreign foes and against domestic tyrants. The decay of the League began with the successes of Cleomenes, king of Sparta—that city appearing, as in all her previous history, "resolved to ruin or to rule" the Hellenic race. Aratus, the all-powerful president of the league, was driven to call in the aid of Macedonia; and to promise, as a guerdon, the citadel of Corinth. This treacherous violation of every essential principle of Federalism well-nigh dissolved the league; and after this it existed, though with extended territory, with diminished vitality and coherence, more or less dependent, first on Macedonia and then on Rome, until it sank gradually into abject subjection to the latter.

As distinguished from the lax Confederacies which had preceded it, the League was certainly a strict and solid Confederacy. Towards foreign powers it was a single State; internally it was a republic composed of republics, each having equal privileges and an equal vote in the Federal Government. It had no President-city; for some time the Federal assemblies were held at the town of Aigium, the chief of the ten Achæan cities of the original union, but not comparable in power to Sicyon, Corinth, Argos, or Megalopolis; afterwards in each city of the League in turn. The Federal Government did not interfere with municipal institutions, though we may be certain that no other form of government than a democracy could practically have existed in any of the confederate cities. The city government, again, could not interfere in foreign affairs; and were expressly forbidden to send or receive ambassadors without permission of the Federal Assembly. This Assembly, held twice a-year, was the sovereign power of Achæa; it legislated, elected magistrates, voted taxes, and made war and peace. It was open to all citizens; but each city had a single vote. Thus, if there were present ten citizens from Sicyon, fifty from Corinth, and a hundred from Argos, at an Assembly held in Megalopolis, the votes of six Sicyonians would determine the vote of Sicyon, which would countervail the contrary vote of perhaps every Argive present; while a majority of fifty Corinthians would balance the vote of a majority of the Megalopolitans present, perhaps, five or ten thousand. This was the nearest approach ever made in Greece to the modern principle of representation—at least, in political affairs. The Assembly chose a general, a deputy-general, a general of cavalry, (the duties of the two last officers seem to have been purely military,) ten ministers, who presided in the Assembly, and advised the general, and a secretary of state. The general was the chief magistrate of the State, elected for one year, and re-eligible only in alternate years. Except while the Assembly was sitting—that is, for 359 days in the year—he possessed a power virtually dictatorial; though, like the Governor-General of India, his acts required the concurrence of a majority of the ministers, which, however, he seldom or never failed to obtain. Except in the union of military and civil duties, which was the universal practice of Greece, this system worked admirably. It gave Achæa a strong executive government, while it effectually secured her against executive usurpations; it rendered city jealousy impossible, by giving equal power to all the cities; and it established a Federal assembly essentially, though accidentally, aristocratic; inasmuch as the votes of a great majority of cities—the more distant from the place of meeting—must always have been held by rich men. Poor men could not spare the time to attend an assembly sitting twenty, fifty, or a hundred miles from their homes for three days at a time. Hence the actual direction of affairs was in the hands of the rich and educated; while these, having to meet their fellow-citizens on equal terms at home, must always have acted with a due regard to the current of popular opinion. The result was a policy at once dignified and liberal, which, in its general features, bore a closer analogy to that of England than to that of America.

We cannot follow Mr. Freeman through his masterly analysis of the Achæan constitution. We can only recommend it to the careful attention of our readers; agreeing with nearly all the author's views, and only recording our protest against the doctrine which denies all connection and analogy between the confederations under Athenian and Spartan primacy, and the perfect, equal, and definitely organised Confederacy of Achæa. It would be too much to regard the latter as a development of the principles on which the former were founded; but we can hardly doubt that the framers of the Federal constitution of Achæa had the history of those confederations before their minds, and learned from that history both what perils they had to avoid, and what degree of stringency must be given to the Federal bond in order to secure its permanence and its efficacy.

A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF STONEWALL JACKSON.*

This unpretending sketch is the best biography that has appeared of the illustrious Southern soldier whose name has become a household word in Europe as well as America. It will no doubt disappoint the majority of readers that only eighteen pages are devoted to the career of Stonewall Jackson before he was engaged in the War of Independence. It would, however, be unfair to find fault with the authoress on this account. So unostentatious was Jackson in his habits that his private life affords no materials for biography, and his earlier services, though creditable, gave so little promise of future greatness, that his own countrymen and his professional comrades were astonished at the dazzling display of military genius that entitles him to rank with the most celebrated captains of ancient or modern times.

Thomas Jefferson Jackson was born at Clarksburg, Virginia, in 1824. His ancestors, both paternal and maternal, were English; but though his family was highly respectable, his parents were comparatively poor and died during his boyhood. He did not receive a liberal education, but he was soon recognised as steady and trustworthy, and when sixteen years old held office as a county constable. He was not devoid of ambition, and desired to enter the army. At the age of nineteen the member for Congress for his section of Virginia had a presentation to West Point, and he was determined to ask for, and, if possible, obtain it. His relatives and friends sought to dissuade him by pointing out the deficiencies of his education and that he was nearly three years beyond the usual age of admission. But Jackson was not to be turned from his purpose. He obtained an introduction to the member of Congress, and carrying his wardrobe in his hand he journeyed to Washington, partly by stage and partly on foot, and that during the muddy season, was introduced to the Secretary of War, who gave him the desired presentation, and complimented him on his ambition and perseverance. He entered West Point, inferior to all his classmates in intellectual attainments, was one of those plodders whom tutors delight to honour, and after four years residence graduated No. 17 in a class of sixty. His fellow-students say that if the years of study had been ten instead of four, he would have been at the head of the whole class. As is often the case, the youthful judgment was correct. When the opportunity came, he showed that the academy of West Point had never turned out an abler soldier. In 1846 he went to Mexico as second lieutenant, where he fought first under General Taylor, and afterwards under General

Scott. He was distinguished for his daring and firmness. He literally led his men into action, and manifested that pluck—we know not a better word—which always raises the morale of an army. Nor did he hesitate to rebuke the timidity, politely called over-caution, of his superior officers:—

On one occasion, when attached to Pillow's division of Magruder's battery, he was ordered by the former to withdraw his company, which occupied a very exposed position. Jackson gave no heed to this over-cautious general's command. On the contrary, he advanced his position one hundred yards and maintained it, doing great execution.

His promotion was gradual, until in 1852 he was made a brevet-major; and in that year, his health being impaired he resigned his commission, and became Professor of Chemistry and Natural Science at the Military College of Lexington. He was zealous in the discharge of his duties, and, perhaps by reason of his conscientious zeal, was not very popular with the students. A youth whom he had expelled for misconduct resolved to revenge himself by shooting him on his way from College to his home:—

He was apprised of his danger by a friend, who met him walking quickly towards the place where the reckless youth lay concealed, and entreated him to retrace his steps. Without being aware that the boy was within hearing, he exclaimed, "Let him shoot me if he will!" and proceeded along the path. But the youth was abashed and slunk away, and the Professor's life was saved.

Besides attending to the work of his professorship he was an indefatigable assistant in the Presbyterian church, of which he was an elder. He taught in the Sunday school, he visited the sick, and as is usual with Southern Christians, took a lively interest in the spiritual welfare of the negroes. Every Sunday he expounded the Scriptures to a class of negro children, and though in all things else modest and retiring, his voice was heard and his influence exerted to the utmost in all questions that related to the moral and spiritual progress of the coloured race. His labours were interrupted by a visit to Europe, which he made subsequent to the death of his first wife. Shortly after his return to America he married again, his second wife being the daughter of the Rev. George Morrison, of North Carolina, and the sister of the wife of General D. H. Hill. He resumed his former mode of life, attending to his professorship and to the duties incident to his position in the church. He abstained from any political action, though he must have watched with keen anxiety the violent agitation which resulted in the disruption of the Union. Directly his State seceded and it appeared that the liberty of the Confederacy had to be defended by the sword he entered on active service. Governor Letcher gave him a commission as colonel of a volunteer regiment, and he soon afterwards joined the Confederate army, being attached to the command of General Joseph E. Johnston.

So well does our authoress tell the marvellous story of Stonewall Jackson's memorable campaigns in Virginia, that we at once refer our readers to her volume. Wisely eschewing all technicalities, she writes a plain narrative, carefully and intelligently compiled from official and newspaper reports, and the result is that her non-military readers will have a clear view of what her hero accomplished. We may be assumed to be tolerably familiar with Jackson's achievements, yet as we perused the little book before us we could not but wonder anew that so many deeds, each of which was sufficient to make a reputation, were crowded into so brief a space. In this respect, Stonewall Jackson is without a compeer. At Manassas he gave token of his consummate ability, and he may claim a large share of the laurels that the Southern army won on that bravely-contested field. Then came his masterly defence of the Valley. By his activity, his foresight, and his skilful strategy, his little force was more than a match for the numerically superior enemy. He marched with a rapidity that confounded the Federal generals and enabled him to beat them over and over again, preventing a junction of the Northern troops and at length driving them from the Valley. In the seven days' battle that resulted in raising the siege of Richmond and crushing General McClellan's army, he played an important part; and it is not too much to say that the glorious victory was due to his conduct as well as to the strategy of the Confederate commander. By this time "Old Stonewall" was the pet of the Southern army; but though his career was nearly over he was yet to do more than enough to glorify a long life-time. He defeated Pope, he captured Harper's Ferry, he did splendid work in the Maryland campaign, he was the hero of Fredericksburg, and General Lee will testify that to his prowess was due the triumph of Chancellorsville. And then, in the flush of victory, full of honours though young in years, Stonewall Jackson met his death by a deplorable accident. He died, to the inexpressible grief of the South, and to the regret of the civilised world. It was natural the Federal press should be glad that their dread opponent was no more; but it is but fair to add that they spoke of his death in a respectful, creditable manner. The only journal that was dastardly enough to fling a stone at the dead hero was the English organ of Messrs. Lincoln and Bright.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

NEW ORLEANS, August 15.

By the opening of railway communication once more to Brashear from this city, we learn something about affairs on the Lafourche and across the Bay. The road has been unused till this week, since the destruction of the bridges across the bayous by General Dick Taylor's men after they took possession of Brashear City. We know now the full extent of the damage done. It has cost $25,000 to rebuild the bridges over Bayou des Allemands, Lafourche, Boeuf, and the smaller bridges. The repairs of track and replacing the rolling stock destroyed at Brashear, will cost probably $30,000 more. The negroes on the "Government" plantations (as they are called) have been carried away, and the cane crops are choked with weeds. The railway-station buildings, excepting those at Tigerville, were burned to the ground. Everything portable at Brashear City in the way of military stores, was carried away. It was a clean sweep. The Confederates had five small steamboats and nearly thirty days in which to carry away the property. They kept the cars to run up and down the road through Lafourche to the last day, and burned the train just as they abandoned Brashear.

The left wing of Weitzel's brigade, two regiments, is at Brashear City. Two Federal gunboats, the Clifton and the Sachem, lie in the Bay. The rest of Weitzel's brigade is in summer quarters, camped two miles above Thibodeaux, and General Weitzel occupies Mr. John Williams's house (formerly Bishop Polk's) as his headquarters.

Opposite Brashear, on the Berwick side, is the Confederate advance, under command of Colonel Jim Major, who has 4,000 men at Camp Bislard, six miles from the Bay. The place has been strongly fortified and there and at New Iberia there are fifty mounted guns. Along the Teche there are now not less than 15,000 encamped Confederates. General Mouton commands the lower division near Berwick, and General Taylor the upper division at New Iberia. General Kirby Smith is at Shreveport in command of the Louisiana army. Price's and Holmes's men from Arkansas are joining him, and by autumn there will be an army of at least 50,000 men in Northern and Western Louisiana. Do you think Opelousas and the Attakapas are in danger from another Federal invasion? It does not look like it.

There are no indications whatever of a movement across Berwick Bay. It is more probable that the invasion will be from that quarter. Indeed, Major is reported to have notified the Federal commandant of the port at Brashear that if he would fill his depot again with commissary stores he would come and carry the whole away.

Mrs. General Gardner came over Wednesday under a flag of truce, and is now in this city with her father, ex-governor Mouton. She brought a young daughter with her, and visits her husband, of course, daily.

General Wickliffe has been permitted to go to his plantation at Bayou Sara; that is, he has received a pass from General Banks for that purpose. Major Monroe has been released from Fort Pickets and was sent into the Confederacy via Pascagoula. He was not permitted to come to this city.

A release was sent down by the last boat for all the prisoners in Port Pickets, and in some cases the conditions require them to go into the Confederacy, and do not permit them to go abroad.

Port Hudson is "ours," you know; but last Wednesday two Federal steamboats went to a plantation on the west bank of the Mississippi, nearly opposite Port Hudson, to bring away 500 bales of cotton. They tied up at the levee, and began loading, when a party of General Taylor's men came down and fired on the boats, killing one man and wounding a cotton speculator whose name was Denny. The boats cut their lines and steamed out into the river, while the Confederates set fire to the cotton and destroyed it. Nevertheless, the Mississippi is open!

A slave belonging to Mr. E. L. Jenkins was shot dead in the street near his master's residence in this city Wednesday night, while trying to escape from the armed negroes who go about the city at night to steal and sell their fellow negroes into the slavery of the Federal army. The negro refused to enlist, and attempted to escape to his master's house, when five bullets were fired into his back and shoulders, and he fell dead on the banquette. This is the civilization which the North proposes to introduce in place of the "barbarism of slavery." This is the "liberty" promised to the negro. That is, he can go into the army and be shot in the ditches by the Confederates, or he can refuse to enlist and be shot in the streets by his "friends" the Federals.

A Federal soldier was shot near the Vicksburg cotton press on the Levee yesterday, for killing a major of the 28th Maine Regiment at Donaldsonville, July 5. The soldier was an Irishman, 30 years old, named Francis Scott. He had been five years in the United States' regular service, and then joined the Louisiana Heavy Artillery. He was in Fort Jackson and was taken prisoner. He afterwards took the oath and joined Banks's army. In his dying speech he said that Major Bullen drew a revolver to kill him, that he shot him in self-defence, and that he would do the same thing again. He died very bravely. The whole division was paraded to see him shot.

The camps above New Orleans, at Carrollton and on the other side above Algiers, are lively since the arrival of Ord's corps. There are no indications of an immediate movement upon Mobile. The gunboat Monongahela went over yesterday to join the blockading squadron off Mobile Bay.

Dow has been brought to Mobile under an escort of police. He will probably be tried as a common thief. He is not entitled to exchange as a general, any more than Butler would be if he should fall into the hands of the Confederates.

Day before yesterday, in military court, a soldier belonging to the 91st New York was on trial for going with a squad of armed negroes to different plantations in Lafourche and stealing whatever he liked. He "visited" the places of Mrs. Regan, Mrs. Lessaigne, Mrs. Nelson, and Mr. Le Day, and carried away horses, mules, furniture, chickens, and other property. When arrested, he had in his possession thirty-five horses and mules and a wagon-load of furniture stolen from Mrs. Regan. It was in evidence that Mrs. Regan was so alarmed at the armed negro raid upon her premises, that she lay at the point of death. For all this, in a city where negroes are shot dead for refusing to "volunteer," this scoundrelly soldier was sent to the parish prison for a term of only six months' imprisonment.

Two white officers, a colonel and an adjutant, of different negro regiments, have been summarily dismissed from the Federal service for grossly insulting a naval officer.

Night before last we had a highway robbery soon after sundown on the new shell-road near the city. A hack, with two soldiers and two women in it, was stopped by three men in Federal artillery uniform, who demanded money, at the same time presenting their revolvers. They stripped the pockets of the men and women and then took possession of the carriage. They were pursued by a Federal lieutenant and a sutler, and were ordered to stop. They did so, and immediately fired at their pursuers, wounding them both badly. Two men have since been arrested upon suspicion.

Altogether we are having a very nice time under the benign influences of the new Northern Abolition "civilization and refinement."

The "grape-vine route" brought to the city last evening Mobile papers of August 6. There is no news of importance. The fear of a Federal invasion seems to have subsided, and preparations are making to meet it when it comes. The Tribune (6th inst.) says that Mr. Soule is in Richmond.

August 12.

The Federal 13th Army Corps, commanded at Vicksburg by McClellan, who was suddenly removed by Grant for an objectionable paragraph in a congratulatory address to the corps, was handed over to Major-General Ord, and has been assigned to duty in this department. The men were brought down in transports from Vicksburg to Port Hudson, and to-day they are coming down the river to Camp Parapet at Carrollton, six miles above New Orleans. It is probable that the order will be published here to-day or to-morrow, announcing that General Franklin has succeeded to the command of the 19th Army Corps—General Banks retaining the command of the department. The military situation here to-day, then, is this: the 13th and 19th Corps form the Army of the Gulf Department; General Herron's division is still near Port Hudson, in camp; a few negro companies garrison that post; Weitzel's division is in camp above Thibodeaux on the Lafourche, a few miles from the old camping ground; two regiments are at Brashear; a few Federals hold the posts at the forts below this city, here, at Donaldsonville, and Baton Rouge above, and elsewhere near New Orleans wherever a few men are needed.

The sudden reinforcement of Banks leads many persons to suppose that an important military movement will soon be made. The addition, however, of the whole 13th Corps hardly replaces the men Banks has lost by the recent campaign, by sickness, and by the expiration of the term of service of his nine-months men. Nor can the new corps, which has been through the campaign at Vicksburg, be very formidable, since a dozen transports brought the whole force down the river.

The very large army employed by Grant in the reduction of Vicksburg can now be used in other places, leaving a force sufficiently large to hold the position on the river. It is reported that besides the men sent here—Ord's corps, and Herron's division—a force is moving towards Montgomery with the design of advancing by the Alabama River to Mobile. The troops supposed to be thus engaged may possibly be marching to reinforce Rosecrans in Tennessee. As I wrote in my last letter, there does not seem to be an immediate intention of an expedition against Mobile. The 19th Army Corps, after its protracted siege of Port Hudson, needs rest and recuperation. The weather just now is very warm and weakening to Northern men. The camps of the corps are in comparatively healthy sections and seem located for the summer. Telegraph lines have been completed for communication between the posts; and bringing the 13th Army Corps near this city is only because it is healthier here than at Port Hudson, and more convenient for furnishing supplies at less expense of transportation. I still think the Mobile movement will be delayed till Charleston and Savannah have been reduced. The navy must play a very important part in securing the Federal foothold in Alabama; Farragut must return from the North; the iron-clads must come round to the Gulf from the Atlantic coast; and the whole movement, from its magnitude and importance, must be preceded by more significant preparations than are manifested in this department now. It is reasonable to suppose, in spite of the concentration of forces here, that no important Federal movement will be made till cooler weather.

Meanwhile, the military efforts here will be mainly directed to the business of enlisting negroes.

I fear your readers will tire of Port Hudson. The 19th Army Corps was sick of the very sight of it for weeks before it succumbed to starvation; but there is something almost daily new and interesting to us in New Orleans about the late siege—some reminiscence, the stories of both Confederate and Federal officers and soldiers—all adding to the history of a siege and resistance that will form one of the most interesting chapters of the war when it is written. A Confederate officer, one of the paroled, has been writing an interior view, which is published in one of the city journals. Of course, it is careful enough, in respect of the restrictions under which all newspaper matter is given to the public now that martial law obtains in New Orleans. Still, the writer, in giving an account of the assault of May 27, tells the story of the valour of the much-praised negro troops boldly, as follows:—

This was the battle of the 27th of May. A demonstration had, indeed, been made upon our extreme left, but it did not amount to a charge. A couple of negro regiments, with a line of white troops behind them, came up through a growth of young willow trees to the edge of the clearing, a distance of between six and seven hundred feet from a rifle pit we had dug along the bluff which came out at that place. They were fired into by a small party of skirmishers in the woods on their flank end from the thinly-lined rifle pit in their front, with a couple of small mountain howitzers which we had there. They broke at our fire and clustered behind the willow trees, apparently too panic-stricken either to advance or run. Our shots tore the fragile willows into fragments, and the splinters were probably as dangerous as our fire, so that they were stricken down with great havoc.

On account of the line of white troops behind them, they probably had some difficulty in getting away, but in fifteen minutes after they first appeared none of them were to be seen except the dead and those who were too badly wounded to crawl off, and these, some 250 in number, could be plainly seen, through a spyglass, among the willows. The nearest of their dead to our rifle pits were 200 yards distant. This was the last we saw of negro troops at Port Hudson.

The Federal official organ gives a whole column of editorial, not to disprove but simply to deny this statement. The commanding general (Banks), in his official report of this assault, devotes much space to the conspicuous part taken by the negro regiments. This was at a time when the Corps d'Afrique was in process of formation, and all the fulsome flattery of the negroes was for the purpose of inducing other blacks to take the places of those that were slaughtered at Port Hudson, and to join the army of martyrs in the black brigade.

— This African adulation, this slinging of Sambo with a saliva of sweet-sounding words to induce him to enlist, is very different from the Abolitionists' outspoken views among themselves. I find in a Boston Abolition sheet a report of an address by the "Rev. Horace James, Chaplain of the Massachusetts Twenty-fifth Regiment." He is talking to a white audience, in the town of Roxbury, in favour of negro enlistments:—

Remember that every black soldier who is put into the field may intercept the bullet that would otherwise pierce the breast of a white man. How can any individual, with one speck of human feeling, look coldly on an experiment, the object of which is to save the lives of our own young men, as well as to elevate and interest an oppressed, but tractable and courageous race?

It is difficult to conceive how the "experiment" as this clerical individual calls it, is to "elevate" an "oppressed, but tractable and courageous race;" it is easy to fancy that a cold-blooded proposition to use Sambo to "intercept the bullet that would otherwise pierce the breast of a white man," would be a matter of sufficient "interest" to the negro to induce him to decline this use of his person. That they have been so used is sufficiently evident from the reports of every Federal engagement where "American citizens of African descent" have been in the field. They are merely food for powder—black breastworks for white soldiers; and it is creditable to this Abolition clergyman that he is candid enough to acknowledge the fact.

The Federal Marshal in this department has published in the official organ his "monitions" respecting the property of J. B. Benjamin, Confederate States' Secretary of State; General Beauregard; Thomas J. Semmes, senator; Messrs. Duncan F. Kenner, and Charles M. Conrad, representatives; Colonels Marshal J. Smith and I. Szymanski; Lieut.-Colonel W. B. Kountze; Brigadier-Generals Daniel W. Adams and Harry J. Hays, of the Confederate Army; and Maurice Grivot, Adjutant-General of Louisiana. It is supposed these notices are intended to inform the public that this confiscated "rebel" property is to be sold to the highest bidder. It is, however, nothing but a "scare." The Confiscation Act of the Federal Government does not authorise the transfer of real estate by title; the State laws are wholly inoperative in Federal hands; and no one will bid at a sale of property of this kind, unless some Federal is veridant enough to think he can hold the same "during the life of the traitor;" for the Confiscation Act cannot destroy the rights of the so-called "traitor's" heirs. The sale, if it occurs at all, will be a farce. The same monitions include the small steamer Bagaley, lately captured while coming with cotton from Mobile.

The Federals have ceased sending sick and wounded men from Vicksburg to this city for transportation to Mobile, and we are consequently without news or papers from that place for several days. The Vicksburg men who are in the hospitals here receive every care and attention that can be bestowed upon them by their friends. Faithful, loving, warm-hearted women are constantly by their bedsides, and many ladies have volunteered as hospital nurses for the sake of giving their whole time and attention to sick and wounded Confederates. There is only one advantage the Federal sufferers have over the Confederates. If anyone is sufficiently interested in a special case, the patient can be removed from the hospital to a private house, where the chances of recovery are greatly increased by special and exclusive care and nursing. Every Confederate would be so treated; but he must first take the oath of allegiance to the Federal Government. Some of the Union ladies, who are anxious to make proselytes, hover around the beds of dying Confederates, and assure them if they will "only" take the oath, they shall be conveyed to a private house and receive every care and attention. Now and then one of them is told he is dying, and that he had better renounce his errors and swear allegiance to the "United" States. While a few of these tempted men have yielded, I am assured that at least fifty Confederates have died in one hospital, all of whom had the chance of recovery (if private nursing would have effected it), if they would "only" take the oath. They literally "died first."

A schooner to convey "registered enemies"—the first advertised in many weeks—will sail for Pascagoula next Friday.

Confederate money has advanced 1 per cent. more, and Creole-Frenchmen are buying it in small quantities. They claim to have received important letters by the last mail from Paris.

The peremptory order requiring orchestras to begin all public entertainments with "Hail Columbia" and to close with "Yankee Doodle" (the last is facetiously called a national air!) has effectually killed amusements in this city. The Federal authorities have thereupon provided for the public playing of these airs in the squares and streets of the city, two or three evenings in the week. This is done to force the objectionable airs upon the public, just as the coffee-houses and dram-shops are compelled to fly the stars and stripes over their doors, or lose their licenses. Such "loyalty" is not worth much in this boasted "Union city," where crowds of secession-sympathizing women are dispersed on the Levee by cavalry charges. Yet, the registered enemies are supposed to be gone away, and the Northern papers are boasting that Louisiana is crying to be restored to the Union. It may be conquered, but there is nothing to indicate that the planters, the people, will ever return to the "United States." It is too late.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, September 9.
The rate of discount is still supported as nearly as possible at the Bank minimum of 4 per cent.; and it is only in rare instances that the price of 3½ per cent. is quoted. At present no indications of a reduction by the authorities of Threadneedle-street are furnished, and it may be questioned, looking at the general situation of things, if any change will take place before the payment of the October dividends. The number of floating engagements is large, the absorption of capital in the provinces continues increasing, and there is little expectation of the return of the latter money before the next four or five weeks. At the same time also the tendency of the public to operate in speculative foreign securities will create a certain degree of caution, and prevent the directors from precipitately lowering the terms of accommodation, which if the change were made would assist to encourage this doubtful kind of business. The advances from Paris are not favourable to the position of finance there, and should it be necessary to raise further supplies, this, with a contemplated enormous transaction for Mexico, would temporarily disturb the whole of the European money markets. We do not look for any severity of pressure throughout the remainder of the year, unless adverse foreign political causes arise; but nevertheless we are quite prepared, even should a reduction in the rate take place in October, when the dividends are paid, to 3½ per cent., to experience shortly afterwards a rebound, leaving the quotations ruling between 4 and 4½ per cent. in the latter part of the winter or the beginning of the spring. On the Stock Exchange the terms for short loans have from 2 and 2½ per cent. advanced to 3 and 3½, and in the course of yesterday transactions actually occurred at 4 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The amount of gold sent into the Bank this week has been £161,000, against a withdrawal of £100,000 for transmission to Brazil. The arrivals of specie have not been so large as for some weeks past, being only £247,940, the whole of which is from America. The silver market has been rather more busy, but at a slight advance in prices. The bar silver brought by the last West India mail, and some considerable parcels from the Continent, have been sold at 5s. 1½d. per oz., being ½d. above the price obtained for the supply by the previous packet. The present supplies have been taken chiefly for transmission to Bombay by the steamer on Saturday, which is expected to take in all a large total, the demand for that quarter, chiefly to pay for cotton, having increased. The Mexican dollars brought by the Shannon have not yet been disposed of. Advances from Melbourne report the shipment for England, during the month, of £531,000 in gold. This makes the total on the way hither £676,000, including £145,000 by the Anglesea, announced by the previous mail. The Magdalena steamer for the Brazils will take out £149,680 in gold.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Business on the Stock Exchange has been of a very animated character throughout the week, particularly in the foreign department. In the Home Securities operations have been rather interfered with through the settlement of the account, and a slight retrograde movement in prices is apparent, in consequence of a larger delivery of stock than was expected, otherwise nothing has occurred either as regards foreign or home politics to cause a downward tendency. The closing price of Consols this evening was 93½ to 3 for money, and 93½ to 3 for the account, which is a decline of about ½ per cent. as compared with this day week. Exchequer Bills are slightly firmer, being up to par to 3s. prem. The Foreign Stock Market has been exceedingly animated, but the great feature has been in Mexican, which have advanced from 2½ to nearly 3 per cent. in consequence of a rumour that France proposes a fresh loan of £28,000,000; of which it is said £8,000,000 will at once be deducted for her war expenditure, leaving £20,000,000 to adjust all claims which may be made on Mexico, including the existing foreign debt. The scheme if carried out is looked upon favourably, and it is thought that the stock will yet be still higher. Greek Stock has also been largely dealt in, but the highest point touched was not sustained at the close of the market. The rise in these securities has been chiefly in anticipation of the arrival of the King in this country, and the prospect of a speedy and satisfactory marriage arrangement being concluded. Turkish Securities have been again much looked after, and prices have improved from 1 to 1½ per cent. Spanish have been rather quieter, but values continue remarkably good. The closing quotations were, Greek Five per Cents. 37½; Mexican 42½; Spanish Passives 35½ to 36; and the Certificates 13 to 13½; Turkish Six per Cents. (1854) 94½ to 25, and ditto (1862) 71½ to 71½.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

A large and active business continues to be transacted in American Government and Railway Securities, the recent advances from the other side of the Atlantic having induced an enlarged speculative movement, particularly in those stocks more immediately connected with the Northern States. The transactions of the week have been as follows:—United States Five per Cents., 70, 71, and 70; Virginia State Six per Cents., 42½. Atlantic and Great Western Railway (Pennsylvania Section), 77, 78, 77½, 78. Erie Shares, $100 all paid, 84, 85, 84½, 84½, 85, 84½, 85½, 85½, and 85. Do. Seven per Cent. Preference, 74, 75, and 74. Illinois Central Six per Cents., 85. Do. Do. Seven per Cents., 81, 82, and 81. Do. $100 Shares, $20 paid, 8, 7½, 8½, 7½, 5, 4½, 5½, 5½, 4½, 5, and 5½ dis. Do. do., all paid, 81½, 80½, 81, 84½, 83, 84, 83½, 84½, 81½, 84½, 83½, and 83. Michigan, North and South Indiana, $100 Shares, 73. New York Central, Six per Cents., 72½. Do. do., $100 Shares, 90, 90½, 90, 91½, 92½, 91, 94, 92 93½, 94½, 93, 94, and 94. Pennsylvania Central Bonds, first mortgage, 73½. Do. do., Second Mortgage, 88, and do. do. $50 Shares, 44½.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

There has been little doing in this stock since our last issue. The news of the destruction of Fort Sumter, and the confident expectations of the Federals that the city of Charleston will shortly be in their hands, depressed the value momentarily to 33 discount; from this there was a speedy rally to 30 to 28 discount. To-day there is little doing, and the quotation is marked 31 to 29 discount,—at the close 30 to 28—more doing, and, as it is said, on French account.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

A rather extensive amount of business has been transacted in English railway shares, but prices have undergone less fluctuation than usual, though the tendency is towards greater firmness. The chief operations have been in the heavier descriptions of shares. The only alterations of importance since last week have been an improvement of ½ per cent. in South-Eastern, ½ per cent. in Metropolitan, ½ per cent. in Lancashire and Yorkshire, and ½ per cent. in East Anglian. On the other hand, there has been a decline of ½ per cent. in Great Western, and of ½ per cent. in London and South-Western and North Bristol. A fair business has also been done in Foreign Railway Shares, but without any material alteration in values. With regard to the shares of railways in the British possessions, a rather more limited business has been transacted, but nevertheless prices are well supported.

The Grand Trunk Railway of Canada have given notice that the half-yearly interest due on the Atlantic and St. Lawrence sterling shares will be paid on and after the 15th instant.

THE NEW VENEZUELAN LOAN.

A meeting of the members of the Stock Exchange interested in the Venezuelan Loan, brought forward in June last, was held at the Exchange on Monday, for the purpose of memorialising the contractors to return the deposits, the Venezuelan Government having declined to ratify the loan. A resolution to the above effect was about being considered, when Mr. Mullens read a communication he had just received from Messrs. Matheson and Co., the contractors, announcing that the deposits would be immediately returned to those subscribers who should lodge the scrip certificates with them by three o'clock on Wednesday (this day). It was stated in the course of conversation that the Venezuelan Government had refused to ratify the loan, considering the amount, £1,000,000, to be too small for the purposes required, and that some of the conditions attached could not be accepted. The announcement of the decision of Messrs. Matheson was received with satisfaction, and consequently the proposed resolution was not offered to the meeting.

THE SOUTH SEA COMPANY.

A period of seven years having elapsed since the winding-up of the South Sea Company was agreed upon, it is now proposed to make the final distribution out of the remaining assets, which will produce to each proprietor about £1 5s. per cent. When the winding-up took place, a sum of £44,000 was set aside to meet any contingent claims, and it is the remainder of this sum from which the division will be made.

THE ITALIAN IRRIGATION COMPANY.

The last instalment of the one million of bonds issued by the Italian Irrigation Company was paid on the 1st instant. The whole have now been subscribed for, and the bonds, duly executed by the representatives of the Italian Government, are now ready to be issued in exchange for the scrip. The bonds are for £100 each, and bear interest at 6 per cent. payable in England, and are redeemable at par in 6½ years.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY PREFERENCE STOCK.

Tenders are asked for by the London and North-Western Railway Company, for £2,197,666 perpetual 5 per cent. preference stock, with dividend from the 1st October next. The adjudication will be made on the 18th instant.

BANK MEETINGS.

A general meeting of the shareholders of the Bank of British Columbia was held to-day, when a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent., free of income-tax for the nine months the bank had been in operation was declared. The report, which was unanimously adopted, stated that the accounts to the 30th June last showed a profit of £7,101. The chairman (Mr. T. W. Maclean), stated the Directors had fully discharged 20 per cent. of the preliminary expenses; that a new branch had been opened at Freshfield, in British Columbia, near the gold mines, and that a new postal service was to be established in a few months with Vancouver's Island by a line of steamers between that place and Panama, touching at San Francisco.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the half-yearly meeting of the Lambeth Bridge Company, a dividend at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum for the past six months was agreed to. The report stated that the balance in hand applicable to the dividend was £1,865, after payment of which there would remain a balance of £540. The chairman (Lord Torrington), in moving the adoption of the report, said the amount of the dividend was of itself sufficient to prove that the business of the company had been conducted in a proper manner—that the bridge had been constructed on the most economic principles, and that the structure was a most satisfactory one, and was in every way in thorough condition.—At the half-yearly meeting yesterday of the London General Omnibus Company a dividend was declared for the past six months at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. The report stated that the debts and liabilities on the 30th June amounted to £57,500, being £49,519 less than the amount at which they stood at the time of the first general meeting of the company after its English registration. The total reserve fund stands at £14,722. The gross receipts during the half-year amounted to £298,428, and the gross expenditure to £273,079, leaving a net profit for the half-year of £25,349, out of which, after paying the dividend, there remained £4,713 to be carried to the current half-year's account.—At the annual meeting of the Manchester Cotton Company it was stated that the receipts from the formation of the Company in February, 1861, to March 31, 1863, had been £54,968, whilst the total payments had amounted to £49,404, showing a balance at the Company's bankers of £5,564. The cost of working and establishing the Company had been—homo account, £5,517; India account, £3,896; making a total of £9,413.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus of another new Hotel Company has just been issued, for which a capital of £50,000 is required, and it is proposed to raise it by the issue of 5,000 shares of £10 each. The title of it is The Buxton Hotel Company (Limited), and the intention is to erect a first-class hotel at Buxton, Derbyshire, now one of the most fashionable places of resort for visitors and tourists in the United Kingdom. The site of the proposed building is on a piece of land of four acres extent, on the estate of the Duke of Devonshire, for the purchase of which a provisional contract has been entered into, and is contiguous to two railway stations.—The Tobacco, Cigar, and Snuff Company is another new undertaking just announced, with a proposed capital of £100,000, in 20,000 shares of £5 each, but of which only one-half will be issued in the first instance. The object of the company is to combine in one large establishment the business of importers, manufacturers, and exporters, and with that view a conditional purchase has been made of an old-established manufactory. Substantial advantages are offered to large purchasers and to persons already in the trade, and the directors pledge themselves to supply the best articles free from adulteration.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In some descriptions of American produce, the dealings have rather extended, and prices have shown a greater degree of firmness, but generally the variations are not important. The activity in the cotton market continues, stimulated by the favourable accounts from consuming markets as well as decreasing stocks, and quotations have again advanced fully 1d. per lb. The weather being still unpropitious, harvest work is retarded, and the steadier tone of the grain markets noticed in our last has grown into a slight amount of buoyancy. As yet, however, the rise in prices has been confined to English produce, American wheat and flour remaining without quotable change, but at the same time exhibiting an upward tendency. The provision trade is dull, and where even a trifling extension of business has occurred, it has been at easier prices. American butters are merely nominal, there being so little here. Some small sales of bacon middle continue to be made for export upon moderate terms. The fine qualities of lard also meet some inquiry, without, however, leading to any important operations. A further movement has taken place in the petroleum market, the advance of the season favouring the demand for consumption. The price of crude Pennsylvania has risen £2 per ton, £21 to £22 being the present quotation. American refined is 2d. per gallon dearer. Holders now ask 2s. 7d. on the spot, and for winter delivery 2s. 8d. has been paid. American sperm oil is dull at the recent decline, which has not as yet induced any perceptible increase of demand. Our tallow market has fluctuated a good deal since this day week. At one period quotations were depressed 1s. to 1s. 6d. per cwt., increasing stocks and limited consumption having kept up a protracted heaviness, which at length had the effect of bringing speculative sellers on the market. The depression has, however, given place to some amount of activity, prices being by many considered already too low to be regarded as unsafe, and to-day we have had, with some brisk purchases, a rebound of 1s. per cwt. Our quotations, therefore, close about the same as they stood before, and the future course of the market is not viewed with any great want of confidence. The tobacco trade has not presented any new feature, but that previously noticed is becoming more developed, and the dealings have been principally in other descriptions than American, owing to the difference in price. The sales of turpentine are still confined to French, which is rather dearer, but still considerably under the price of American. In resin there is no change worth naming. In drugs the only alteration is an advance of 3s. per cwt. in Cape aloes, but a steady business is passing in most descriptions. Dyes generally are firm, but turmeric is 4s. lower. All kinds of iron are dearer, owing partly to the increased cost of production, from the higher rates of wages paid to operatives. Other metals remain stationary, with only limited transactions.

The following are the current prices of the principal articles of American commerce with this country, compared with the rates current at this time last year:—

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, September 9.

Although there was at one period during the week a tendency to a slight falling off in the demand of cotton at Liverpool, a fresh impetus has since been given to business through the recent advices from America, and prices are once more rapidly advancing, and there seems little, if any, abatement in the confidence lately manifested. In addition to purchases on the spot, large transactions have taken place in cotton to arrive at enhanced rates. The sales this week have been exceedingly heavy, being 108,000 bales, of which 55,000 have been taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 1,558,970 bales, against 2,173,530 bales to the corresponding period last year. The total imports have been 1,020,812 bales this year, against 675,670 bales in 1862. The exports this year have reached 303,860, and for the same period in 1862 312,106 bales. Taken for consumption this year, 866,600 bales; same period last year, 927,900 bales. Taken on speculation this year, 336,060 bales; last year, 865,770 bales. Computed stocks at the present time, 240,000 bales; and for the same period in 1862, 58,590 bales. At the beginning of the week Brazilian advanced 1d. to 1d. per lb., and a further advance to the same extent has since taken place. In Egyptian there has been more steadiness, but still sales have taken place to a fair extent. For East India and Surats the demand has not been quite so great. Chinas are more steady, the trade having been free buyers. American descriptions have been most in demand, at advancing prices. Owing to the scarcity of fair qualities of American, it has been decided not to give quotations for this kind, but to substitute the middling, for which the prices are as follows:—Uplands, 23½d. to 24½d. Mobile, 24d. to 24½d. Orleans, 24d. to 24½d.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, September 8.

Since our last report there has been a very good business done in both yarn and cloth, at steadily advancing prices, and the reports from foreign markets are such as to impart a belief of a steady and legitimate demand being kept up for some time to come.

The Germans, who have kept aloof from buying for some time back, are now coming into the market again, and making offers for considerable quantities of yarn, both in bundle and warp. The demand for India mules continues good, and spinners of this latter description are, as a rule, well under contract. Home trade yarns sell readily at extreme prices.

Manufacturers of goods suitable for export are, as a rule, well engaged, and looms are being set to work which have been standing idle for some months past.

Yarns have advanced during the week fully 1d. per pound in numbers up to 60s., and in finer counts, 1½d. per pound has been obtained.

Cloth has advanced almost to the same extent.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence.

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLLY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHERIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

MR. LINCOLN has issued a political manifesto, of which we publish the text in another part of our impression. Mr. Lincoln declares that the South must be conquered or the Union given up, and that "any compromise embracing the maintenance of the Union" is now impossible. All the world knew this, but why should Mr. Lincoln make such an avowal? That his party may be confident that he will not consent to a constitutional reconstruction of the Union, which would of course be the ruin of the Republican faction; and that his supporters may be assured that the South is to be conquered (if possible), and then, to quote the not attributed to Mr. Seward, "the fatted calf to be killed and eaten." Mr. Lincoln backs up his assertion with a cogent argument. He divides the South into two parties: the non-combatants, who desire reunion, and the army, that will not have reunion. He will not offer terms to those who wish to make terms because it is no use, but when those who will not make terms do make terms, why he will not reject them. Mr. Lincoln then dashes into the negro question, and makes a desperate attempt at pleasing all parties. With genuine West-country humour, he observes, "I certainly wish that all men could be free; while you, I suppose, do not." He goes on to explain that the emancipation proclamation is a sham. He tells those who are opposed to it, "I have neither adopted nor proposed any measure which is not consistent with even your view, provided you are for the Union." Two or three paragraphs later this is explained with wonderful candour:—"You say you will not fight to free negroes. Some of them seem to be willing to fight for you; but no matter, fight you, then, exclusively to save the Union. I issued the proclamation on purpose to aid you in saving the Union. Whenever you shall have conquered all resistance to the Union, if I shall urge you to continue fighting, it will be an apt time then for you to declare that you will not fight to free negroes." That is, "Conquer the South with the aid of the negroes, if you can, and repudiate the Emancipation Proclamation afterwards, if you like." Mr. Lincoln encourages his mercenaries by licensing them to plunder and devastate, "Armies, the world over," he says, "destroy enemies' property when they cannot use it." We are under the impression that General Lee did not act upon this principle when in Pennsylvania. He comforts that influential class—the contractors—by giving the quidus to Mr. Seward's promise of a speedy peace. "Let us not," he says, "be over-sanguine of a speedy, final triumph." He winds up with an effusion about "the Father of Waters" going "unvexed to the sea," and with an admonition to his friends not to get drunk. Read as the utterance of the Chief Magistrate of the United States, Mr. Lincoln's letter is incomprehensible; regarded as the electioneering address of a candidate for the Presidency, it is intelligible. Verily Mr. Lincoln is honest. He plays his game so openly that a child can detect his tricks.

A private letter from a well-informed source, dated Richmond, 15th August, says: "You may depend upon it that the Government has finally determined upon the step of soon withdrawing its representative from England, and that, unless a change occurs in the present hostile attitude of the British Ministry towards us, the order of recall will go out before Congress meets in December. This measure arises from no unfriendly feeling towards the people of England, whose sympathy, as evinced on the death of Stonewall Jackson and in the tone of their respectable presses, is fully appreciated here. It was strongly urged upon the Administration as a necessary vindication of self-respect, from the moment it became known, through the published diplomatic correspondence, that Earl Russell, in compliance with the threat of Mr. Adams, had engaged himself to hold no intercourse, even though unofficial, with our Commissioner, and, as appeared from his subsequent refusals of an interview on the most urgent occasions, was determined to adhere to this pledge, and construe it in the most literal manner. This conduct of the British Foreign Secretary, so insulting to our self-respect as a nation, is in striking contrast with that pursued by the French Government. Not only has Mr. Slidell always had free access to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, even when M. Thouvenel was minister, who has never been suspected of undue partiality toward us, but he has had repeated interviews with the Emperor himself. Mr. Dayton protested in Paris just as Mr. Adams did in London. We are more surprised than angry that English pride should permit a minister of State to be deterred by any threats whatever, but least of all by Yankee threats, from extending to our representative those ordinary courtesies which do not commit the Government, and which are not refused even to private bearers of important communications. As we cannot ascribe Earl Russell's course to fear of the Yankees we can only construe it as a studied insult, and if Mr. Mason is once withdrawn, however sincerely anxious we are to have amicable relations with your country, we shall not be the first, at least under your present Administration, to renew diplomatic intercourse. If you have anything to say to us thereafter you will have to send to Richmond."

Charleston is making a gallant and illustrious defence. Fort Sumter, instead of being surrendered, has been partially repaired with the aid of sand-bags and cotton bales, and has received some new guns. An assault made on Fort Wagner on the 26th of August was repulsed. On the 31st of August Fort Moultrie was attacked by the Monitors without effect, and on the 1st inst. the Monitors withdrew. General Gilmore, after having shelled the city without warning, made a virtue of necessity, and promised two days for the removal of the non-combatants; but for ten days the bombardment had not been renewed. The latest intelligence from Charleston is to the 4th of September, at which time the Confederate flag was waving triumphantly over Fort Sumter.

Much has been said about the wonderful artillery employed by the Federals in the siege of Charleston, but it appears that there is also a reverse side to the medal. An unprecedented number of explosions have happened during the bombardment. The monster Parrott gun, a 300-pounder, which threw liquid fire from Morris Island even into the City of Charleston, exploded after the seventh fire, which compelled General Gilmore to abstain from his humane amusement. The Mahaska, iron-clad, exploded one of her formidable guns. Both of the principal guns of the Naval Battery also exploded within a short time of each other. The problem of long-ranged artillery of enormous calibre remains, therefore, still unsolved.

The Federal reports of military movements are just now more than usually unreliable. They are manufactured expressly to restore confidence in Wall-street. We must wait for Southern accounts before we give any credit to the assertion that the Confederates have evacuated Eastern Tennessee. The rumour about a great expedition preparing to act against Mobile is not very likely to be true, but under any circumstances Mobile is ready to offer a stout resistance to the enemy. General Lee still refuses to divulge his plans to Federal newsmongers, and the North is scared by daily reports of another invasion of Pennsylvania or of an attack upon Washington.

The slow progress of the siege of Charleston, the suspension of the draft in the Western States, the few recruits obtained from the draft in New York, and various causes, military, political, and commercial, have produced a panic in Wall Street; stocks fell heavily, and the price of gold advanced 10 per cent. in two days. No one is surprised at this, but rather that the inevitable final collapse in the North is so long delayed. Very likely greenbacks will rally again, for at this juncture the Government, and particularly Mr. Chase, who is a candidate for the Presidency, will endeavour to keep up the Government paper at any sacrifice. It is easy enough to see why, since the commencement of the war, the nominal value of Northern stocks has advanced on an average 300 per cent. Before the war the circulation of the Union, North and South, was $350,000,000. After the separation it should have been $200,000,000; but instead of that it is $600,000,000. The wonder is, not that prices should advance, but that the difference in value of greenbacks and gold should be so comparatively small. For this result great credit is due to Mr. Chase. He has played his game with skill, and when the smash comes it will be found that he has not stopped payment whilst the estate was worth a shilling in the pound. He has kept the public in blissful ignorance of the real condition of affairs, not by publishing false reports that any one could expose, but by omitting to issue the weekly statement that the law demands. Mr. Lincoln says, the people object to be taxed to buy negroes; but the truth is, they object to being taxed for any purpose whatever, and Mr. Chase has not attempted to enforce such an odious measure. He has done nothing to disturb the confidence of the people, whilst, by the agency of banks and contractors, he has been exchanging his new greenbacks for their old coin. Not only so, but during the war the Government is the greatest employer of labour, and an enormous quantity of greenbacks are readily floated as wages for Government labour within as well as out of the army. With excellent foresight, Mr. Chase has been indefatigable in collecting and keeping a store of gold at his command, so that he has been able to stimulate the market when it has shown any signs of weakness. But all this would have failed had it not been for fortuitous circumstances which Mr. Chase could not command. The North has been able to pay for all its purchases in Europe by its exports, and even by this means to slightly replenish its coffers. If the Southern commerce had been equally free—if she, during the last three years, could have supplied the European markets with her produce, her currency might have maintained its normal condition. However, the resources of Mr. Chase are rapidly diminishing. His stock of gold is getting less, and the demand for it is increasing.

The abundant harvest in Europe is a terrible blow to Northern finance, and may even put an end to the delusion that the war is an unmixed good and is continually adding to the wealth of the country.

Commander Maffitt of the Florida has addressed a letter to the Patrie, dated Brest, 12th September, in which he denies that the Florida has been seized on the demand of certain persons who pretend to have claims against her. Commander Maffitt contradicts the report of the Florida sinking a French ship. He also notices the absurd custom of the Northerners calling the Florida a privateer. She is not a privateer according to the definition of public writers, that is, "a vessel armed by private individuals with the authorization of the government;" but she was built and armed by the Confederate Government, carries the national flag and the pennant carried by ships of war, receives her instructions from the Confederate Minister of Marine, and her officers hold their commissions direct from the Confederate Government. All this the Federal organs knew before: but it is their business to write what is acceptable in Washington, and that is, certainly, not the truth. The Moniteur, in announcing the arrival of the Florida at Brest, accidentally used the term privateer, but as will be seen in our Continental Notes, that journal has officially corrected the error.

It is reported from Brest, that Captain Maffitt, C.S.N., has, on his own application, been relieved from the command of the Confederate States steamer Florida. Lieutenant Barney will probably take the command of the celebrated cruiser. Extreme ill-health and the necessity of repose are supposed to be the cause of Captain Maffitt's temporary retirement from active service, which it is hoped will be brief.

The prospect of recruiting the Federal army is anything but encouraging to the Administration. In Ohio and in other Western States the draft has been suspended because Mr. Lincoln has no troops by the aid of which he can enforce it. In New York, where he has an army of 35,000 men, he has obtained, so it is stated, not more than 2,000 conscripts, at the cost of $4,000 each; but in place of soldiers, that he greatly needs, he has had to put up with greenbacks, which are worth no more to Mr. Lincoln than the paper on which they are printed. The drafted Germans have organised themselves into a society for testing the constitutionality of the conscription. The office of the British Consul is daily thronged with men, accompanied by their wives and families, claiming exemption on the ground of being aliens, and imploring the protection of the British Government. Nine out of ten of these men are Irish, and, perhaps, their unhappy plight may impede the labours of the Federal recruiting agents in Ireland. Mr. Lincoln said on a late occasion, that he understood that in the South conscripts were driven into the army as butchers drive bullocks into a slaughter-pen. When he wrote this, he knew it was false, but now, at all events, he thoroughly understands how difficult it is to drive Northern conscripts into that huge slaughter-pen—the Federal army. If he had been in New York lately he might have seen, so we learn from the New York Argus, his unwilling subjects manacled to a chain, as the only means of insuring their arrival at camp. Mercenaries, no doubt, may fight well, but we question whether mercenaries forced into a hated service, and who know that at any moment the money in which their wages are paid may become as worthless as autumn leaves, will make very good soldiers.

The letter written by General Beauregard to General Gilmore in reference to the bombardment of the city of Charleston, and which we elsewhere publish, covers the Federal commander with infamy. That he poured Greek fire upon Charleston, though the destruction of the city could in no way aid his military operations, is the smallest part of his offence. Suddenly, in the dead of night, he turned his guns "against the old men, the women and children, and the hospitals of a sleeping city." At fifteen minutes before eleven o'clock P.M. of the 21st August, a communication was received at General Beauregard's headquarters demanding the evacuation of Morris Island and Fort Sumter, and threatening that if the request was not complied with in four hours, or at least assented to, fire would be opened on the city of Charleston. It hardly adds to the barbarity of this proceeding, that night, when the aged, the women and children, and the sick, were sleeping, was the season fixed upon for four hours' notice of removal. In the history of civilised warfare there is no precedent for such an atrocity. The letter to General Beauregard was not signed! Was this by design, to ensure no answer being returned? Or was the four hours' warning such a mere matter of form that Gilmore did not read over the despatch? The result we know. A quarter of an hour before the four hours had elapsed—at half-past one o'clock—Charleston was shelled. At nine o'clock in the morning—seven and a half hours after the sleeping city had been bombarded—the demand for surrender, duly signed, was received at the Confederate head-quarters. General Beauregard is right. This conduct of General Gilmore will gain him "a bad name in history—even in the history of this war." General Gilmore has replied to General Beauregard. He does not deny the facts, and no ingenuity can palliate his conduct.

Nothing exposes the weakness of a cause so much as inconsistency, and the Federal advocates would do better for their clients if they sometimes met in consultation. Last week a French merchant threatened to detain the Florida and to prevent her leaving Brest until a claim he had against her was satisfied. It was reported that Captain Maffitt had signified his intention of referring the claimant to his Government for compensation of any injury that he may have sustained. Upon this the Federal-French press declared that the reference could not be allowed, because the Confederate Government was not recognised. On the same day "Historicus" wrote a letter to the Times, the sum of which was that we should hold the Confederate Government responsible for a breach of our municipal law, and that if the steam-rans now in the Mersey should find their way into the Southern navy we should make war upon the Confederates; and he repudiated the idea of the non-recognition of the Confederacy being any bar to such a proceeding. So the Confederate States are to enjoy none of the privileges of a recognised Power, but on the other hand, they are to be subject to all the responsibilities of a recognised Power. This is a fair specimen of Federal fair play. With regard to the rumoured detention of the Florida, we need hardly say that there is nothing in it. When the Florida is ready she will leave Brest unopposed by, and with the best wishes of, the French.

The Gibraltar, late the Sumter, is reported as having run the blockade at Wilmington. She entered that port under sail, her machinery having become disabled. Among her cargo was some rifled ordnance of the heaviest calibre ever made, which doubtless ere this has done good service at Charleston.

The Richmond papers announce the arrival in that city, on the 30th July, via the blockade, of the Hon. Pierre Soulé, recently confined at the North as a prisoner of State. He was serenaded on the evening of his arrival.

John Buchanan Floyd, Secretary of War under President Buchanan, and lately brigadier-general in the Confederate army, died on the 26th ult. The deceased gentleman was born in Virginia in 1805, graduated at South Carolina College in 1826, studied the law, was called to the bar in 1828, removed to Arkansas in 1836, returned to his native State, and in 1847 was elected a member of the lower branch of the Virginia Assembly. He was chosen Governor of the State for the term ending January 1st, 1853. As a Presidential Elector, in 1856, he voted for Buchanan, and in March, 1857, was made Secretary of War. After such a career it was but natural that he should be a zealous defender of Southern rights; as soon as his State seceded he took an active part in the war; and his labours were continued until he was disabled by the sickness that ended in his death.

We should be dishonouring the memory of a staunch patriot and an upright man, if we condescended to refute the slanders of the Yankees with regard to the conduct of the late General John B. Floyd; but there is one so often repeated, and which wears such an air of probability, that it is perhaps proper we should answer it. General Floyd is charged with having taken advantage of his position as Secretary of War to furnish the South with arms. Now, if he thought war imminent, he was the only man of his party who did so; for, as we know, the South was totally unprepared for hostilities. The accusation is altogether false. It was customary to distribute arms to the several States at specified intervals, but the matter was not regarded as of much importance, and when Mr. Floyd succeeded to office there was an accumulation of warlike stores to be disposed of. Accordingly, arms were sent to the Southern as well as to the Eastern and Western States, yet when the war broke out the South had not received her full quota. The Secretary of War, then, only fulfilled a duty incident to his office, and it is more than probable that he had no personal concern in the distribution, but that the business was left to his subordinates. Happily, the breath of Northern slander can tarnish no man's reputation.

The Legislature of Alabama assembled on the 19th of August in extra session. The Governor in his message proposed a reform in the organisation of the militia, so that the requisition of the President for 7,000 additional troops for the Confederate army might be met without difficulty, and that the defence of the State might be placed on a better footing. The Governor declares that if every man in the State were embodied in the militia, Alabama would present an impassable barrier to incursions. After paying an eloquent tribute to the memory of Senator Yancey, the Governor says that Alabama will cheerfully make any sacrifice to drive back the invader, and he exhorts the people not to give way to false security, but to nerve themselves for a long and undying resistance. The Senate passed a series of resolutions on the war. Without impeaching the loyalty or patriotism of Generals Holmes and Pemberton, they recommended that there should be a change in the commands of those Generals. They also resolved:

That the people of Alabama and the State hereby pledge the entire resources of the State, to the last dollar and the last man, to a successful prosecution of the war now being waged by the North for the subjugation of the people of the Confederate States, and that we will never yield the contest until the achievement of the acknowledgment of our Independence as a separate people.

The Governor was instructed to transmit a copy of these resolutions to President Davis, and to the members of the Confederate Congress.

The death of General Pemberton is reported, but no authentic details have transpired. The Cincinnati papers have a canard that he was shot by Texan soldiers.

We publish to-day an official account of the Southern victory at White Sulphur Springs. The Northern papers have sought to conceal this affair, but the official despatch of General S. Jones is decisive evidence.

Senator Jim Lane is endeavouring to get up an expedition in Kansas to retaliate for the Lawrence massacre. He exhorts the people not to be contented until they have desolated the border counties of Missouri by fire and sword and laid them utterly waste. The New York Herald, commenting on the tragedy at Lawrence, says:—"The people of Kansas have brought these horrors on themselves, and they are already engaged in reprisals as barbarous as those of which they complain." The Herald adds that there is enough to do at the North without interfering in the quarrel—a frank confession of the inability of the Federal Government to preserve order in the territory over which it claims jurisdiction.

We do not know whether Russia will consider it a compliment that the Federals should regard her as their prototype, but such is the case. On the 31st August the New York Herald published a leader entitled "The Manifest Destiny of America and Russia." It says:—"The one a republic, the other a despotism, it is not a little singular that these two nations should now be firmly united by sympathy against nearly all the rest of the world, and that they should be no less firmly united in their manifest destiny in the future." Russia is to conquer Europe; and the United States, America, England, France, and Spain are to be punished for fomenting and encouraging "rebellion" in the Southern States and in Poland. "It is clear these European governments have committed the irreparable offence of supporting both rebellions by material aid and diplomatic endorsement, and that this offence will be punished by the great nations thus outraged and insulted." The Emperor of the French is warned that he might as well attempt to destroy the Ten Commandments as to abrogate the Monroe doctrine. "Behind the Ten Commandments is Divinity, and behind the Monroe doctrine are the American people." The blasphemous tone of the Republican press in New York shows that the influence of New England thoroughly permeates the dominant faction in the North.

"The whole of the Fifth Corps were out under arms, with the exception of the conscripts, and they were spectators, without arms. Major-General Sykes was present, in command of the corps, and the scene was most grand and imposing. The ground was so admirably selected that not one of the many thousand men present failed to obtain a full view. The day was very beautiful * * * * The arrangements were perfect, and reflect credit upon Major Heming, commanding the 118th Pennsylvania Volunteers, and Captain Crocker, as well as the provost-marshal." In such terms does the correspondent of the New York Herald describe the shooting of five deserters. The narrative from which we quote only fills thirty-two lines of type, and we dare assert that a Spanish journal never recorded the deaths of bulls in the ring so coldly and unfeelingly. The five men were—G. Kuhn, Hanoverian; John Felani, Italian; C. Walter, Prussian; George Reinesse, Italian; and Emile Lai, Italian. Thus all of them were foreigners; but we cite this as a curious piece of evidence of the composition of the Federal army, and not to condemn the execution. With an army of mercenaries desertion is a worse crime than with an army of citizens, because it is more common and more likely to become contagious. In the same journal there is an account of the execution of another batch of deserters, and this time we have the private histories of the unfortunate creatures. The newspaper correspondent received permission to visit the condemned while they "were eating their last meal," and made "copy" until the preparations were complete for what the reporter from whom we have quoted calls "a feast of death."

We publish elsewhere from the Richmond papers a summary of the proceedings at various meetings that have been held by the North Carolina troops, to protest against the articles that have appeared in the Raleigh Standard. Under ordinary circumstances the conduct of such a journal would not have called for the slightest notice.

The New York World has invited Canada to join the United States. The Canadians are told that by so doing they will be saved the horrors of war, obtain the enormous boon of free trade with the Federal States, and the vast benefit of Yankee energy and capital to develop their resources. Seeing that the Union is now waging a war for which it obtains recruits by force of arms, that it is burdened with a heavy debt, and that there is no Yankee capital to spare, we cannot help thinking that the New York World means this invitation for a biting jest. Such arguments will be useless unless enforced by shot, shell, and bayonet.

It is reported that the Hon. R. M. T. Hunter will be sent to Mexico as the representative of the Confederate States. Mr. Hunter was for many years the colleague of Mr. Mason as Senator from Virginia in the United States Congress. On the formation of the Confederate Government he entered President Davis's Cabinet as Secretary of State, and more recently he served as President of the Confederate Senate.

As will be seen by a brief obituary notice which we copy elsewhere from the Richmond papers, Mr. Mason, the Confederate Commissioner in London, has sustained a sad loss in the death of his eldest daughter at Richmond on the 17th ult.

ENGLAND.

THE Earl Russell has been starring it at Dundee. Sir David Baxter had presented the good people of the old Scotch borough with a glorious park, and had moreover adorned and beautified the site at an expense of £50,000. The Secretary for Foreign Affairs was invited to open in state the People's Park at Dundee, and had graciously condescended to accept the immense honour sought to be bestowed upon him. Hereupon the Town Council and Guildry determined to take advantage of the noble Earl's visit to offer him the freedom of their respective corporations. So the Earl came to Dundee in a carriage and four, was loudly cheered in the streets, and received an ovation meet for a friend of the people. Provost Parker read the adulatory address of the Town Council, and Dean of Guild Kennedy did the like office for the Guildry. The Earl thought the occasion too great for the risk of an oration, and discreetly read a reply. That reply possessed two features. It spoke of a past and of a present. It told the Council and the Guildry how in days gone by Lord John Russell had repealed the Corporation and Test Acts, how he had reformed the House of Commons and the municipal corporations, and how he had repealed the corn laws. It also explained that, as Secretary for Foreign Affairs, it had been his object to preserve peace with honour and to perform the strictest duties of neutrality. Surely it will be necessary for Earl Russell or one of his admirers to re-write the history of the last thirty-five years. Hitherto we had looked upon the actions of Lord John Russell in matters of Reform as on a par with those of a puppet guided by men who knew well enough how to pull the strings. We had heard of some great Whigs of that day, and even of a certain Duke of Bedford, the brother, the adviser, and the manager of Lord John Russell. All such are extinguished at a blow, and Earl Russell stands forth as the undoubted author of all that, in the eyes of a Whig, constitutes England's glory. But what of the events between these mighty acts of Reform and the still mightier deeds of the Foreign Secretary? There is a gap, a fearful chasm, in the history of the noble Lord, and that biographical void his lips will never fill up. He may arrogate to himself the great works of others, but he is wise enough to preserve silence on what he may undoubtedly claim as his own. Surely some account of his cabals, intrigues, desertions, and defeats of Administrations, and, above all, of his splendid Premiership, would have called forth even greater enthusiasm from the populace of Dundee. Of the present, however, he could not forbear to speak. So he said, truly enough, that he had preserved "peace," and, audaciously enough, that he had preserved it with "honour." Yet he did wisely to give to Lord Palmerston all the credit of the Government policy, for of necessity he will transfer to his Premier the responsibility likewise. But how can he talk of "honour" when Europe looks to France and not to England for the solution of every difficulty, and when Earl Russell himself is little better than a laughing-stock to the Gortschakoffs of Europe and to Mr. Seward of Washington? Doubtless such a "peace" may be for a time preserved, and such a neutrality as he boasts may blind the nation for a while, but England may be eventually "kicked into" a war and she may also one day awake to an appreciation of the injustice of what Earl Russell calls his neutrality.

It is announced that Mr. Spooner, the champion of Church Rates and the opponent of the Maynooth Grant, will retire from the representation of North Warwickshire upon the next dissolution of Parliament. The death of the Marquis of Townsend has caused a vacancy in the representation of Tamworth, through the succession of Viscount Raynham, the protector from cruelty of the whole race of mute animals, to the Marquisate. Mr. R. Peel, the Hon. Henry Cowper, and Mr. Daniel, Q.C., will become candidates for the seat.

Her Majesty the Queen of England, who arrived at Windsor Castle towards the end of last week from Coburg, left on Monday, the 14th September, for the Highlands of Scotland, for a visit to Balmoral.

In spite of the changeable character of the weather during the past three weeks, considerable progress has been made in the work of securing the crops of corn throughout the north of England. The wheat crops in the southern, eastern, and western counties had been gathered before the change in the weather, and in those districts the anxiety of the agriculturist has been concentrated on the barley. Should a fortnight or three weeks of dry weather ensue, the crops of Scotland and Ireland will be secured in splendid condition. The question of yield is to a great extent set at rest, and the opinion that the present year will prove as fruitful as the year 1857, is rapidly gaining ground. Even the Fen districts, which have of late years disappointed their cultivators to a disastrous degree, have produced wheat, not merely in abundance, but of a quality calculated to rival the high lands. It may, on the whole, be taken that the yield in the present year will exceed that of an average year by nearly two millions of quarters. It is only in the matter of price that the agriculturist finds reason to complain, and assuredly 45s. per quarter for the finest new wheat is not highly remunerative. In the face of the yield and the prices there is no great encouragement for the foreign importer, and there is every reason to suppose that the imports for the present year will fall short of those for last year by nearly four millions of quarters. These calculations must be carefully considered in any estimate of the state of the money market and commerce of New York.

Having a short time since given a brief statistical account of the exports of the United Kingdom for the year 1862, we are now enabled to furnish similar information with regard to the imports for that year. The first class and the most important comprises articles of food, the value of which as imported during the year 1862 reached the enormous sum of £93,027,988. The value of the corn and flour alone reached the sum of £37,755,060. Indeed, it is well worthy of remark that the import of grain, meal, and flour never reached 12,000,000 quarters until the bad harvest of 1860, in which year it was 14,494,976 quarters, but in 1861 it rose to more than sixteen millions, and in 1862 to more than eighteen millions of quarters. Moreover, in the last-named year we imported cattle, sheep, and swine, and salted meat and lard, to the amount of more than £6,000,000, butter nearly £5,000,000, cheese £1,500,000, rice £2,400,000, eggs £600,000, and poultry £85,000. The second class, namely, that of raw materials of manufacture, for 1862, gives a return of £96,513,430. The quantity of cotton imported fell from 12,419,026 cwt. in 1860 to 4,678,333 cwt. in 1862. The third class of imports, being articles used in manufacture or agriculture, and not being raw materials of manufacture, such as wood, sawn or split, planed or dressed, oils, guano, copper and iron bars, reached a value of more than sixteen millions sterling. The fourth class of manufactured articles, such as silks, woollens, gloves, clocks, and glass, reached the value of seventeen millions sterling. The total amount of the imports for the year was £225,716,974.

A contest, of interest to the lovers of horses, has taken place in Egypt. Ali Pasha, who has the finest stud of Arabs in that country, being convinced that no English race-horse could compete with one of his "cracks," accepted a challenge from Halim Pasha, who offered to run a horse called Companion against the Arab. The distance was four miles; the course was the first station on the Suez desert to Cairo. The horse won by more than half a mile, and almost without any visible effort. The question of the superiority of the English race-horse to the Arab has long ago been set at rest in the minds of men of the racing world; and no doubt is entertained that, in speed, endurance, bone, and action, the English horse is immeasurably the superior. In the present illustration of this opinion, it may be remarked that Companion is but a second or third-rate horse, his performances on the English turf being very moderate. He is nine years old, and, inasmuch as he raced at the age of two years, it will readily be understood that his speed is by no means equal to that of a six-year-old horse. Companion won the Great Cleveland Handicap at Shrewsbury in 1857, but was beaten the same year at Bath by such animals as Shirah and Melissa, and finished very badly for the Manchester Cup, which was won by Underhand. Companion is by Womersley, his dam being by Hampton out of Shire-oaks. He was bred by Lord Ribblesdale, and was for some time the property of the famous Mr. Padwick.

It is probable that the fame of Sir Tatton Sykes, who, for half a century, represented to the English mind the most complete picture of an English sportsman, has reached the ears of our most distant readers. We have now to record probably the final act of the drama of sport in which he was, throughout life, so assiduously engaged. His wonderful stud of horses, unrivalled in number and quality, has been disposed of by auction by Messrs. Tattersall. Three days were occupied in the business of the sale, and the number of visitors, the number of quadrupeds sold, and the gross aggregate of the prices were absolutely marvellous. A short analysis of the three days' sale will sufficiently demonstrate the truth of this statement. The brood mares, 111 in number, averaged over 81 guineas each, the highest price given being 450 guineas. The stallions averaged 400 guineas each; thirty-one three-year-old fillies averaged 62 guineas each, the highest price being 150 guineas; twenty-seven two-year-old fillies averaged 55 guineas each, the highest price being 135 guineas; fifty-one yearlings averaged 60 guineas each, the highest price being 165 guineas; five geldings, foaled in 1861, averaged 105 guineas each; ten other geldings averaged 72 guineas each; and fifteen hunters averaged 94 guineas each, the highest price being 330 guineas. The grand total of the receipts for the three days reached the sum of 24,171 guineas. The blood of Fandango, Daniel O'Rourke, Rifleman, and Colsterdale chiefly appears as the line of the young stock of Sir Tatton Sykes. The Continental breeding establishments were well represented, M. de Cavaliero appearing for the Hungarian Club, General Bruderman for the Austrian Government, and Colonel de Butz for the Emperor of Austria; Baron Kotze was the agent for the Prussian Government. A large number was purchased by M. Shachel, of Berlin; and still more, bought by Mr. Churnside, go to Australia. Count Lehndorff, Count Renaud, and Colonel de Butz also bought largely. Doubtless, the great name of Sir Tatton Sykes and the large numbers brought to the hammer did much to entice purchasers to give liberal prices. At the same time, with all deference to the great judgment of the late Baronet, we shall have the opinion at least of racing men on our side in thinking that Sir Tatton Sykes was by no means happy in the choice of his stud-horses.

The Manchester and Liverpool Agricultural Society held their annual meeting last week at Birkenhead Park. The show of animals was grand, and the company enormous. The exhibition of machinery, poultry, and flowers excited great admiration. About 300 persons sat down to the dinner, under the presidency of the Honourable Wilbraham Egerton, M.P., and Mr. John Laird, M.P., was present. The chairman, in proposing the navy, spoke of the modern system of iron-plates and steam rams, and was at once interrupted by loud shouts of "What about steam-rams?" "What about the Alabama?" (Cheers and laughter.) And somewhat later in the evening the health of Mr. Laird, as member for Birkenhead, was proposed by the chairman, rapturously received by the company, and a round of cheers given for the Alabama.

Conflicting statements as to the steam rams constructed by Messrs. Laird, and now lying in the Mersey, have gone the round of the London press. Last week the Morning Post declared that they were detained by order of Her Majesty's Government; a few days afterwards this statement was contradicted by several newspapers, and it was explained that the Government officers had certainly inspected the vessels, but that nothing more had been done. Next the Morning Post asserted that the bona fide character of the original order for the vessels would be established to the satisfaction of the Government, and that there was no satisfactory evidence forthcoming to show that they were built or destined for the Confederate States of America. It seems, indeed, that one of them was to be allowed to proceed on a trial trip, Mr. Laird pledging himself that she should return to his yard. However, on Monday last the Times came out with an authoritative statement that "the two iron-clad vessels now building at Liverpool will not be allowed to leave that port pending further inquiries, and until fresh instructions are given." Can it be that Earl Russell has succumbed to the untiring appeals and representations of the Anti-Slavery Association, and the other champions of one-sided neutrality?

The naval combat in Warsaw Sound, between the Confederate iron-clad Atlanta and the Federal Weehawken, has elicited some very valuable remarks from Mr. Cowper Coles, the author and advocate of the turret system. It will be remembered that in the month of July last the Atlanta attacked the Weehawken and the Nahant in Warsaw Sound; that the Atlanta fired three of her heavy rifled guns before the Weehawken opened upon her with her 15-inch gun, throwing a solid shot of 440 lbs.; that this first shot virtually decided the action, the missile tearing asunder the iron-plating and solid timber like stubble, and prostrating 40 of the crew. After the fifth gun, the Atlanta hauled down her flag and became a prisoner, having fought for only fifteen minutes. She was armed with six guns—one 7-inch, pivot gun fore and aft, and two 6-inch guns on each broadside. They were the Brooks guns, which did such execution on the Federal iron-clads in the first attack on Charleston, were rifled, and threw the long steel-pointed missile of English manufacture. Her armour was 12 inches thick, and presented all the solidity which could be given it by 4 inches of wrought iron, 4 inches of life oak, and 4 inches of Georgia pine. Perhaps no better idea of the comparative characters of the two vessels can be obtained than from Cowper Coles' concise explanation. The Weehawken, he says, is a Monitor with one turret; the Atlanta a vessel cut down, carrying her guns in a square box on the centre of the vessel, of a similar type to several vessels now being constructed for the British navy. Mr. Coles gives a second instance of the successful application of the revolving shield principle in the case of the Rolf Krake, an iron-clad gun-boat designed and built by Messrs. Napier, of Glasgow, for the Danish Government. That vessel was constructed in the short space of ten months, is wholly plated with 4½-inch iron, and has two turrets, each armed with two 60-pounders (Danish), and has answered the expectations formed of her as a sea-going vessel. Her turrets work well, are easily turned round the circle in little more than three minutes, and cause no inconvenience to the men working them. Mr. Coles next alludes to the Roanoke, which was a frigate of the Niagara and Minnesota class, and which has been cut down, plated, and fitted with three towers on Ericsson's plan, each tower being armed with two 15-inch guns. Indeed, it appears that the Federal Government have ordered the construction of nine vessels of a class of which the Canowincus, already launched, is a representative. This vessel is expected to make 11 knots an hour, has a thickness of 11 inches of wrought iron above the water, and will display but eighteen inches of her upper hull. She has but one turret, armed with two 15-inch Dahlgren guns (440-pounders). After minute descriptions of the above-named vessels, Mr. Coles reverts to the action between the Atlanta and Weehawken, and concludes that beyond all doubt a vessel can carry such heavy guns as the 440-pounders of the Weehawken, and must be irresistible against ships of the present broadside construction. He states that the Federals are manufacturing these 440-pounders at the rate of one per day, while we have not a ship afloat that can carry such a gun, and, indeed, have no gun in the navy of greater calibre than the smooth-bore 68-pounder, and the breech-loading rifled 110-pounders. Moreover, other foreign Governments besides the Federal and the Danish have stolen a march on us, and we have reason to doubt whether our beautiful and costly iron-clads can engage on equal terms a small turret-ship. Mr. Coles' remarks cannot be too attentively considered. It seems to us, looking merely at results, that the main question rest on two points—first, the efficiency of these monster guns; second, the possibility of building a ship which can carry such guns, and yet be a thoroughly safe and rapid cruiser. If these points be decided in the affirmative, the English Government will be wise to avail themselves speedily of the services of Mr. Cowper Coles.

THE CONTINENT.

Russia has replied to the Notes of the three Powers. The absence of Earl Russell from London has prevented the delivery of Prince Gortschakoff's despatch, and none of the replies have been published, although the substance of them has transpired. Prince Gortschakoff is exceedingly courteous in his tone, expresses sentiments favourable to good relations between France and Russia, cordially acknowledges the pacific sentiments of Austria, but leaves affairs just as they were. He says that Russia is ready to accept the responsibility of the position. He considers the six points settled by the former declaration of Russia. He does not reply categorically to the proposition of the armistice or the conference, and declines to enter into a long discussion which could lead to no result, and might eventuate in a misunderstanding between the Cabinets. Accompanying the despatch is a memorandum which, according to the Nord, treats the question exclusively in an international point of view. It gives an historical sketch from the Congress of Vienna. It thoroughly examines in how much Russia is bound by those treaties, and dwells at considerable length upon the Congress itself. It endeavours to prove that the autonomy already decreed for the Kingdom of Poland, and the application of which has not been suspended but obstructed by the revolution, satisfies the obligations contracted by Russia towards Europe.

In connection with the Russian reply an important article was published in the Journal de St. Petersburg on the 9th inst. It repudiates the reported radical reforms with regard to Poland. It says:—"The position taken by the St. Petersburg Cabinet relative to the affairs of Poland, in accordance with the unanimous sentiment of Russia, is perfectly clear, and there is not anything to indicate an inclination to deviate from it. The sentiments of the Sovereign towards his Polish subjects have not undergone any change. But, in his solicitude for their welfare, his Majesty has declared that he considered it his first duty to proceed to the re-establishment of material order. The experience of the last two years has sufficiently proved that nothing solid can be erected upon ground upset by anarchical passions. As regards the diplomatic question, the Imperial Government remains resolved to fulfil its international obligations, but also to maintain the rights of Russia within the limits of treaties."

The Duc de Montebello, French Ambassador at St. Petersburg, has received permission, at his own request to pass two months in France; but he will not leave until after the Emperor's return from Finland.

The Poles have sustained a heavy loss by the death of Lelewel, one of their most successful leaders, who was killed in a battle which took place on the 3rd inst. In several skirmishes the Poles have been successful, and in one which took place at Rokiciny, on the Warsaw and Cracow line of railway, on the 4th instant, fifty Russians were killed. Count Ostrowski, son of the Minister of the Interior, has been arrested, and has been condemned to transportation to Siberia. The gates of Warsaw have been closed for ten days to any person entering or going out. 200 inhabitants have been transported to Siberia. The last words of the Grand Duke Constantine upon quitting Warsaw were:—"The Czar wishes well to Poland, and regrets the measures adopted by General Mouravieff, but recognises their necessity."

The French papers report that Mr. Slidell, the Commissioner for the Confederate States, has had a very cordial reception from the Empress at Biarritz, and it is expected that he will have an important interview with the Emperor himself immediately on the latter's arrival.

M. de Persigny has been created a Duke, in testimony of regard for the services he has rendered to the State, and for his personal devotion to the Emperor.

When the Moniteur announced the arrival of the Florida at Brest, it designated it a privateer. Yesterday it corrected its error, and said:—"The steamer Florida is not a privateer, as was believed. She forms part of the military marine of the Confederate States, and her officers are furnished with regular commissions. The Florida has all the character of an ordinary vessel of war."

The Emperor Napoleon is at Biarritz. The Queen of Spain has sent the Prefect of Alava and a General to compliment his Majesty on his recent successes in Mexico.

The Annamite Ambassadors have arrived in Paris, and were officially received by the authorities.

The Pope has dismissed the Italian Consul at Rome, in reprisal for the withdrawal of the exequatur from the Papal Consul at Naples, who was charged with aiding disloyal movements. In consequence of this reprisal of the Government of Rome, the Italian Government has ordered the Pontifical Consuls to quit all the towns in the kingdom.

The national fêtes in Naples have passed off without disturbance. The Government wisely allowed the crowd to shout Viva Garibaldi without let or hindrance.

The brigands of the province of Basilicata have given themselves up, having been granted a safe-conduct. Amongst the chiefs who have surrendered is the noted Tima.

M. Rogawski, a member of the Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath, has been arrested for acting as a member of a secret Polish committee.

The Grand Duke Constantine has arrived at Vienna. He was met by the Emperor at the railway station, and had a distinguished reception from the public authorities. It is semi-officially stated that this is to be considered merely as a courtesy extended to the Grand Duke personally, having no connexion with the foreign policy of the Government.

The reply of Prussia to the collective letter of the German Princes will not be a collective answer, but will be sent separately to each Sovereign who signed the letter. It is asserted that the reply will merely contain the reasons of Prussia for not accepting the Austrian project of reform, and will not bring forward any counter-proposals.

In reference to the coming elections a letter from Count Schwerin has been published, pointing out that, however unanimous all parties in Prussia may be in rejecting the Austrian project of reform, this question must be taken into consideration. Only the Constitution and internal organisation of the country can influence the mutual position of parties towards each other and towards the Government at the approaching elections.

The King of the Greeks has signed an agreement relating to the succession to the Danish throne. By this document King George renounces his right of succession in favour of his younger brother and his heirs. King George himself and his own line then become last in order of succession to the Danish crown.

His Majesty will leave Copenhagen to-day en route for St. Petersburg. He will subsequently visit his maternal grandfather, the Landgraf Wilhelm of Hesse Cassel, at Rumpenheim, and will then go to Brussels, London, and Paris. He will probably embark at Toulon for Greece upon the 21st or 22nd of October.

JAPAN.

Intelligence received from Japan via New York to the 24th of July states that the Japanese had fired into the British ship Medusa and the American ship Pemberton between Ningardi and Kanagawa, killing several men. The American steamer Wyoming and the British steamer Lauendale proceeded to the scene of the outrage, destroyed the town forts, and spiked the guns. The British lost three men and the American five. 2,000 Japanese were reported to have deserted towards British vessels, but it was thought that they would not pass within range of the British guns.

PROTEST OF THE NORTH CAROLINA TROOPS

ARTICLES IN THE "RALEIGH STANDARD."

The North Carolina regiments have held meetings to protest against the articles that have appeared in the Raleigh Standard. Several columns of the Richmond papers are filled with the resolutions of condemnation which were, in all instances, carried unanimously. We append a few of them.

The officers and privates of the 6th North Carolina Regiment passed the following resolutions:—

Whereas the officers and soldiers of the 6th North Carolina troops have witnessed with regret and indignation the course pursued by the Raleigh Standard, and a few exempts and non-combatants in North Carolina, in relation to the struggle that we are daily making for our freedom and independence; and whereas this course is giving aid and comfort to the enemy, calculated to mislead the credulous at home, and tarnish the fair name of our good State in the eyes of the good, wise, and patriotic; therefore,

Resolved, that we the officers and privates of the 6th North Carolina troops, greatly desire peace; but we scorn any peace that is not based upon a separation of the Confederacy from political relations with the late United States, and a recognition of our independence; and, until this is secured, we are willing to continue the struggle as long as one of us is left to march against our barbarous enemy.

Resolved, that the course pursued by the Raleigh Standard and its correspondents is, whether actuated by policy, humanity, or patriotism, deserving of the deepest censure by the soldiers in the field, and by the mothers, the fathers, and sisters of North Carolina's slaughtered sons, calculated as it is to induce the North to believe that North Carolina is anxious to return to the Union.

The 34th North Carolina Regiment met under the presidency of Colonel W. Somers, and adopted the following resolutions:—

Whereas we have heard with painful regret and mortification that there exists in North Carolina a small party whose political sentiments are at variance with every principle of Southern rights, derogatory alike to the patriotism of our noble old State and the gallantry of her brave and chivalrous sons, and whereas we have also witnessed with equal regret and indignation the course pursued by the Raleigh Standard relative to our existing national difficulties—a course that has fostered a spirit of desertion in the army, and produced many croakers at home; therefore,

Resolved, that the political sentiments enunciated by the Standard, and all who sympathise with its policy whether dictated by a wounded spirit of disappointed ambition, an opposition to the present Administration, or a sympathy with those who seek our destruction, meet our most decided condemnation, as being traitorous in principle, ruinous in their practical effects, and reflecting alike upon the character of North Carolina and the heroic conduct of her gallant sons in the field.

Resolved, that he who in the hour of our country's greatest need sows the seed of discord and strife among those who should be united as a band of brethren against a common, powerful, and insidious foe, is an enemy to us and to our constitutional rights, whatever may be his protestation to the contrary.

Resolved, that we, sons of North Carolina and soldiers of the Confederate army, in the name of our revolutionary prestige, in the name of all that freemen hold dear, and by the memory of the thousands of our brave and beloved comrades whose blood has hallowed the battle-fields of this revolution, here enter our solemn protest against any policy other than that which claims and demands the recognition of our independence and the firm establishment of our separate nationality.

The 21st Regiment passed the following amongst other patriotic resolutions:—

That we, as citizens and soldiers of North Carolina, have read with regret and indignation the issues of the Raleigh Standard in which reconstruction and submission were counselled, and gladly use this public means of expressing our unqualified opposition to such views, and pronouncing the same fit only to be uttered by a traitor or a Tory.

We denounce with scorn all persons, if there be any such in North Carolina, who wish to see a reconstruction of the old Union. Such sentiments can only be entertained by cowards and slaves, who have skulked the dangers and hardships of the war, and we distinctly announce that we are unwilling to submit to any such degrading terms.

There has also been held a Convention of the North Carolina officers of General Lee's army, of which the following telegraphic summaries was published in the Richmond papers:—

Oregon Court-House, August 12th.—A Convention of officers from all the North Carolina regiments was held here to-day. The Convention passed strong resolutions, censuring the course of the Raleigh Standard.

Oregon Court-House, August 13th.—Colonel Garrett, the Chairman of the Committee reported a series of resolutions, pledging the loyalty of North Carolina, and of her sons in the army of the Confederacy, denouncing the Raleigh Standard and its supporters, and expressing their confidence in Governor Vance, and the conviction that he will sustain the good cause. The Convention was enthusiastic, and the resolutions were unanimously adopted.

SOUTHERN WAR TELEGRAMS.

BOMBARDMENT OF FORT SUMTER.

CHARLESTON, August.—The firing of the Parrott guns upon Fort Sumter to-day was exceedingly heavy, but not so accurate as heretofore. About noon the flag was shot away, but soon replaced. No casualties are reported. Colonel Alfred Rhett is commanding, and the garrison is stout-hearted.

The battery of Parrott guns is distant from Sumter two miles and five-eighths. The missiles used are 200-pound bolts eight inches in diameter, two feet long, with flat head of chilled iron. Shells of the same dimensions are also used.

Up to Wednesday night, the third day of the attack, 1,972 of these missiles struck Sumter; and, including to-day, 2,500 have struck. The damage is, of course, considerable; and, for the last two days, all the guns of the south face of the fort have been disabled.

Yesterday, about 4 o'clock, the iron-clads formed in line of battle to renew the attack on Sumter, but the fort opened at long range from the east face, and they retired without attacking. To-day the ironclads and two monitors kept up a fire on Wagner at intervals, and the Yankee sappers have begun to make approaches on that battery from the nearest work. A shot from Wagner disabled one of the Parrott guns, and the James Island batteries, under Lieut.-Colonel Yates, exploded two of the enemy's ammunition chests.

[SECOND DESPATCH.]

CHARLESTON, August 21.—The fire of the enemy's land batteries has been heavier than ever to-day. A new battery of Parrott guns opened on Sumter this morning, and the fires have been concentrated upon the east battery and its guns. The south wall of the fort is now a pile of rubbish. On the north the wall is also crumbling into a heap of ruins.

The flag has been shot away twice to-day, and six times during the attack. The flag-staff is shot off, and the flag flies from the ruins of the south wall.

Just before sunset Sumter fired several shots at the ironclads which was engaging Battery Wagner.

A monitor this morning fired at Sumter while making a reconnaissance, but was not replied to. There is no report of casualties.

The sappers are making a regular approach on Battery Wagner.

The Yankee officer killed on Monday was a captain of one of the Monitors.

[THIRD DESPATCH.]

CHARLESTON, August 22.—From 5 o'clock A.M. until 7 o'clock P.M. yesterday, the enemy's fire on Fort Sumter was very heavy.—Nine hundred and twenty-three shots were fired, and seven hundred and four struck the fort either outside or inside. The eastern face of the fort was badly battered. Some guns on the east end and the north-east face were disabled. The flag was shot down four times. Five privates and two negroes were wounded in Sumter.

The enemy's fire on Wagner caused five casualties, including Captain Robert Pringle killed. Our sharpshooters are annoying the Yankees considerably. It is supposed that the enemy burst one of their Parrott guns yesterday afternoon.

At 11 o'clock last night, a communication from the enemy, unsigned, was sent to General Beauregard, demanding the surrender of Sumter and the Morris Island batteries, with a notification that the city would be shelled in four hours if the demand was not complied with. Beauregard was on a reconnaissance, and General Jordan returned it for the signature of the writer. About 2 o'clock this morning the enemy began throwing shells into the city from a battery on the marsh between Morris and James Islands, and distant five miles from the city. Twelve eight-inch Parrott shells fell in the city, but caused no casualties. The transaction is regarded as an outrage on civilised warfare. The shelling had a good effect in hastening the exodus of non-combatants.

At daylight this morning the enemy opened fire vigorously on Sumter. The ironclads have since opened. Sumter is replying. Wagner is firing briskly on the enemy's advanced works, four hundred and fifty yards from our battery.

[FOURTH DESPATCH.]

CHARLESTON, August 22.—The fire of the enemy's land batteries has been kept up on Sumter, and more guns disabled. There was only one casualty.

There was also a heavy fire on Battery Wagner from the fleet and land; also on Battery Gregg. The casualties at Wagner were one officer and four privates.

General Gilmore's demand for the surrender of Fort Sumter and Morris Island, with the threat to shell Charleston in four hours from the delivery of the paper at Wagner, was signed and returned at seven o'clock this morning.

General Beauregard, in his reply, charges inhumanity and violation of the laws of war, and affirms that if the offence be repeated he will employ stringent measures of retaliation.

Up to this time, the threat to shell the city has not been executed.

[THE LATEST.]

CHARLESTON, August 27.—The enemy's attack on our rifle pits on Wednesday night was about seven o'clock, in overwhelming force.

On Thursday, the firing on both sides was slow, with no unusual incidents.

CHARLESTON, August 28.—The bombardment of Sumter and Wagner proceeds sluggishly.

The enemy is working hard in the trenches in front of Wagner.

No further attempt has been made to shell the city.

FROM MISSISSIPPI.

ATLANTA, August 21.—A special to the Appeal, dated Canton 20th, says that Grenada has fallen into the hands of the Federal force from the Yazoo, and another from North Junction. The rolling stock of the New Orleans railroad was at Grenada. The enemy met no opposition. Major Chalmers, in the absence of Colonel Slemmons, fell behind the Yallahusha and fought the Yankee raiders three hours, when, our waggon being safe, and the Yankees from the south threatening our rear, we evacuated Grenada. The Yankees burnt the rolling stock and captured Major Chalmers and a party of men. One quarter of the town was burned. Fearing that Jackson was coming, the Yankees retreated precipitately. Both the large and fine railroad bridges over the Yallahusha were burned. General Hatch is reported dead.

[The foregoing is all the translation the agent can make of the despatch, which is almost unintelligible.]

THE YANKEES SHELLING CHATTANOOGA.

CHATTANOOGA, August 22.—Noon.—A force of some strength appeared on the opposite side of the river yesterday, about 10 o'clock, and commenced shelling the place, without warning. Our batteries replied promptly, and the artillery duel continued until 5 P.M. A little girl, daughter of F. G. Roche, of Nashville, was mortally wounded; also, one lady. The ferryman at the river was badly wounded. The enemy afterwards retired. All quiet to-day.

FIGHT IN TENNESSEE.

ATLANTA, August 28.—A letter to the Confederacy, from Forrest's command, says that Colonel Dibrell had another fight with seven regiments of Yankee cavalry on the 17th instant, at Sparta, Tennessee, and repulsed them with a loss of 40 to 50 killed and wounded. Dibrell's force was 600 strong. His loss is 2 killed, 7 wounded, and 12 missing.

It is reported by passengers that the Yankees were shelling Chattanooga yesterday.

ELECTION OF A SENATOR IN ALABAMA.

MONTGOMERY, August 22.—Hon. Robert Jemison, junior was elected to-day to fill the unexpired term of Mr. Yancey in the Confederate Senate. Mr. Curry was not a candidate, and the position was yielded to Jemison as an act of party magnanimity. It is believed by many of Curry's friends that he could have been elected.

Jemison was originally a nullifier, and though subsequently a co-operationist, has been a firm and uncompromising supporter of the war. Jemison was a member of the Secession Convention, and has been for many years a leading member of the State Legislature for Tuscaloosa county.—Telegram to the Richmond press.

AMONG the recent arrivals from the Confederate States is Mrs. Greenhow, well known from her long captivity, under circumstances of unusually cruel severity, at Washington, in the earlier period of the war. She was marked out for this "exemplary punishment" by her intimate acquaintance with the principal actors in the Revolution, among whom she herself is not the least distinguished. It is reported that one of the objects of her visit to England is to publish a volume of Memoirs. It is to be hoped that this report is true, for Mrs. Greenhow has it in her power to produce the most interesting book yet written on this war, and to throw full light upon that period of the Revolution which is the least known or understood either in Europe or America.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S MANIFESTO.

The following is Mr. Lincoln's letter to the Union Committee in Illinois:—

Executive Mansion, Washington,

Hon. James C. Conkling,

MY DEAR SIR,—Your letter, inviting me to attend a mass meeting of unconditional Union men, to be held at the capital of Illinois on the 3rd day of September, has been received. It would be very agreeable for me thus to meet my old friends at my own home; but I cannot just now be absent from here so long as a visit there would require. The meeting is to be of all those who maintain unconditional devotion to the Union; and I am sure that my old political friends will thank me for tendering, as I do, the nation's gratitude to those other noble men whom no partisan malice or partisan hope can make false to the nation's life. There are those who are dissatisfied with me. To such I would say, you desire peace, and you blame me that we do not have it. But how can we attain it? There are but three conceivable ways. First, to suppress the rebellion by force of arms. This I am trying to do. Are you for it? If you are, so far are we agreed. If you are not for it, a second way is to give up the Union. I am against this. Are you for it? If you are, you should say so plainly. If you are not for force, nor yet for dissolution, there only remains some imaginable compromise. I do not believe that any compromise embracing the maintenance of the Union is now possible. All that I learn leads to a directly opposite belief. The strength of the rebellion is its military, its army. That army dominates all the country, and all the people within its range. Any offer of terms made by any man or men within that range, in opposition to that army, is simply nothing for the present; because such man or men have no power whatever to enforce their side of a compromise, if one were made with them. To illustrate: suppose refugees from the South and peace men of the North get together in convention, and frame and proclaim a compromise embracing a restoration of the Union: in what way can that compromise be used to keep Lee's army out of Pennsylvania? Meade's army can keep Lee's army out of Pennsylvania, and, I think, can ultimately drive it out of existence. But no paper compromise to which the controllers of Lee's army not agreed can at all affect that army. In an effort at such compromise we would waste time, which the enemy would improve to our disadvantage; and that would be all. A compromise, to be effective, must be made either with those who control the rebel army, or with the people, first liberated from the domination of that army by the success of our own army. Now, allow me to assure you that no word or intimation from that rebel army, or from any of the men controlling it in relation to any peace compromise, has ever come to my knowledge or belief. All charges and insinuations to the contrary are deceptive and groundless; and I promise you that if any such proposition shall hereafter come, it shall not be rejected and kept a secret from you. I freely acknowledge myself to be the servant of the people according to the bond of service, the United States Constitution, and that as such I am responsible to them. But to be plain, You are dissatisfied with me about the negro. Quite likely there is a difference of opinion between you and myself upon that subject. I certainly wish that all men could be free, while you, I suppose, do not. Yet, I have neither adopted nor proposed any measure which is not consistent with even your view, provided that you are for the Union. I suggested compensated emancipation, to which you replied you wished not to be taxed to buy negroes. But I had not asked you to be taxed to buy negroes, except in such way as to save you from greater taxation, to save the Union exclusively by other means. You dislike the Emancipation proclamation, and perhaps would have it retracted. You say it is unconstitutional. I think differently. I think the constitution invests its commander-in-chief with the law of war in time of war. The most that can be said, if so much, is, that slaves are property. Is there, has there ever been, any question that by the law of war, property both of enemies and friends, may be taken when needed? And is it not needed whenever it helps us and hurts the enemy? Armies, the world over, destroy enemies' property when they cannot use it; and even destroy their own to keep it from the enemy. Civilized belligerents do all in their power to help themselves or hurt the enemy, except a few things regarded as barbarous or cruel. Among the exceptions are the massacre of vanquished foes and non-combatants, male and female. But the proclamation, as law, either is valid or is not valid. If it is not valid it needs no retraction. If it is valid it cannot be retracted, any more than the dead can be brought to life. Some of you profess to think its retraction would operate favourably for the Union. Why better after the retraction than before the issue? There was more than a year and a half of trial to suppress the rebellion before the proclamation was issued, the last one hundred days of which passed under an explicit notice that it was coming unless averted by those in revolt returning to their allegiance. The war has certainly progressed as favourably for us since the issue of the proclamation as before. I know fully as one can know the opinions of others, that some of the commanders of our armies in the field who have given us our most important victories believe the emancipation policy and the use of coloured troops constitute the heaviest blows yet dealt to the rebellion, and that at least one of those important successes could not have been achieved when it was but for the aid of black soldiers. Among the commanders with these views are some who have never had any affinity with what is called "Abolitionism" or with "Republican party politics," but who hold them purely as military opinions. I submit their opinions as being entitled to some weight against the objections often urged that emancipation and arming the blacks are unwise as military measures, and were not adopted as such in good faith. You say that you will not fight to free negroes. Some of them seem willing to fight for you—but no matter. Fight you, then, exclusively to save the Union. I issued the proclamation on purpose to aid you in saving the Union. Whenever you shall have conquered all resistance to the Union, if I shall urge you to continue fighting it will be an apt time then for you to declare you will not fight to free negroes. I thought that, in your struggle for the Union, to whatever extent the negroes should cease helping the enemy, to that extent it weakened the enemy in his resistance to you. Do you think differently? I thought that whatever negroes can be got to do as soldiers leaves just so much less for white soldiers to do in saving the Union. Does it appear otherwise to you? But negroes, like other people, act upon motives. Why should they do anything for us if we will do nothing for them? If they stake their lives for us they must be prompted by the strongest motive, even the promise of freedom. And the promise, being made, must be kept. The signs look better. The Father of Waters again goes unvexed to the sea. Thanks to the great North-West for it. Nor yet wholly to them. Three hundred miles up they met New England, Empire, Keystone, and Jersey, hewing their way right and left. The sunny South, too, in more colours than one, also lent a helping hand. On the spot their part of the history was jotted down in black and white. The job was a great national one, and let none be slighted who bore an honourable part in it. And while those who have cleared the great river may well be proud, even that is not all. It is hard to say that anything has been more bravely and well done than at Antietam, Murfreesboro, Gettysburg, and on many fields of less note. Nor must Uncle Sam's web-feet be forgotten. At all the watery margins they have been present, not only on the deep sea, the broad bay, and the rapid river, but also up the narrow muddy bayou, and wherever the ground was a little damp, they have been and made their tracks. Thanks to all. For the great republic—for the principle it lives by and keeps alive—for man's vast future. Thanks to all. Peace does not appear so distant as it did. I hope it will come soon, and come to stay; and so come as to be worth the keeping in all future time. It will then have been proved that among freemen there can be no successful appeal from the ballot to the bullet, and that they who take such appeal are sure to lose their case and pay the cost. And then there will be some black men who can remember that, with silent tongue and clenched teeth, and steady eye, and well poised bayonet, they have helped mankind on to this great consummation; while I fear there will be some white ones unable to forget that with malignant heart and deceitful speech they have striven to hinder it. Still, let us not be over-sanguine of a speedy final triumph. Let us be quite sober. Let us diligently apply the means, never doubting that a just God, in his own good time, will give us the rightful result.

Yours, very truly,

A. LINCOLN.

GENERAL BEAUREGARD'S LETTER ON THE BOMBARDMENT OF CHARLESTON.

The following communication was addressed to General Gilmore.

Head-quarters, Department of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida.

Charleston, South Carolina, Aug. 22.

SIR.—Last night at 15 minutes before 11 o'clock, during my absence on a reconnaissance of my fortifications, a communication was received at these head-quarters, dated "Head-quarters, Department of the South, Morris Island, South Carolina, August 21, 1863," demanding the immediate evacuation of Morris Island and Fort Sumter by the Confederate forces, on the alleged ground that "the present condition of Fort Sumter and the rapid and progressive destruction which it is undergoing from my batteries, seem to render its complete destruction within a few hours a matter of certainty," and that if this letter was not complied with, or no reply thereto was received within four hours after it was delivered into the hands of my subordinate commander at Fort Wagner for transmission, a fire would be opened on the city of Charleston from batteries already established within easy and effective range of the heart of the city. This communication to my address was without signature, and was, of course, returned. About half-past one o'clock one of your batteries did actually open fire, and threw a number of heavy shells into the city, the inhabitants of which, of course, were asleep and unarmed. About nine o'clock this morning the communication alluded to was returned to these head-quarters, bearing your recognised official signature, and it can now be noticed as your deliberate official act.

Among nations not barbarous the usages of war prescribe that, when a city is about to be attacked, timely notice shall be given by the attacking commander, in order that the non-combatants shall have an opportunity of withdrawing beyond its limits. Generally the time allowed is from one to three days; that is, time for the withdrawal in good faith of at least the women and children. You, sir, gave only four hours, knowing that your notice, under existing circumstances, could not reach me in less than two hours, and that not less than the same time would be required for an answer to be conveyed from this city to Battery Wagner.

With this knowledge you threaten to open fire on this city, not to oblige its surrender, but to force me to evacuate those works, which you, assisted by a great naval force, have been attacking in vain for more than forty days. Batteries Wagner and Gregg and Fort Sumter are nearly due north from your batteries on Morris Island, and in distance therefrom ranging from half a mile to two and a quarter miles.

This city, on the other hand, is to the north-west, and quite five miles distant from the battery which opened against it this morning. It would appear, sir, that, despairing of reducing these works, you now resort to the novel measure of turning your guns against the old men, the women, and children, and the hospitals of a sleeping city, an act of execrable barbarity: from your own confessed point of sight, inasmuch as you allege that the complete demolition of Fort Sumter within a few hours by your guns seems a matter of certainty.

Your omission to attach your signature to such a grave paper must show the recklessness of the course upon which you have adventured. While the facts that you knowingly fixed a limit for receiving the answer to your demand which made it almost beyond the possibility of receiving any reply within that time, and that you actually did open fire, and throw a number of the most destructive missiles ever used in war into the midst of a city taken unawares and filled with sleeping women and children, will give you a bad eminence in history—even in the history of this war. I am only surprised, sir, at the limits you have set to your demands.

If, in order to obtain the abandonment of Morris Island and Fort Sumter, you feel authorised to fire on this city, why did you not include the works on Sullivan's and James's Island, nay, even the city of Charleston, in the same demand?

Since you have felt warranted in inaugurating this method of reducing batteries in your immediate front, which were otherwise found to be impregnable, and a mode of warfare which I confidently declare to be atrocious and unworthy of any soldier:

I now solemnly warn you that if you fire again on this city from your Morris Island batteries, without giving a somewhat more reasonable time to remove the non-combatants, I shall feel impelled to employ such stringent means of retaliation as may be available during the continuance of this attack.

Finally, I reply, that neither the works on Morris Island nor Fort Sumter will be evacuated on the demand you have been pleased to make.

Already, however, I am taking measures to remove all non-combatants, who are now fully aware, and alive to what they may expect at your hands.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. T. BEAUREGARD, General-Commanding.

THE VICTORY AT WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS.

The following official despatch has been published.—

White Sulphur Springs, August 27, via Dublin, August 28.

To General S. Cooper—

We met the enemy, yesterday morning, about a mile and a half from this place, on the road leading to the Warm Springs. We fought from 9 A.M. to 7 P.M. Every attack made by the enemy was repulsed. At night each side occupied the same position they had in the morning. This morning the enemy made two other attacks, which were handsomely repulsed, when he abandoned his position and retreated towards Warm Springs, pursued by cavalry and artillery. The troops engaged were the first brigade of this army, Colonel George S. Patton commanding. The enemy were about 3,000 strong, with six pieces of artillery, under Brigadier-General Averill. Our loss is 200 killed and wounded. The enemy's loss is not known. We have taken about 150 prisoners and a piece of artillery.

(Signed) SAMUEL JONES, Major-General.
(Official) JOHN WITHERS, Lieut.-Col. and A. and I. G.

"CHARLESTON NOT YET OURS."—The hunter who sold the lion's skin before the beast was slain was himself eaten by the lion. The war journals have of late been jubilating over the anticipated fall of Charleston, yet it would be but quoting from the lessons of experience to say that all this premature rejoicing augurs disappointment and perhaps disaster. The stubborn facts give but a feeble echo to the daily parade of exultation over an event yet unwritten in the book of fate. It would be far more reasonable for our cotemporaries to realise the significant circumstance that as yet not one of the fortifications in Charleston harbour has been compelled to lower the Confederate flag. Even Sumter, a mass of ruins, but yet unrelinquished by the enemy, flaunts the defiant banner in the faces of the beleaguering host. The real defences of the city are yet as strong as ever; the armies that protect it have exhibited no signs of discouragement or defeat, and yet the surrender of the place is regarded as a certainty, and the wary engineer, who has thus far skillfully and resolutely held his own against the combined attacks of our land and naval forces, is ridiculed as if he were a boasting simpleton already in the toils. It is true that fifteen shells, charged with Greek fire, have been thrown into Charleston, but with that display the pyrotechnic exhibition closes for the present. The 300-pounder Parrott rifled gun that accomplished this triumph in artillery practice paid the penalty of its ambition, and burst in the effort. This shaking hands with destiny before it is announced, this welcoming of shadows whose coming substance we know not of, has been a favourite pastime with the North from the commencement of hostilities. It applies not only to separate operations, but to the final result of the struggle. The Confederacy has been crushed, in anticipation, a hundred times, but Antaeus-like, it has always arisen with renewed vigour from each successive fall. At the present hour, this mania for disposing of events by mere volition rages with unusual violence. Hope is as buoyant as a bubble, and, perhaps, like the bubble, it is most buoyant when most frail. * * * Meanwhile, that foe is taking its long breath, and concentrating its energies for a struggle more desperate than before. The North is congratulating itself upon expected triumph—the South preparing itself against possible defeat. While the bird-catcher builds his cage, the bird in the bush eyes him with prudent caution. There will be many a bloody day to fight before those political castles which the war journals are erecting will have more than the thin air for their foundation. The South, although Charleston share the fate of Vicksburg, is yet unconquered. The only hope of peace will be when the Democracy shall tear down that banner, and display the Constitution and State Rights as emblems of our cause.—New York News.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE RECOGNITION OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

The above Association, which has its head-quarters in Manchester and is supported by a very numerous and highly influential committee, has issued the following circular:—

After long and anxiously waiting for a cessation of the sad war between our kinsmen in America, we conclude that the time has come for combined action in favour of some plan for pacifying the hostility of the combatants.

The frightful and vain slaughter of myriads of human beings in battles wholly indecisive, the symptoms of a retaliatory policy in the further prosecution of the war, the evidence that it is assuming a vengeful and exterminating character, and the vouched-for fact that every man and woman of the South will die rather than submit to Mr. Lincoln's domination, convince us that the reconstruction of the Union by the sword is impossible.

Separation is already accomplished. The South has had ample time to show a capacity for self-existence and self-government, and the Federal power cannot, by any means, restore the old Union.

Why then should we longer hesitate to recommend (in no unfriendly spirit to the Northern people) Peace, on the basis of Southern Independence?

One of our leading statesmen declared some time ago that Mr. Davis had made a Nation. We desire to act up to the spirit of his saying, by urging a friendly joint mediation of the European Powers, preceded by fair and equal recognition of the South as a contracting Power.

This course we think preferable to the "cold neutrality" which looks unmoved on an attempt to annihilate a gallant people, and on the foreboding murmurs of Federal anarchy.

Therefore, in the interest of distracted America, North and South alike,—in the interest of our own guiltless, suffering people,—in the interest of the unhappy negro and of common humanity—we ask you to join us in this earnest attempt to check the social, moral, and political ruin which protracted civil war must bring upon both parts of the once prosperous Republic.

THERE has been a riot in Danville, Illinois, brought about by a street fight between a Republican and a Democrat. On the first day of the riot, the 24th August, according to the official report of Provost-Marshal Fithian, three persons were killed and many wounded. The newspaper accounts say that the loss of life was greater. The riot continued on the 25th. Captain Park, with a company of soldiers, was expected on that day to quell the disturbance. The military operations of the Federalists in the North must be a heavy drain on the resources of the Government.

THE STEAM RAMS IN THE MERSEY.—It is probable that the bona fide character of the original order for these vessels will be established to the satisfaction of the Government. There is no satisfactory evidence forthcoming to show that they were built or destined for the Confederate States of America. One of them is to be allowed to proceed, we believe this day, on her trial trip, Mr. Laird pledging himself that she shall return to his yard. As the case stands at present, there is every likelihood that the Government will abandon its intention of interfering with them, as there is nothing to show that they violate any provision of the Foreign Enlistment Act or any other law.—The Morning Post, September 14.

On Monday one of these formidable vessels, concerning which so much has recently been said, was towed out of Messrs. Laird's dock at Birkenhead, and taken into the Morpeth Dock basin, where it is understood the remainder of her fittings will be completed. It is expected that her trial trip will take place in a few days. It is but right, however, in the meantime to state that her builders do not affect any mystery or secrecy with regard to what is going on in their works. On the contrary, they have invited Admiral Dares and the officers of the Channel fleet to visit their building-yard, and inspect all that is going on there—a privilege which has been availed of to a considerable extent. A similar privilege as to inspection has also been conferred on the officers of the fleet by the Mersey Steel and Iron Works. The public will certainly have learnt with some satisfaction that the two iron-clad steamers now approaching completion in the Mersey will not be allowed to leave that river until something more is known of their ownership and destination.—The Times, September 16.

YANKEE LOVE FOR THE NEGRO.—An officer who participated in the attack on the Yankee forces on James Island, 16th instant, and captured a number of negroes of the 54th Massachusetts, says: One of the prisoners told me he was in Beaufort the day the negroes captured in the Combahee raid were brought in. The men were ordered into the ranks, and every one who refused was bucked and gagged in the most inhuman manner until they consented to enlist in the ranks. Some of these poor wretches were kept trussed up for three or four days, and bucked and gagged at intervals, until they gave in their adhesion and took a place in the ranks. The officer says he conversed with several of the prisoners, and they all gave substantially the same account. Many of the negroes had been induced with the promise of freedom to run away from the plantation. These negroes, we observe by the New South, published at Port Royal, were deserting, and returning to their masters.—Charleston Courier.

A REMARKABLE PROPHECY.—Private prophecies are of little account till verified by their fulfilment. We heard of one lately, nevertheless, that we offer to the reflections of our readers. Its author was a man in very humble life, a pious, good Catholic, who troubled not himself with politics, and hardly ever, if ever, looked at a newspaper. He died in December, 1860—the month after Abraham Lincoln was saddled on some of the States as President. He was near his death, and friends, visiting, were discussing the political troubles, and speculating whether South Carolina would really secede. The good man had said nothing while they were talking. After they ceased, he said:—"You have been talking of what is to come. There will be a war, a bloody war, between the North and South. It will last three years, and the South will then become a separate government, but not without the help of a foreign nation. When the North and South are separated, then there will be awful troubles at the North. The troubles will last for twenty years, and a hundred years from now the country will feel the effects of them. There will be a terrible persecution of the Catholics here after the country is divided." This good man died soon after. His pastor, residing not far from this city, is a man of great learning and talent. He says that, for a long time, he had known the deceased as a man of very holy and meditative life. He was not a man of intellectual cultivation but a man of prayer. Whether it were the vagaries of a dying man, or the visions of coming troubles given to a true and humble servant of God, we know not. We can only say that a subtle intellect, with a large reading of history and a keen appreciation of all the elements that are at work, if forced to utter the gloomiest and most probable of its previsions, would have said about what this pious, humble, and unlettered servant of God uttered on his death-bed.—New York Freeman's Journal.

BURNSIDE'S VICTIMS.—The numerous and multiplied atrocities of the enemy have forced the Confederate authorities to consider the subject of retaliation. One of the worst of these proceedings of the enemy has been the execution of Captains Corbin and McGraw. On hearing of their fate, the Confederate Government inquired of the Federal authorities the reason of their action. The response was that they were executed as "spies." The record of their trial was then demanded. In answer to this request, the Federal Government furnished a copy of the charge and specification against them, and of the sentence of the Court which condemned them, but none of the evidence. From the papers thus furnished, it appeared that it was not true that they had been accused or tried as spies—that the sole charge against these unfortunate gentlemen was, that they had recruited soldiers for the Confederacy in Kentucky—a State embraced in our political system and represented regularly in the Confederate Congress by Senators and Representatives. Nor was the evidence of this charge supplied. Not a scintilla of proof appeared that these men were "spies." The sole pretext for their execution is the technical one that these officers were recruiting in one of the States claimed by the enemy as one of the United States—a principle which applies equally to Virginia or South Carolina, and which would, if carried out, sentence to the gallows every officer and private we have in our service.—Richmond Sentinel.

SQUIRREL LEATHER.—"Squirrel skins tacked down to a board, the hair next to the board, with hickory ashes sprinkled over them for a few days, to facilitate the removal of the hair, and then placed in a strong decoction of red-oak bark, will, at the end of four days, make excellent leather, far stronger and tougher than calf-skin. Four skins will make a pair of ladies' shoes. We hear that some of the ladies in the interior counties are wearing these shoes, and find them equal in coolness and superior in durability to any others. The longer the skins are left in the decoction of bark the better the leather. By this plan anybody may have a tan-yard and make their own leather, as the skins are easily and cheaply procured, and any vessel holding a gallon will serve as a vat. Our readers will do well to try it."—The Richmond Whig.

GREEK FIRE ON CHARLESTON.

Bomba, when he lost his crown,
Wished to shell Palermo town,
Gilmore would have knocked it down,
He rains Greek Fire on Charleston.

Fear restrained King Bomba's wrath
From an act of savage scath,
Nothing stands in Gilmore's path;
He hurls Greek Fire on Charleston.

General Gilmore found it hard
To come over Beauregard,
So he played a Yankee card,
And poured Greek Fire on Charleston.

Asked to let the townsfolk go,
Gilmore bravely answered "No!"
And proceeded, no ways slow,
To pitch Greek Fire on Charleston.

Gallant Gilmore, warrior stern,
Babes and women thus to burn!
What a deathless name he'll earn That threw Greek Fire on Charleston!

Nana Sahib rest unsung,
Let none speak of Badahung,
Since bold Gilmore bombs has flung,
And cast Greek Fire on Charleston.

Do but think what shriek and yell
Rose where dropped his Parrott shell.
When he dies you'll say, Ah, well!
He threw Greek Fire on Charleston!—Punch.

THE BLOCKADE.—Files of the Nassau Guardian, for latter part of July and August, give the following blockade news: July 29th. By the steamer Margaret and Jessie (Captain Lockwood), which arrived yesterday from Charleston, we received papers from that city to the 25th instant. We extract from the Courier of that date full particulars of the late Federal attack on Battery Wagner. The steamer Raccoon (Captain Harris) from Nassau, got ashore on the night of the 19th instant, on Drunken Dick Shoal, off Charleston bar. She was discovered and fired at by the Federals, and, to prevent her from falling into their hands, was burnt by her commander. The steamer Fannie (Captain T. Moore) arrived at Charleston from Nassau on the 23rd instant, and the steamer Alice, (Captain Egan) on the day previous. The brig Isabella Thompson, from Nassau, bound to Halifax with a cargo of turpentine, &c., has been seized by a Federal vessel and taken to New York. A statement of the capture has been laid before Admiral Milne by her owner, Mr. McDaniel, of Halifax. By an arrival from Cape Hayti this morning, we learn the capture of the steamer Lizzie by the Federal gunboat St. Jago de Cuba, which took place on the 14th instant, eighty miles eastward of Abaco. The captain and part of the crew of the Lizzie were detained on board, and sent to New York with a prize crew, the remainder being conveyed in the gunboat to Cape Hayti, whence they returned to Nassau in a chartered sloop this morning. They report that five Federal gunboats were lying at Cape Hayti when they left, viz.: the Rhode Island, Mercedita, Alabama, St. Jago de Cuba, and the Juanetta. It is reported that the trade of St. Thomas has been much injured in consequence of the Federals using that port as a rendezvous. A vessel answering the description of the Alabama has been observed between Inagua and Turks Islands for nearly a week. August 12.—The steamer Hebe (Capt. Stewart) and steamer Pet (Capt. Davis) arrived from Wilmington on Monday with news from the Confederate States to the 4th instant. Three steamers have been captured by Federal vessels recently—the Emma, the Merrimac, and the Kate. The Merrimac was taken at sea on the 25th ult., after a long chase, while on her way from Wilmington to this port. She had a very valuable cargo, principally owned in Wilmington. August 22.—The steamer Cronstadt was captured by the Federal gunboat Rhode Island on Sunday last, about forty-two miles from Abaco, while on her way from Wilmington to this port. The pilot, second mate, and two engineers belonging to the Cronstadt left in a boat, and two shots were fired at them by the Rhode Island, without effect. The captain, chief mate, and purser were detained on board the vessel, and sent to New York in charge of a prize crew. The passengers and crew were taken on board the gunboat and transferred at Harbour Island to the schooner Elizabeth, in which they arrived here on Thursday last.—The United States gunboat Juanita touched at Havannah on the 12th instant. After coaling, she went in pursuit of the Confederate steamer Nita, which left that city for Mobile the same day.—The steamer Alice (Captain Egan) arrived from Charleston on Thursday morning with dates to the 17th ult. We are informed that Fort Sumter was again being bombarded by the Federal fleet when she left.

LIVERPOOL, Sept. 14.—The Alice Vivian, from Mobile, with cotton, was captured about 200 miles south-east of that port, by the Federal steamer de Soto, and taken into Key West on the 19th of August. The Crescent, from Havannah for Mobile, with an assorted cargo, was sent into Key West on the 27th of August, a prize to the same vessel.

EFFECT OF THE LAST AMERICAN NEWS IN LIVERPOOL.—The American news received by the last steamer has caused a degree of excitement in Liverpool which has not been equalled since the effect produced by some of the great victories gained by the renowned "Stonewall" Jackson. In private circles especially this feeling prevails, and there is manifested an intense desire to hear something further of the operations before Charleston and the movements of General Lee. The cotton market, which may be accepted as one of the best indices of the opinions existing amongst the brokers and merchants, has been wild with excitement during the day, and the prices have advanced  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to  $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per lb. for Surat, and 1d. per lb. for American and Egyptian, while the business has been on the most extensive scale, the sales reaching 30,000 bales. Many of the brokers allege that this advance and large business are entirely owing to the firm conviction entertained amongst buyers that the war will be protracted for a very long time. On the other hand, however, it is stated that the excitement is caused by some very large orders received from Manchester, and not influenced by the last news. The effect of the American news on the loan has been that in the morning it opened at 25 dis., and closed at 26 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. dis., the quotation at the close being thus  $\frac{1}{2}$  lower. 20,000 of the bales were on speculation.—Morning Post, Sept. 15.

TIT-BITS OF THE ANGLO-YANKEE PRESS.

A contemporary having by an unpardonable mistake ascribed certain humane expressions of disgust at the barbarous conduct of General Gilmore in throwing Greek fire into an inhabited city, which appeared in the New York Daily News, to that paper's London namesake, the latter, as might be expected, comes out with an indignant disclaimer:—

The passages quoted by the Examiner have not appeared in these columns. We have never understood or said that Mr. Lincoln's Government "claimed to be waging war in the name of philanthropy," nor believed that it entertained a "purpose of extermination." We deplore this war as one of the wickedest that ever was waged, and condemn its authors, but do not understand the claim of the Confederate Government to defend places which, like Charleston and Chattanooga, its generals have made the centres of defensive systems of works, by placing their women and children there, and thereupon appealing to the humanity of the besiegers.

No, no. Let the London print not be suspected of even as much squeamish punctilio as may find its way into a New York paper, on such a trifling matter as pouring unquenchable liquid fire on women and children by an heroic army several miles off. Hear its "Own Correspondent," in the same impression, speaking the true sentiments of his employers in the largest of leaded editorial type:—

And two years of war with slaveholding fanatics has not so far etheralized them (the Northern people) that revenge has ceased to be sweet. They roll the fall of Sumter in bloody ruins under their tongue as a delicious morsel. They hear of Gilmore's raining "Greek fire" into Charleston streets with a satisfaction that bursts from every pore. They hope it will not be surrendered until there is not one stone left upon another, and not a man left of the insolent crew who hatched the treason which has brought all this suffering on the nation. For that city and its inhabitants there are at the North no bowels of compassion.—Daily News, September 15.

Such things appear in a journal calling itself English. And here is another charmingly characteristic bit, in the same genre, on the difference between Northern and Southern civilization, for the enlightenment of English readers:—

Remember, too, that the persons who have figured most prominently in this crusade, and who have been foremost in wreaking abuse and vituperation upon all the North reveres, are men who have about the same relation to the upper classes of Boston and other Northern cities that Highland chiefs of the seventeenth century bore to Edinburgh or London society of the same date; and that their claim to respectability is founded solely on the possession of slaves; that the portion of the population of South Carolina who are familiar either with the usages of good society or even of civilised life, does not exceed twenty families, who owe their culture and refinement to their ability to visit the North every year; that the rest are semi-barbarians, the like of whom can perhaps now only be found in the remoter parts of Russia or of Asiatic Georgia, and who would be almost as great a curiosity to a New England farmer as a Zulu Caffre or a Maori to an English parish clerk.

THE DWELLINGS OF THE POOR.—The columns of newspapers are filled with descriptions of farm labourers' cottages. Take a few samples at random:—"A cottage with one small bedroom, tenanted by a man, his wife (far advanced in pregnancy), and four children; a married daughter, her husband, and child; the only ventilation by a casement one foot wide and two deep." Such facts speak volumes of the rate of wages and general standard of living. "A rickety tenement, wholly unfit for human habitation; no privy accommodation; surrounded by filthy dykes full of stagnant drainage; occupant, a bedridden old woman, who has not got up since Christmas; the bed is on the floor, and there are large holes in the walls, which threaten to fall down." These are the first two instances that we come to in a list now lying before us and occupying nearly two columns of close type. The third instance is that of a cottage where "a young man, 17 years old, was sleeping in the same bed on the floor with his sister aged 18." Then comes No. 4, "A man, his wife, and seven children, of both sexes, whose ages range from 20 years to 3 years; they occupy a place too small to be called a room, and situated between the ceiling and the roof, the only light and ventilation being that through a square of glass 11 inches by 9." We have taken without selection the first four items of a list of more than fifty, many of them much worse, and all attested by a sanitary inspector at Norwich. It is pretty much the same all over the country. What is the remedy for this? We fear that the only real remedy must be sought in that increase of knowledge and prudence among the unskilled labourers themselves, and the general improvement of society resulting from it, which will bring about a higher rate of wages. Whatever we may wish, and whatever we may say, and however benevolent and philanthropic it would be, we cannot seriously, as a matter of fact, or a calculation of probabilities, think it at all likely that capitalists will invest their money in building little palaces for tenants earning 10s. a week. This may be a hard, disagreeable fact, but it is a fact notwithstanding; and the only way to cure the evil is by telling the truth about it.—Morning Post.

A YANKEE GENERAL'S LETTER-BAG.—During Lee's advance and Milroy's precipitate retreat from Winchester, the latter's letter-bag was captured, and the contents have since been published by the Southern papers for the edification of their readers. Among reports of spies, male and female, and the fulsome flattery of Yankee sycophants, is the following truly astonishing epistle, which shows with what freedom a bribe may be offered to a Federal major-general, and what a flimsy pretext is thought sufficient to "save appearances":—

"Wheeling, West Virginia, June 8th, 1863.

"General,—I am an applicant for adjutant-general of the State of West Virginia. If not too much too trouble to you, can I ask that you will forward me a letter of recommendation to Governor Boreman, at your earliest convenience, for that position?"

"I enclose you receipt of the Adams' Express Company for $100. I expressed the money money at Martinsburg, having a considerable amount with me, and not wishing to run any risk in night travelling with the same.

"I am, very truly yours, &c., HENRY C. FLESHER."

AN ENGLISH ACTOR ON THE FRENCH STAGE.—We lately had two French actors performing on the English stage, and our most accomplished comedian, Mr. Charles Matthe, has returned the compliment with interest. He is in Paris playing in a French piece written by himself, called L'Anglais Timide. Mr. Matthevins evinced no timidity in the way he came before a Paris audience. The Opinion says:—"It must be owned that he went to work badly enough, and enlisted, as if on purpose, all the chances against him. He arrives in Paris without being announced, unknown to everybody." The first night was very nearly a failure, in consequence of these defective arrangements and the length of the drama. However, the genius of the actor triumphed over all difficulties, and in a few nights he became so popular that the Variétés, at which theatre he is performing, is crowded to excess though, previous to his debut, it was doing a bad business. Mr. Matthevins surprised London by his very choice Italian in his late entertainment; and French critics testify to his excellent pronunciation of French. His accent is so slight that only a Parisian can distinguish it, and that only if he is on the alert to detect it. The French press compares him to Henri Monnier, Perlet, Arnal, Lafont, Levasor, and other celebrities of the French stage; and there is no doubt that for versatility of conception he is without a rival. His first season in Paris is not likely to be his last, and it is understood that he has already entered into an engagement for a future appearance upon terms that even a prima donna at the London Italian Opera would consider acceptable and fair. The Moniteur observes "at the moment when one of the most esteemed English actors is acting in our own language, Taillade is preparing to perform Macbeth in English at the Vaudeville Theatre."

GROUNDLESS SUSPICIONS.—We notice that fears are expressed by some lest the people of Mississippi and Alabama should not endure with integrity the trial to which they seem about to be subjected. Our own observation inclines us to give but little weight to such apprehensions. We have seen the tide of invasion sweep over communities once noted for their "Union" sentiment; over counties and neighbourhoods lying upon the very borders of the enemy's land, and accustomed to associate, and intermingle, and trade with the enemy's people. It had been predicted that such localities would swarm with traitors. Particular individuals were specified, of whom it was freely prophesied that they would certainly affiliate with the enemy. We have rejoiced in the lowest depths of the soul to find these ungenerous prophecies, these illiberal expressions of fear and distrust falsified and dishonoured by the result; falsified both as to the communities and the individuals thus suspected. The presence of trial has developed a noble and heroic virtue in our people. Look at the City of Alexandria, the first town which felt the Federal hoof: has any city in the land a prouder record? Has any surpassed her in unflinching fidelity and generous devotion to the Confederate cause? Nay, if any have equalled her, let them be proud, for they have done grandly! And look at Fairfax, and Loudoun, and Prince William, and Stafford, and Fauquier; and look at many of the Valley counties of Virginia, harried, and plundered, and desolated as they have been—could a people have acted better? The presence of the enemy seemed but to steady and confirm their loyalty; while the outrages inflicted upon them, so far from intimidating them into submission, but served to refine their patriotism and inflame their zeal. And why should it not be so in Mississippi, and Alabama, and everywhere else? Our rich men have cheerfully let property go, rather than compromise their loyalty,—why shall not the cotton planters do the same? Many a family here, accustomed to all the comforts of life, is now in indigence and exile, rather than prove false to their country. Are the people elsewhere less heroic and more selfish than we? We will not for a moment credit the suspicions to which we have alluded, until they shall prove to be realities. This, we are perfectly convinced, will never happen. There may be some marks of shrinking as the storm gathers, and is about to break. The timid, in that hour of anxious waiting, may feel some nervous promptings to evade its fury. But let the storm once burst, and the danger is over. Let the enemy once occupy, and the most doubting are at once confirmed, the most feeble become strong. The danger of disloyalty is over then save as to the few outcasts who are ready to sell themselves as spies and informers. We have never known a Yankee invasion to fail of the effect we have above stated. Why should it work differently in Mississippi and Alabama? We do not believe it will. The people there will look beyond their temporary misfortunes, and the local reverses which have led to them—and will take a more general view of operations. They will not think all is lost, because their neighbourhood or city has been overtaken by calamity.—Richmond Sentinel.

OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are respectfully requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through Messrs. Horze, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

At Liverpool, to WM. KNOX, Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings,
At Paris, to Messrs. PREIFFER and MÜLLER, 52, Rue du Château d'Eau, Paris.

The Siege of Charleston.

NOTWITHSTANDING Greek fire, Parrott guns, and iron-clads, this stronghold of the South has not yet fallen. There was a great shout of triumph in New York over the news that Fort Sumter was a heap of ruins, and the Federal organs in this country jumped at once to the conclusion, that, the fire of Fort Sumter subdued, it was all over with Charleston. The progress of the siege has dispelled this illusion, and proved that the key to the defences of the Palmetto City is not in the casemated fortress which, two years ago, seemed to bid defiance to the navies of the world. In fact, the destruction of Fort Sumter would almost seem to be the "be all and the end all" of Federal triumph. With this, the main obstacle to the approach of Charleston Harbour removed, it was thought that the iron-clads would easily effect a passage. The surprise was great in the Federal camp when day after day was allowed to pass by with the vaunted iron squadron floating idly within the bar, or steaming up just within range of the land batteries to deliver a casual shell and make all haste out of reach of the Confederate guns. By-and-by it was rumoured that the Federal batteries erected on Morris Island were also played out. The great gun which had poured its flaring missiles into the defenceless city had burst; the Parrott guns which had shattered the walls of Fort Sumter were used up; most of the ammunition was gone; the six days' bombardment had exhausted the Federal stores; and General Gilmore found himself at the end of the artillery duel brought to a dead-lock, with the enemy repairing damages with impunity under his eyes and within reach of his guns. On the 21st August, Sumter was in ruins; on the 23rd it had ceased to exist as a fortification according to General Gilmore's report, though the Confederate flag waved over it; and a day later the Federal batteries declined to waste their ammunition upon it. Another day, and we learn that heavy firing was going on between the Federal batteries and Forts Sumter and Wagner; and, finally, it is officially reported that on the 1st inst. a general engagement took place between the iron-clads and Forts Wagner, Sumter, and Moultrie, and that the attack on Fort Sumter was to be renewed.

Either the Federal accounts of the damage done to Fort Sumter have been scandalous exaggerations, or Beauregard, emboldened by the enemy's inactivity, has re-fortified the ruins. At any rate, it is certain that after a bombardment of a fortnight the garrison of Fort Sumter not only held out, but was taking a very active part in the defence. The probability is, that that skilful engineer, Beauregard, has constructed new fortifications on the ruins of the old casemates with the aid of sand-bags and cotton bales, and that on the 1st inst. Sumter was really stronger than it had been at the commencement of the attack. A valuable addition to its defences had, we believe, arrived at Charleston in the latter part of the month of August, via Wilmington, in the shape of some of the heaviest guns, with their ammunition, that have yet reached the South; and it is possible that in the late encounter between the forts and the iron-clads the latter were first introduced to their fire. Certainly the iron-clads had the worst of it. The utmost the Yankees can claim is, "much damage to the forts." As they eventually retired, and as the attack was to be renewed, there cannot be much doubt that they met with a decided repulse. But it speaks volumes for the success of the defence, and it augurs well for the permanent safety of Charleston, that the Federals could only report damage to the forts. We strongly suspect that General Gilmore foresaw a failure on the night of the 21st, when he threw his incendiary shells into the sleeping town, and that he hoped to intimidate the towns-people into a surrender, although he could not drive the brave garrison from their guns. He did not know the strength of Southern patriotism, or he would never have given an order which, so far from terrifying the people of Charleston, has only nerved them with a still sterner resolve never to surrender their beautiful city to the cruel invader. The Greek fire and the big guns have apparently failed, but there remains the spade. General Gilmore has fallen back upon his earlier programme, and is sapping his way to the parapet of Fort Wagner. At the latest date the approaches were so near that the men were throwing shells and grenades from the trenches and the fort; and the assault could not long be delayed. One account states that a night attack was made on the 26th and repulsed, and the report is exceedingly probable. En revanche, the Federals claim to have stormed some rifle-pits in the night from whence a very annoying fire was kept up on their working parties, and captured seventy prisoners. We are, however, entirely at the mercy of the North for news. If any disaster has happened to the Federal army it will not be published. There has been a suspicious absence of intelligence from Confederate sources in the columns of the New York press for the last week or two. We shall not be surprised to hear that another assault has been made and repulsed, and that the Confederate flag still floats proudly and defiantly over the earthworks of Fort Wagner. The panic at New York has not yet been satisfactorily explained, but there are plenty of indications that things were not going on favourably, and that, practically, little or no progress had been made towards the reduction of Charleston since the day the Federals surprised the seaward batteries and gained a footing on Morris Island. Altogether the siege of Charleston reflects as much lustre on the soldiers of the Confederacy as any episode of the war. The press in this country has been startled by the enormous array of force brought to bear against them. It has dwelt with something like alarm on the unparalleled calibre of the Federal artillery, on the destructive effect and terrible accuracy of the Parrott guns, and the solid invulnerability of the turreted iron-clads. It has contrasted the shells that swept through and through Fort Sumter with the deadliest missiles of the Old World, and confessed to a doubt as to the superiority of European artillery. The North, too, has had the run of every market in Europe. Whatever we had of newest and deadliest invention it could freely purchase and import. All our resources have been placed at its disposal; and it is fighting the Confederates with every appliance that the ingenuity and skill of man can furnish. The South has no such advantages. Isolated and unaided, she has to face the conflict. A purely agricultural country, she has to struggle with a nation of vast mechanical and engineering aptitude and resources. Out of her own scanty means she has to provide the defences which time after time beat off the Federal flotillas. With the industry, devotion, gallantry, and indomitable energy of her sons, she has to make up for the superiority which the Federal Government enjoys, with its numerous fleets and the vast means a one-sided neutrality places at its disposal. Charleston may yet fall, but at least the chivalry of South Carolina has not belied its reputation. Nowhere has Southern heroism been more nobly illustrated than amidst those battered casemates of Fort Sumter, where day after day the war-flag of the Confederacy was rehoisted almost as soon as the Federal shot had cut it down; to show to friend and foe that the brave garrison held out, and that, despite the enormous disproportion of odds, Beauregard's order of "No surrender" would be obeyed literally to the last.

Dropping the Mask.

WHETHER they imagine that their work is done, and that Mr. Seward's ninety-days' bills are at last about to be honoured, whether they are tired of their prolonged hypocrisy, or whether the intoxication produced by the destruction of Fort Sumter has made them careless, we know not; but assuredly Mr. Bright and his little faction of English Yankees have thrown off the mask of Abolitionism they have worn so long, and stand forth before the public as mere Unionists; as contemptuous of the "nigger," and as zealous for the North, as Abraham Lincoln himself. Thus writes their consistent and devoted organ the Morning Star: "It requires no shrewdness to discover that nine-tenths of English Abolitionists"—that is, of those who have taken that name upon themselves as a badge of partisanship during the present war—"are strongly attached to the American Union. They are Liberals as well as philanthropists. They love political as well as personal freedom. They believe that human progress has much to hope and nothing to fear from the re-establishment of the Republic in unimpaired vastness and power." In one word, they are Unionists and not Emancipationists; and they adopted the cry of Emancipation for two reasons of obvious policy: first, because it was popular in England; and, secondly, because it served to mask an anti-patriotic feeling which would have been at once apparent had they declared themselves simply the friends and partisans of a Government always hostile to their country, and just now engaged in acts of systematic insult and outrage towards our commerce, our colonies, and our flag. We thank them for their tardy candour; we will not inquire too closely whether or no it was wrung from them by their consternation at the idea that emancipation might perhaps come from the South, and the friends of the slave be enlisted on the side of the master who had granted, rather than of the foe who had pretended to promise him, liberty; we will allow to the wolf all the merit he may claim for having thrown off the sheep's-skin before he has actually got into the fold, and merely invite attention to the fact that he has thrown it off, and that those who in future mistake him for a lamb must be very obstinately blind indeed. It was, indeed, never very difficult to comprehend the real temper of these men. They had never been Abolitionists until the outbreak of war. How much they cared about slavery was evident from the part their leaders took on the question of Protection. The West Indian planters claimed as a matter of mere equity that, being themselves deprived of the benefits of slavery, they should not be called upon to compete on equal terms with those who still enjoyed the advantage of the only system under which negro labour can be made efficient and reliable. Their claim was admitted by the Abolitionists, and free-grown coffee and sugar long enjoyed a special protection in our market: a protection perfectly just, since the disadvantage under which its producers suffered was one of our own creation—the effect of a feature of our national policy. That protection was at last abolished. Into the party motives of its removal we need not inquire; Whigs say that they simply carried out the principles of free-trade: Tories that they were actuated by a political revenge against the West Indian planters, and by a desire to gain popularity at home by cheapening sugar. But what part did the faction now represented by the Star act on that occasion? Why, they took the side of slavery, and it was mainly their work that the differential duties were abolished. Let us ask, again, what was their tone about the African squadron, about the right of search, and other questions in which the interest of the negro was concerned? Always in favour of slavery, always adverse to the staunch and earnest Abolitionists. How, on the other hand, did they speak of the Union—as much, and no more, a slave-holding power then, as the Confederacy now? Always with admiration and attachment, not always quite consistent with good taste, loyalty, and patriotic feeling. Abraham Lincoln's Emancipation proclamation was not needed to stimulate their devotion to the Northern cause. From the first, they were heart and soul with the Union, and refused to believe in its downfall, with just that same spirit of frantic love for its magnitude, its semblance of grandeur, and its actual usefulness that was manifested by the Yankees themselves.

Mr. Bright's devotion to democracy, and to America, as the home and pattern of pure democracy, has always been one of the warmest and sincerest passions of his nature; second only to his bitter hatred of settled order and aristocratic institutions, and of England, as enjoying the highest kind of order and the most open and powerful aristocracy that the world has seen. For twenty years he has never wearied of descanting to all who would listen to him on the happiness of a land where every man was the equal of every other; where nobody took off his hat to a gentleman or allowed a peer to pass before him into a dining-room; where no hereditary lawgivers had power to restrain the representatives of the people from giving instant effect to every popular caprice; where no man was called My Lord, or Your Grace; where no established Church preserved the old traditions of Christian faith, Christian law, and Christian liberty, and provided an educated ministry, possessing by the fact of their education an unfair advantage over ignorant and illiterate rivals; above all, where no Royal presence reminded the people of the existence of a feeling so irrational as loyalty, a sentiment so degrading as reverence. America was Mr. Bright's Utopia; the Union his ideal of Government. While the Union upheld slavery, he could see no cause for speaking ill of a system found compatible with the Union; as, now that a quarrel has arisen in which slavery and the Union are on opposite sides, he can find no terms of abuse too strong for an institution which, as he says, has caused the Union to fall into its present peril. It was not of the negro that Mr. Bright thought before the war, and it is not for the negro that he cares now. He never loved liberty, personal or political; for he never knew what it meant. Were he dictator, he would begin his career by crushing the freedom of the press, and probably follow up that measure by destroying freedom of testamentary disposition. What he means by liberty he explained, unconsciously but forcibly, when he spoke of the social liberty of France as more valuable than the political liberty of England: he means simply the absence of political subordination and social gradation. A military despotism is not in his view inconsistent with liberty, provided the despot grant no titles and no class privileges; but a country wherein one man has a vote and another has not, wherein one man is Lord Palmerston, and another Sir John Pakington, and another plain John Bright, is not, to his mind, a land of liberty at all. By liberty he means equality—the worst enemy of real freedom; and therefore it is that he worships the Union. It is as the devotees of democracy, not as the champions of Abolition, that his party have ranged themselves on the side of the North in this quarrel.

But they have been forced to take another ground for the public, because the public cares much for the negro and nothing for the Union. Englishmen have been so far deluded by Abolitionist tracts as to believe that the negro suffers miserably in servitude, and they are too entirely unacquainted with him, and too thoroughly ignorant of ethnical distinctions, to doubt his fitness for freedom. But they have never been led so far astray by demagogic oratory as to mistake a forced equality for personal freedom, or to imagine that they enjoy less of political freedom because they revere the Queen, adhere to the Church, and respect the privileges of the House of Lords. They have never looked with envy or admiration upon the institutions of America. Until the outbreak of the present war the Union was for them only a foreign Power, feeble at home and aggressive abroad; whose policy appeared to them alike undignified and offensive, and with which they only became acquainted by its insolent disregard of international courtesies and its violent encroachments on the territory of its neighbours. Nor have they learned, since the war began, to regard the Union as the defence of political freedom and the hope of human progress. On the contrary, they have seen freedom trampled under foot in the name of Union; they have seen newspapers suppressed, statesmen imprisoned or banished, free speech forbidden, property confiscated, military despotism established, the independence of the judges annihilated, legislatures dispersed at the point of the bayonet, free cities occupied by military forces, and elections ordered to take place under martial law, by authority of those who professed to represent the Union; and they have learned, with perfect justice, to identify Unionism with the utter negation of civil rights and political liberty. They have seen war waged in the name of the Union against a people struggling for national independence; and waged in a spirit as savage as that of Sepoys or Sioux. They have seen cities burnt, non-combatants deliberately murdered, women and children outraged, prisoners assassinated in cold blood, property plundered, fire rained without warning on hospitals and private houses—and this in the name of the Union; and they may be excused if this Union seems to them only a fraternité de Cain. They have seen English merchantmen plundered, English harbours blockaded, English neutrality insulted, English colonies threatened with annexation, in the name and by the officers of the Union; and they justly hold this Union the deadly and inveterate enemy of England. They understand that while the Union exists the peace of the world must be perpetually in danger; the civilisation of Central America impossible; the establishment of order and good government in Mexico hopeless; the safety of the Canadian frontier precarious; and they recognise in the Union the worst foe of human progress, and in its dissolution the best guarantee for the preservation of peace throughout the world, and the development of civil freedom and material prosperity in America. The Union is a word that stinks in the nostrils of Europe even as the name of Turchin, or Milroy, or McNeill, or Butler; and he would be a bold man who, now that the Unionists have cast off the Abolition mask, would venture to claim European sympathy for them or for their cause.

One very silly clergyman, indeed—of that sort of clergymen which is supposed to occupy an intellectual position between men and women, without the instinctive good sense of the latter or the logical sagacity of the former—has undertaken to rehabilitate the Federalists, and prove that the Confederates have done worse things than they. He does not, indeed, pretend that the Confederates have shot prisoners in cold blood, or burnt defenceless cities, or hounded on revolted slaves to the murder of women and children. These things he simply ignores. But in the cases of atrocities for which he seeks parallels in the conduct of the Confederates, this Mr. Neale—this one priest of the Church of England who prays for the success of Butler and Beecher, of Turchin and Garrison—displays one mental defect conspicuously feminine, and one which belongs only to the coarsest order of masculine minds: a profound indifference to facts, and an equally profound insensibility to the moral aspect of human actions. He states, for instance, that two Confederate spies were hung, according to law, by General Burnside; that hereupon the Confederates threatened retaliation; and that then the Federals selected for reprisals two Confederate officers—one the son of General Lee—either by lot, or because the latter was the only officer in their power of equal rank to one of the prisoners. We assure Mr. Neale, with all the respect due to a profession which confers exemption from plain-spoken retorts, that there is not a single word of truth in all this. The officers murdered by General Burnside were not spies, but recruiting officers in the State of Kentucky, claimed by both the belligerents; and were, therefore, as much entitled to the courtesies of war as would be a Federal officer captured in Western Virginia. Secondly, the officers selected by the Confederate Government were of equal rank with those murdered—captains, we believe, in the enemy's service. Thirdly, so far from being chosen by lot, the officers selected by the Federals were chosen expressly as being the sons of Confederate generals. Finally, when the prisoners were first put in close arrest by the Government at Richmond, General Lee the younger was lying wounded in his own house, whither a raid was made expressly for his capture, that he might be held as a hostage for the men whom the Confederates proposed, according to military usage, to treat as Burnside had treated his prisoners. We need waste no further comment on this case. Next, this same clergyman can see no atrocity in the attempted destruction of Charleston harbour by a stone fleet while he sees something very atrocious in the destruction of cotton by the Confederates lest it should fall into the enemy's hands. Similarly, we suppose, he sees no crime in the devastation of the Palatinate by Louis XIV., and no heroism in the inundation of their country by the Dutch, or the burning of their city by the Muscovites, in order to baffle an invader. These things neither require nor admit of argument; a man who does not see the brutality of one act and the glory of the other is simply devoid of moral sense, and we might as well reason with a blind man on the nature of light, or with a deaf man on the graces of music. But we would advise this reverend gentleman, for the future, to abstain from revealing secrets that are not his. When he next meets his informant who told him that Mr. Slidell writes the letters in the Times signed S., let him tell that gentleman, in such phrases as are permitted to a priest, that he has been guilty of the sin of false witness. The Confederate Minister at Paris is as guiltless of those letters as Mr. Neale himself.

The Spectator, after some personal amenities, asks why we compare the negroes under Grant and Banks to the Sepoys under Nana Sahib? Darien and Beckham's Landing may afford a sufficient answer. The revolted Sepoys and the fugitive slaves have both quailed before their former masters in the field, and both proved more apt at arson and murder than at fighting. We never compared Banks to Nana Sahib; that evil eminence has been, by universal consent, reserved for another of our contemporary's clients, and we are bound to say that we think the Nana rather hardly used in the matter.

Thus much we have said, in deference to the former character of our contemporary, without taking notice of his present courtesies. But, as we have been obliged to enter into controversy with him, we cannot conclude without referring to a matter which we had hoped to see handled by some older and abler rival. Some time ago a letter appeared in the Spectator, signed by "A Freeman," who made himself unwarrantably free with a private letter supposed to be damaging to the character of the writer, now a minister of France. Will the Spectator, for the sake of its own honour and that of the press at large, explain by what oversight it came to publish such matter? For, until this affair is made clear, it must rest under a cloud which we would fain see removed from the character of the only adversary for whom we have ever been able to entertain a feeling of respect.

Historicus Again.

HISTORICUS used to be a clever advocate as well as a first-rate writer. His arguments were skilfully arranged and forcibly stated, and he had the tact to choose such as, if not always intelligible or convincing, should at least be calculated to perplex the judgment and avoid offence to the sympathies of his readers. But since he has accepted a brief from Mr. Adams, and undertaken to work in common with Mr. Bright and Mr. Taylor for the interests of the Federal Government, he has been gradually sinking to their level in point of discretion, temper, and forensic skill, if not in point of literary ability. His last letter is the weakest, most foolish, and most un-English that has yet proceeded from his pen; and concludes with a proposal so extravagant that we can only suppose him either to have taken leave of his political senses, or to have undertaken to write according to Federal instructions, and without reserving to himself the liberty to conceal or to modify the irrational demands of his clients. We know that the Federal Government and its agents in this country, driven to distraction by the fear of what may be achieved by a few more Alabamas, have acted in regard to Confederate shipbuilding with a degree of excitement approaching to frenzy. They observe no bounds in their demands and no discretion in their menaces. We are aware that the Americanising Radicals and the gentry of the Emancipation Society think that England ought, in pure abhorrence of slavery, either to go to war with the Confederate States, or to adopt measures adverse to them and favourable to their enemy, in a spirit altogether inconsistent with honest neutrality, or even with a decent affectation thereof. But we are a little surprised to find the same tone adopted by a writer educated in the logical and somewhat cynical school of the Saturday Review, with high pretensions to political sagacity and a considerable store of legal knowledge. Historicus's argument, however disguised, resolves itself into a series of very intelligible and very preposterous propositions. The first of these is, that the Confederate Government is causing ships to be built in this country, not for the purpose of destroying Yankee commerce or breaking up the blockade, but simply for the purpose of provoking the Yankees to go to war with England, and thus securing an ally in their struggle for independence. The second proposition is, that in building ships, or causing ships to be built, or buying ships when built—for no distinction is drawn between these different methods of proceeding—within British jurisdiction, the Confederates are committing a wrong against us, which we ought to resent, if necessary, by war; in plain terms that, if any more English ships are purchased by the Confederate Government, we ought to go to war with the Confederate States. Thirdly, we are warned that such purchases involve us in risk of war, and that therefore we ought to prevent them. Finally, two wholly inconsistent assumptions run through the whole of his reasoning, as through all arguments on the same side; first, that we are bound to enforce the Foreign Enlistment Act at all; and secondly, that we are entitled to enforce it against one party while tolerating its systematic violation by the other. It is best to consider and dispose of these propositions in detail, as we shall thereby give an answer to everything that has been urged or is likely hereafter to be urged on the Federal side of the question.

It may seem almost unnecessary to offer any argument against the childish assertion that the Confederate Government is plotting to involve England, against her will, in a war with the United States. This assertion attributes to the profound statesman at the head of that Government a weak short-sighted cunning, almost beneath the capacity of Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward, and implies on his part a settled conviction of the absolute idiocy of the English Administration. Is it conceivable that any rational politician could hope to attain by so barefaced an intrigue any other result than a direct quarrel with the Power he had sought to entrap by a contrivance too puerile for any man of more practical sagacity or diplomatic experience than the secretary of an anti-slavery society? Such nonsense hardly deserves a serious refutation. But we may observe that it receives a complete and practical refutation from the whole conduct of those who have built and of those who have subsequently taken charge of these ships. Both the Florida and the Alabama were built and sent to sea with such precautions and in such a manner that they might avoid as completely as possible any infringement of British neutrality; and in the case of the Florida a British jury decided that neither our neutrality nor our Foreign Enlistment Act had been violated while the vessel was within British jurisdiction. In every case every possible precaution has been used to avoid any violation of British neutrality; every care has been taken not to give the Federals any case for demanding the interference of the British Government. This is a conclusive proof that the object was not to bring about a war—for which end it would have been necessary to make the violation of neutrality flagrant and apparent—but to get men-of-war. And when we remember the terrible mischief that has been done by two or three Confederate cruisers, and the utter inefficiency of Yankee blockaders as men-of-war—all the blockading squadrons being so composed that two or three good iron-plated ships would dispose of any of them in half-an-hour)—when we remember, again, that two or three such ships would probably hold Boston and New York at their mercy—we can see that it would be an act of suicidal folly on the part of the Confederates to sacrifice any chance of getting such ships to sea for the problematical possibility of provoking a quarrel, in their own despite, between England and the North. We may also remind Historicus that the risk of such a quarrel has hardly been enhanced by the appearance of the Alabama and her consorts. The North has blustered and threatened no more fiercely since those ships began their career of destruction than before. It will make war upon England whenever it dares; and its daring is not likely to be increased by the news that the blockade of Mobile or Savannah has been broken up, or that Boston has been laid under contribution by a couple of Confederate men-of-war.

There is no foundation for the assertion that the Confederates, in purchasing ships from British shipbuilders, are doing a wrong to this country. If, indeed, they had established recruiting agents on our shores, and openly, or almost openly, enlisted soldiers in defiance of our laws, we might justly have protested, and forbidden their proceedings; though it might have been retorted upon us that we have allowed this very thing to be done within the last five years by the Papal Government, and also by a party which did not even pretend to represent any existing government. But we certainly have no right to complain because a British subject, being willing to sell ships to the Confederates or cannon to the Federalists, each party purchases that of which it has need. Take a case in point. During the Italian war, France chartered a British ship as a transport. This is forbidden by the same law which forbids the equipment of belligerent expeditions in British ports, and the Government hesitated whether or not they should put the law in force. But no one ever dreamt of addressing a remonstrance to the French Government on the subject; no one ever doubted that that Government had a perfect right to buy or hire ships where it could; the question was only whether our subjects had a right by law to sell or lend ships to a belligerent. The offence, if there be any, is an offence against municipal law. All persons guilty of that offence, whether natives or aliens, are, while they remain on British soil, liable to be tried for it before a British Court of Justice. But there their liability ends. No offence against our neutrality is committed by the purchase of ships within our territory; for the sale of ships of war to a belligerent is not forbidden by international law. If indeed a belligerent expedition were fitted out within our ports by Confederate agents, and sailed thence without our consent, it may be held that this would be an affront to our national sovereignty for which we might demand redress from the Confederate Government; and we are inclined to agree with Historicus, that mere non-recognition would not preclude such a demand, though the possibility of the occurrence indicates the absurdity of non-recognition. To refuse to take diplomatic cognisance of the existence of a Power with which we might, by any act of rashness or folly on its part, be forced to go to war, is simply ridiculous; if it be sufficiently a Power to be fought with, it is sufficiently a Power to be recognized. But there has been no kind of violation of our sovereignty, and can be none, so long as the Confederate Government is satisfied to purchase ships in our ports or out of them, and to arm and commission those ships only when they have passed beyond our jurisdiction; and to propose that on this account we should go to war with the Confederates in aid of the Yankees—who from the outset have insulted our neutrality in our own waters, and are now violating our sovereignty by enlisting soldiers in Ireland—is the very depth of absurdity or the sublimest height of impudence.

The probability of war, as a consequence of inaction in this matter, is utterly irrelevant. It is the hard fate of small Powers, like Portugal and Brazil, now and then to be forced to do that which is, or seems to them, contrary to right and equity; but even small Powers are held to save their honour only by holding out until violence is actually employed. A great Power is bound either to resent a threat or to disregard it; and would be held as having disgraced herself for ever if she allowed her policy to be swayed, in matters of international right or municipal jurisdiction, by the fear of foreign war. England is too great to deal differently with the weak and with the strong—to administer one law to the Confederates and another to the Federals—one justice to Naples and another to America. Fais ce que dois, advienne que pourra. If the Federal Government have a right to certain concessions at our hands, those concessions ought to be made, even though France and the Confederates were in league to make war the penalty of compliance. If they have no such right, then in giving them that which they demand under menace of war, England would be guilty of an act of cowardice fatal to her international position, and perilous perhaps to her national independence. If the sale of ships to the Confederates really constitutes a casus belli on the part of the Federal Government, then, even if war were out of the question, we ought to stop that sale at once, taking no advantage of the weakness of the complainants. If, this sale not being lawfully a casus belli, we have yet reason to believe that the Federal Government intends to treat it as such, it is clear that our conduct ought not to be influenced thereby. To give way from apprehension of a wrongful war would be to allow the Federalists to make their own advantage of their own wrong, and to inflict on the Confederates an injustice which they would be entitled to resent, simply because we know them to be in no case to resent it. It would be to aid the strong, merely because they are strong and unscrupulous, against the weak, merely because they are weak. It would be a breach of neutrality; for although we might, of our own motion forbid the sale of munitions of war to either party, yet to do this at the demand and for the convenience of one side is an evident act of hostility towards the other.

We are not bound to enforce the Foreign Enlistment Act at all. The present Government is debarred from all right to pretend to any scrupulousness on that score by its own previous conduct. It declined to prevent the departure of a regiment, regularly uniformed, equipped, armed, and organised, to assist General Garibaldi in his irregular war against the late King of Naples. It was obliged to follow up this act by permitting another armed force to go to the assistance of the Pope against the King of Italy. It is certain, then, that in Lord Russell's opinion the Act is one of merely municipal obligation, which gives no right to any foreign Power to call upon us to take any measures not strictly required of us, in our neutral capacity, by international law. And it can hardly be thought that he ought to enforce such a law with strictness in this American quarrel. For in the first place its operation must be unfair; it must prevent the Confederates buying from us what they most want, while it allows the Federals to buy that which they chiefly require, which is, in equity if not in law, a violation of neutrality. In the second place, its letter and spirit have been systematically violated on behalf of the Federal Government. Their fleets are manned by English seamen; their agents are recruiting for their armies in Ireland. If we were to act on the principle of Historicus, that we may deal with an offending nation on evidence insufficient to enable us to convict an offending subject, our first duty would be to declare war on the Federal Government for its notorious violations of our law in these matters. Then, and not till then, we should be entitled to enquire whether or not the Confederate agents have taken any steps in regard to the building of the ships said to be in Mr. Laird's yards which would give us a right of complaint. And whereas there can be no doubt that the Foreign Enlistment Act is habitually and systematically violated by the Yankees, we have the greatest doubt whether it has ever been violated, and above all, whether it is now being violated, by the Confederates. The law in regard to enlistment is clear; its violation by Federal agents is morally, if not legally, certain. But it is most doubtful whether the Foreign Enlistment Act applies to the vessels now in question; and if it do so apply, it is still more doubtful whether the Confederate Government or its agents are in any proper sense parties to the violation of the law. The truth is that, in England as in France, men forget that the two parties stand on exactly an equal footing. No French court would have dreamed of attaching the Tuscarora for the capture of a French blockade-runner. No English writer would dream of proposing to go to war with the Federalists for buying ships in Liverpool. It is time that such people as Historicus, and the French pettifoggers who have arrested a ship of war bearing the flag of a belligerent Power, should be reminded that, in their claims on neutral nations, the Confederates have every right and privilege that belongs to their enemies; that they are equally belligerents, equally, for our purpose, independent, and even in name and form equally our friends. If we act towards them in any less friendly manner than towards the Yankees, we are guilty of a breach of faith—the more inexcusable that it redounds to the advantage of the strong against the weak—of aggressive tyranny against a struggling nationality.

There is no reason to believe that any Confederate agent has committed any violation of the law in regard to the ships in question. They are not building to the order of the Confederate Government; so much we know and are free to state. If Mr. Laird is building them for Jan Jansen of Holland, or Jacques Bonhomme of Havre, there is therein no violation of law, English or international. What Jansen or Bonhomme may hereafter do with them is a question for the Government of France, and must be determined by French law; it is no concern of the Government of England. Of this, we believe, Lord Russell is perfectly aware. And if, knowing this, and being fully aware that he has no legal case against the ships, he yet proposes to detain them simply as a measure of friendship or complaisance towards the North—that is, of hostility towards the South—and pay out of the public purse such damages as a jury may award, he is guilty of a political crime for which, unhappily, no fitting punishment can, under modern usage, be awarded.

AN IMPORTANT COLONIAL PAPER.—A new paper in the English language, to be called the St. Thomas Commercial Reporter, is about to be established at St. Thomas, West Indies. The stock for this purpose has already been subscribed for, and nothing is waited for except the formal authorization of the Danish Government according to law. There is little doubt that, under competent management, this journal will soon become one of the most important members of the colonial press. The central position of St. Thomas, as the terminus of the Halifax and Bermuda mail route, and the rendezvous of the various branch lines of the West India Mail Steam Ship Company, make it the entrepôt of a great portion of the trade with the West Indies, Mexico, and Central America. The events now in progress in Mexico, and the re-establishment of peace on the Northern continent, promise to heighten still more the importance of this the most capacious and convenient harbour in the tropics. The Commercial Reporter, therefore, starts with unusual promises of success.

THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

[Our correspondent's letter, although accidentally delayed, as its date implies, and therefore not bearing upon the later incidents of this memorable siege, will yet be found highly interesting for its accurate inside view of the Charleston defences, and the portraiture of the feelings of the population. The description of the assault on Fort Wagner is one of the ghastliest battle-pieces in the history of this war.]

CHARLESTON, July 29.

If a former letter reached you, it has told of another investment by the enemy of our "fair city by the sea"—of a siege commenced at our most vulnerable point, and attended with every appliance of destruction which skill and ingenuity can suggest—of a foothold effected on Morris Island within three miles of Fort Sumter, and the steady bombardment from ship and shore of the little Battery Wagner, which so obstinately contests the further advance of the foe. Twenty days have now elapsed since the Federals made their first demonstration. During this time they have twice made most desperate assaults upon our works with their infantry and been signally repulsed. The bombardment still continues; but happily it is now no longer the one-sided conflict that marked the earlier stages of the siege. Our danger has developed a wonderful strength and energy. No sooner did we recover from the spasm of surprise into which we were thrown by the sudden appearance of the enemy's batteries, unmasked within a few hundred yards of our own, than every arm was at work to repair the damage done, and dispute each step of further progress. The authorities called on the planters in the interior for two thousand negroes to work on fortifications. Four thousand were sent, and every train of cars swells the number. You may see the detachments just arrived this morning—lying under our cotton sheds or along our sidewalks—fat, happy, mirthful fellows, each with his spade and rations, and as eager to aid in the defence of Charleston as any white resident of the city. It may seem a strange fact to English readers, but it is nevertheless true (it was at first astonishing to us), that the slaves, not only upon the coast but in the country, when brought here to work on our fortifications, have invariably performed their labours with as much enthusiasm as if every one of them were conscious that he was directly interested in their completeness.

The fighting population of the State are likewise aroused, and old men and young have poured into the city in a steady stream. Our neighbouring sister, Georgia, always prompt as patriotic, gave us some of her best citizens, and the spectacle presented on our streets was one calculated to excite every proud emotion. These volunteers from abroad have now returned to their homes, the necessity for their presence having passed away; but you may still see every afternoon at 5 o'clock, another sight that tells of the unwatered blood of youth yet running in the veins of age. A regiment of our citizens, 1,200 strong, gathers at this hour for the customary review; and as your glance runs up and down the long line, it embraces men of every rank, sphere, profession and pursuit. There are merchants and planters, ministers, lawyers, judges, editors, mechanics, even ex-governors, city and State officials, white heads, furrowed brows, mind-worn faces, pale with thought, bent forms and feeble steps; but you cannot look upon these veteran citizens, representing as they do the old and tried men of the State, in their everyday attire, garnished only with the warlike belt and cartridge box, without feeling that the rifles they hold will echo, if necessary, on the field of battle that same determined spirit which ushered their little State, alone and unprotected, out of the Union. They will fight for Charleston from behind its ruins, apply the torch to their own dwellings, and then lay down life itself.

At present, these are employed only as guards and patrols, the Confederate soldiers proper being engaged in the defence of Battery Wagner and Morris Island. Nor will they be used until the now unanticipated crisis arrives, when the Federals may directly attack the city.

The women of the State are likewise heart and soul contributing to our strength and success. Our refugees are scattered far and wide; but every mail to Charleston is laden with funds they have collected for the relief of the sick and wounded, for the purchase of luxuries and clothing, and the establishment of hospitals. Words of God speed and good cheer, are showered by these noble women upon our soldiers, and they tell us of daily prayer meetings held in every town and hamlet, from whose altars ascend the incense of their hearts to the throne of God. The Christian faith developed and demonstrated during this war is not the least among its wonderful revelations.

Let a previous communication on this subject may have miscarried, I here repeat some of the principal and most interesting items it embraced, leaving the details to be supplied by the files of Charleston papers I have forwarded. First, of the geographical situation. Looking seaward from the city, the principal object which strikes the eye is the huge grey shape of Fort Sumter, four miles distant, standing as it were at the gateway of the harbour. To the left of this, and opposite, say twelve hundred yards, is the northern border of Sullivan's Island, lined with batteries, among which are Bee and Fort Moultrie. Between Fort Sumter and the two latter is the main entrance to the harbour, the face of the island is also protected by fortifications. On the right of Fort Sumter and nearly opposite, in advance of the Fort is Morris Island, the beach thirteen hundred yards distant. The nearest known as Cummings' Point. Here a short distance the beach, is Battery Gregg. Twelve hundred thereabouts further south, is Battery Wagner, a fortification which covers the breadth of the island at that point, say two hundred and fifty or three yards. It is an enclosed work, partially surrounded by a deep ditch, with a superior slope to its southern wall, which the Yankees describe as "twenty-five feet high." Several hundred of them measured it with their bodies, and ought to know; but further details on this point cannot prudently be mentioned by your correspondent. Within the enclosure are the usual magazines and bomb-proofs; the latter can shelter from seven hundred to a thousand men. At the time of the original assault it mounted nine guns, a larger portion of which were pointed landward. On the sea face one effective piece has sufficed to keep a fleet of Monitors and gunboats at a respectful distance up to the present hour. Since the investment the place had been materially strengthened.

Morris Island is four miles in length, and resembles in shape a bent finger, the convexity of which fronts the sea. Its broadest portion is near the southern extremity, where it rests upon Light House Inlet. The latter separates Morris Island from Little Folly Island, which is in turn separated from Great Folly Island by a narrow neck. Little Folly is the Federal base of operations, its high sand hills, fine timber and dense undergrowth affording admirable concealment to the batteries of the enemy while in process of construction. Morris Island, near the Southern extremity is also covered with sand-hills, which give it great value as a military position. Unfortunately, however, the labour employed was inefficient for the purpose. Among these ridges the Confederate guns were scattered separately in a line a mile long, the front protected by sand embankments, the rear open. Our artillery consisted of nine pieces; two 8-inch naval shell guns; two 8-inch howitzers; a rifled 24-pounder, a Whitworth gun of 2-inch calibre, and three mortars. The guns of the enemy consisted of forty-seven pieces, embracing 7 10 ten-inch Parrots, 3-inch mortars, and other heavy metal. In addition to these were the 15-inch guns of the iron-clads and long-range pieces on the gunboats.

On Friday morning, the 10th instant, the formidable land batteries of the enemy were suddenly unmasked by the felling of the trees around them, and a tremendous fire opened on our unsuspecting troops. At the same time the fleet moved up to a position which completely flanked and enfiladed our own, and the Federal infantry, 4000 in number, preceded by boat howitzers, landed on the lower edge of the Island. Our infantry force consisted of less than 600 men, who had never before been in action. Taken by surprise in their camp, they were rapidly formed and hurried to the front; but by this time the battleground between the two forces was one sheet of flame. A brief stand only could be made before that terrible storm of iron hail, and they fell back fighting to the cover of Battery Wagner. In two hours our guns had been silenced, pieces captured, several of our best officers killed and wounded, the gentlest blood of the State shed, and a majority of our artillerymen taken prisoners. Captain J. C. Mitchell, a son of the expatriated Irishman, who was in command, barely escaped with a remnant of his men, and after fighting as infantry until the last moment, took refuge in Fort Wagner.

The Federals now occupied the lower half of the island, say two miles and a quarter in extent, and with their usual industry commenced to throw up batteries, the first being on an elevation known as Craigs Hill or Look-out. At daylight the next morning, (Saturday, the 11th instant) General Gilmore, Commander-in-Chief of the Yankee expedition, determined to attempt to carry Battery Wagner by assault. The storming party consisted of the 7th Connecticut in front, supported by the 76th Pennsylvania, 3rd New Hampshire, 9th Maine, and 6th Connecticut. As they advanced, the Federals were met by a raking fusillade and cannonade, but a few pressing on through the fire reached the top of the work. The contest was fierce but brief, and a few minutes sufficed to drive the whole Yankee line into a disorderly retreat. Scores were picked off by our unerring rifles as they ran, and some eighty or ninety, fearing this fiery gauntlet, raised their handkerchiefs from the coverts in which they were lying in token of surrender. The Federal loss on this occasion was 334 killed, wounded, and missing. Our own loss, five killed and ten or eleven wounded.

From that time until the 18th the enemy contented themselves with bombarding Battery Wagner from ship and shore, but without effect. The light yielding sand of the island successfully resisted the force of their heaviest balls, and like spray, fell back on to the embankment, and frequently on the very spot from where it was thrown. On Saturday, the 18th inst., another assault was attempted. From eight o'clock in the morning the bombardment increased in intensity until dusk, when it culminated in one of the most fearful storms of shot and shell ever rained upon a battery on this continent. No language can do justice to the scene at this time. The sound was like a continued reverberation of thunder, peal following peal in succession so rapid, that one could scarcely discern an interval. The air was filled with racing messengers of death, whose solid masses and splintered fragments buried themselves in almost every foot of the devoted fort. Immense shells striking the slope bounded over the parapet and rolled across the parade ground, to burst and scatter there. Others ricocheted along the earth and over the water, throwing huge volumes of sand and sea high in the air, while still others penetrated and were lost to sight in the broad earthen sides of the battery. On right and left could be seen shooting out a tongue of flame from every gun; now from an iron-clad, now a gunboat, now a broadside from the iron-sides, and again the batteries on land, and then fantastic shapes of smoke would linger for a moment and drift away in clustering branches, festoons, and spiral wreaths, to mingle with the heavy clouds that had gathered in the northern sky.

Nine thousand shot and shell, according to the closest estimates, fell in and around the battery, but the casualties during the day did not exceed eight killed and twenty wounded. This fire ceased soon after dark, and then an assault being anticipated, the different commands of the garrison, who had been sheltered by the bomb-proofs, took their positions behind the ramparts.

The enemy advanced in two columns, according to the statement of prisoners, four and three thousand strong; the front bearing towards the outer beach, as if to attack the sea face and angle of the battery. It was about a quarter to eight o'clock. In five minutes more the head of the line emerged from the evening gloom, and reached the vicinity of our rifle pits. Sudden as a flash of lightning our heavy guns now opened with grape and canister, which tore great ragged gaps in their ranks and for an instant checked their approach; but recovering from this confusion again they moved steadily on until within less than a hundred yards.

Barely waiting for the Federals to come within this destructive range, our infantry gave them the contents of their rifles. The first line reeled to and fro under the fiery shock, like a stricken serpent, but, pushed on by those in the rear, the whole body commenced a charge at a double-quick. Our men could not charge back, but they gave a Southern yell in response to the Yankee cheer and awaited the blow. On they came over the sand-hills, tripping and stumbling in the pits their own shells had dug, until a portion reached the ditch of the battery. For those who had survived our fire, it was but the work of a moment to clamber up the sloping sides of the fortification and effect a lodgement. But the men who met them on the parapet were as desperate as themselves, and the contest that ensued was brief and bloody. The antagonists were breast to breast. Yankee negroes were among them, and with a hate that nerved the arm to fiercest blows, Southern rifles and Southern bayonets made short work of human life. The parapet was lined with bodies, white and black, and every second was running up the score. It was one of those encounters in which one side or the other must quickly yield or fly. The enemy took their choice.

In less than five minutes the whole of the first line had been shot, bayoneted, or were in full retreat—rolling in the ditch, or dragging their bloody bodies through the sand-hills on their hands and knees. But another column came, and another and another, each reinforcing its predecessor, until the battle waxed hot, desperate, and bloodier than before. Our light howitzers on the left of the battery were sweeping the slope and ditch with grape and canister, mowing down whole companies; our heavy guns in the fort were raking huge channels through the advancing ranks, while a fringe of fire danced along the edge of the ramparts, from rifles whose muzzles almost touched the fated objects of their aim. It was an ordeal from which the boldest troops might shrink, but with a bravery worthy of a better cause, a few of the Federals persevered in their task, and under cover of the darkness, finding the salient of the battery unprotected, dashed into an empty gun chamber and held their position. The remainder fled. The back-bone of the fray was broken, and but for a few spattering shots from the 200 or 300 of the enemy in the fort, some of whom had clambered up the bomb-proofs, the battle might have ceased altogether. General Taliaferro, our commander, making a personal reconnaissance, discovered that the Federals were in a position to give us trouble, should their comrades venture to repeat the assault: and accordingly surrounding the small locality they occupied, drove all who dared to run from the fort, and captured the remainder. Thus terminated one of the hardest fought, and, under the circumstances, one of the most desperate battles of the war. Our loss, all told, was not more than thirty-five killed and ninety wounded. That of the enemy was between 1,600 and 2,000. Of whites, we captured six commissioned officers and ninety-four privates. Of blacks, twenty-three or four, most of whom were wounded. The latter are generally from the Northern States, and belong to the 54th Massachusetts Regiment, commanded by Colonel Shaw, who was found dead on the parapet by the side of his orderly-sergeant and flag. They say they were put in the advance under threat of being shot down by those in the rear, and having once got within our fire thought the safest place was under our guns. The Federals have another negro regiment, the 1st South Carolina, commanded by the famous Jay Hawker Kansas Montgomery.

Among the Yankee dead was found the body of Colonel Putnam, formerly of the Topographical Engineers, and commanding on this occasion, it is believed, one of the storming columns. The back part of his head had been blown off, but even in death the remarkable beauty of his face and form struck every observer. The remains were carefully preserved, and subsequently returned to the enemy under a flag of truce.

Probably no battle-field in the country has presented such an array of mangled bodies in a small compass as was to be seen on Sunday morning after the fight. The ground in front of Battery Wagner was thickly strewn; but in the ditch around the work the dead and wounded—white and black—were literally piled together. Blood, mud, water, brains and human hair matted together; men lying in every conceivable attitude, with every conceivable expression upon their countenances—their limbs bent into unnatural shapes by their fall of twenty or more feet—the fingers rigid and outstretched as if they had clutched at the earth to save themselves—pale beseeching faces looking out from among the ghastly corpses, with moans and cries for help and water, and dying gasps and death struggles. These are some of the details of the horrible picture which the night of Saturday left to be revealed by the dawn of a peaceful Sabbath. The work of removing the wounded and burying the dead was commenced at once, but it was not until far into the night of Sunday that it neared completion. The former were brought to the city in steamers. The surgeons operating on board; the latter were buried in pits. The number of dead reported officially was over 600.

This disastrous repulse has no doubt satisfied the Federal general of the impracticability of carrying Battery Wagner by assault. For since that time, his preparations have been directed mainly to the construction of other batteries, the landing of heavy guns from his fleet, and a disposition of troops for the purpose of making feints elsewhere. An attack on James Island is not among the improbabilities, but there the chances of success are not more brilliant than those afforded in front of Battery Wagner.

To reduce Fort Sumter, Batteries Wagner and Gregg must first be captured. Neither of these can be breached with the means the enemy have yet brought to bear. They can only be rendered hot and uncomfortable by a continuous fire, and this has been so long withstood that our troops have become accustomed to the angry voices of the guns, and begin to think that they are "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." Meanwhile our military authorities have not been idle. New batteries and large guns now bear on every position occupied by the Federals on Morris Island, and the nearer the consummation of their hopes they approach the greater will be the obstacles to be encountered and overcome.

Our community is self-reliant and confident of success. We are daily and nightly harassing the foe, and unless he shows more iron patience than he has ever before exhibited, there is little doubt but we shall again prove triumphant in the defence of our city. There are various facts connected with our movements which, if known, would greatly encourage our friends abroad; but at the present time it is manifestly imprudent to write of them, and I can, therefore, only add—"Be of good cheer." Generals Beauregard and Ripley are fully alive to the emergencies of the occasion, and are bending every energy to the work of defence.

PERSONNE.

A FEDERAL GENERAL IN DISTRESS.

General Gilmore has written a very earnest official letter from his head-quarters, on Morris Island, to the Editor of the New York Daily News, in which he "conjures" the said Editor to suppress all military intelligence of the siege which might be of advantage to the enemy. In the course of the letter, which is dated the 5th August, he says:—

The Charleston and Savannah press get Northern news more frequently and more expeditiously than I do myself. My operations have already suffered very seriously from this cause. More than twenty-four hours previous to the arrival of the last mail from the North, I became aware, from certain movements of the enemy at Fort Sumter, that he had gained a knowledge of a portion of my plans. When the Northern papers arrived I found them teeming with information, of the most valuable kind to the enemy, and which gave them advantages which can only be counterbalanced or overcome by the expenditure of blood that might have been spared. One-tenth of my command is constantly engaged in the most perilous duty, in order to secure the prosecution of operations in which secrecy is essential to success, but which are divulged to the enemy through the public press long before their completion. I conjure you, therefore, to aid me in suppressing.

THE DEFENCE OF MOBILE.—While General Johnston was recently in this city, the prophets of evil began to whisper abroad that he had come to consult with General Maury about the ways and means of evacuating the city. When this was mentioned to General Johnston his grave face relaxed into a smile, and he said, "Had that been my purpose I should not have shown my countenance among you. I am here for the directly opposite purpose of looking into your defences and preparing to hold your city." Afterwards, when he had visited the works, and minutely examined every position and gun, he remarked to the same gentleman, "You can tell your people that Mobile is the most defensible seaport position in the Confederate States." Mobile is to be defended, then, to the last. If there are any who are pained to know it, and not ready to do their part in the sacred work, they had better sell their lands and houses, and pack up their goods and remove them, with their precious persons, from the scene of duty, honour, and danger. All true men will be rejoiced to hear these words of determination from the able and noble commander of the department, and they will stand by him in the execution of his purpose with life and property.—Mobile Register, Aug. 2.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER, Sept. 16.

WITH reference to my last letter, in which, for the first time within my knowledge, the Union and Emancipation Society was honestly introduced to the public, there is nothing to unsay, except that the Rev. J. R. Balme formally denies that he made other than a Pickwickian use—that is, merely in quotation—of the bold imagery attributed to him in apostrophising Mr. Seward as the "War-horse of Liberty." At the request of the "American clergyman" of the Garrisonian way of thinking, I mention this personal trifle. As for the rest, what is written is written; and with regard to the ludicrous wrath excited in certain specially anointed circles here, the hubbub is no greater than, according to Sydney Smith's experience, usually attends upon the process in its incipient stages, of routing out a nest of consecrated cobblers.

Preparations are making for a grand Southern demonstration here. The affair will, of course, take the usual form—a banquet; but unlike the common run of such formalities, it will carry with it a deeper and wider significance than ordinarily belongs to occasions of that kind. It will offer a suitable opportunity, which I have reason to believe will be very largely availed of by our leaders in the mercantile world—the men of real political influence here, who, ex vi termini, are non-agitators—for giving expression to the wishes and desires of the majority of the intelligent people of all classes in the distressed districts, on behalf of the Confederate cause. Cards of invitation will be sent to numerous public men of character and distinction, several indeed of whom are already engaged to be present; and there certainly appears to be every guarantee that the occasion will lack nothing that might serve to mark it as one of considerable importance. The banquet will take place in the fine salon of the Clarence, covers being ordered for 300.

I have not forgotten the part the Honourable and Rev. Baptist Noel took at a high war-festival held here some months ago, upon which occasion he vied with half-a-dozen other reverend peace-makers in hounding on the Federal Government in its Christian career. While the sanctimonious orgies were at their height, the indignant uproar of a large portion of the meeting compelling him to address himself almost exclusively to the reporters, the Honourable and Reverend gentleman vouchsafed to tell an anecdote. It came to pass, it seems, on a day, that one of General Lee's slaves, an interesting negress—quite a young thing—being an hungry, went to the brook-side to catch fish. She was discovered at her innocent and even melancholy employment by her fell master, who straightway ordered her to be flogged. The flagellator—ordinary, moved with a strange pity—hardly his own—for the poor girl's fragile and tender form, threw down his wonted lash and threw up his familiar office. It was reserved for the General himself, the boasted pink and flower of Southern chivalry, to complete with his own hands the arch-deed of hideous cruelty, from which even the habitually brutalised functionary had recoiled in his own despite. So went the anecdote. But the best of the joke was, that in his almost childish fright at the consequences of having told it, the Honourable and Reverend gentleman had to seek refuge from the clamorous jeers of those who happened to have heard him, in these words—"I do not know that the story is true, but we all know that such things are done." Was ever anything more silly said? Or, supposing the audience had been sufficiently unsophisticated and that the story had gone down, was ever tittle-tattle so worthy of an evangelical lady's logic? Really it is enough to tempt one to repay the Honourable and Reverend gentleman in the same feminine coin. I have a copy before me of the Oldham Chronicle, September 12, and in an account therein of a local meeting in favour of Southern Independence, the chairman, after giving his opinion of Exeter Hall cant about the cruelty of slaveholders, is reported as follows:—

A friend of his had been recently informed by a returned black missionary, who had been a slave in the South for twenty-one years, that the ill-usage said to be inflicted on the negroes was not inflicted, and that when he was making a statement to that effect at a meeting in London the Honourable and Reverend Baptist Noel, who was the chairman, pulled him by the coat tail, and he had to sit down.

In the Honourable and Reverend gentleman's own unfortunate words, I do not know that the story is true, but we all know that such things are done.

By the way, the touching anecdote I have just spoken of about the negress of the delicate frame and the gallant Confederate commander was told at the "large public meeting" in the Free Trade Hall, when that identical address was "unanimously adopted" Mr. Seward's reply to which furnished me with my last week's text for an introductory conversation with the Union and Emancipation Society. The sense in which that large meeting was a "public" one may be indifferently well understood from the fact that the reverend promoters had to content themselves with reading the Address very early—by a sort of theatrical aside; and while they disallowed any discussion upon it, they never had the courage to propose the document for adoption at all. But the sense in which the meeting was "unanimous" cannot be quite so briefly interpreted. In point of fact, for three hours out of the four, the interruptions in the body of the hall were not merely vocal but of the more pronounced Mace and Goss type. The gallant Stonewall Jackson was alive in those days, so that whenever the unanimity of turmoil showed signs of abating, a prudently-timed shout in honour of that noble soul was sure to be good for a series of set rounds of hip-hip-hurrahing for the highly satisfactory manner in which he had just fallen foul of the cowardly hirelings of Chancellorsville. Before the first half-hour was over, the chairman (Mr. T. B. Potter) had to threaten the belligerents with the police; but as that was a point upon which Captain Palin, our chief constable, might have had a word to say, the policy of rigid neutrality was observed by the "force." Thus the scrimmaging went merrily on. The more loudly Dr. Massie thundered in favour of the war between North and South on the other side of the Atlantic, the more vigorously did Manchester Northerners and Southerners reproduce miniature editions of it in the Free Trade Hall. Another of the reverend speakers (I think Dr. Rylance) hoped that, under certain circumstances, not expressly contemplated in the New Testament, the struggle would be "long, dark, fierce, and terrible;" whereupon, by way of practical commentary upon that Christian sigh, there arose a quick and many-sounding clatter of feet, as of knots of men wrestling (passim) in boots, on a wooden floor with no sawdust upon it; nor were symptoms wanting that the bases of palestra operations were being enlarged as well as multiplied, and that a good many independent outsiders were unwillingly finding themselves entangled in the strenuous mysteries of giving one another the Lancashire cross-buttock. And yet this was the public meeting whose "views" were gravely accepted by Mr. Seward as "harmonising" with his own! Supposing, for the sake of argument, that views have either musical or unmusical qualities, then Mr. Seward's must be singularly "compact of jars." But, seriously, if any reader of THE INDEX should feel staggered in his faith that such a miracle could ever have been perpetrated as that of basing a flattering and unanimous "address" to the Washington Cabinet upon the opinions expressed at a meeting like that I have attempted to describe, I quite sympathise with him in his tottering credulity. No doubt there are some people whose capacity of belief has not been fully trained and developed by the forcing process of seeing with their own eyes the really magical performances which the Union and Emancipation Society can turn out of hand. We of this favoured city have reached a high state of cultivation in that respect. To change the metaphor, the Federal practitioners here have so systematically dosed us with treatment in the marvellous line as to have effectually purged us of the last vestige of the stiffneckedness of unbelief. But what a pity it was that Dr. Massie and Dr. Rylance, when on the point of leaving us for America, did not put in their pockets, as a gloss to the "Address," a copy of the Manchester Guardian of June 3rd. Mr. Seward no doubt would have been equally thankful for both favours, and he could the better have appreciated the one by the light of the other. But some amends can even now be made for so unfortunate an oversight. The Guardian, I should observe, though loving the South much, loves—as it ought to do—Lancashire more; and in these straitened times, it has some ado to keep up the credit of the family. With this laudable touch of the Caleb Balderston element in its composition, we are quite prepared to find that journal putting the most decent face on things before strangers, though we have no wish to see it go all lengths with the worthy seneschal of the ruined house of Ravenswood. Yet, not even the Guardian could quite wink at the disgrace brought upon the city, through our humbug on the one hand and our rowdiness on the other, on the evening of the 1st of June. In its leading columns, it characterised the so-called public meeting as no public meeting, except in the sense that it was a public "shindy." We were reminded, however, of the extenuating circumstance that "it was no small addition to the nuisances entailed by this terrible conflict, that it should bring turmoil into our quiet towns as the only alternative to our connivance at a deliberate misrepresentation of English opinion." Nor was the report itself altogether lacking in some scatterings of the naked truth. Now, if Dr. Massie or Dr. Rylance had only been moderately considerate, I should not be culling for Mr. Seward's edification a few flowers of what newspaper people call description. "As the evening wore on," interpolates the reporter, "the dissentients became so vigorous and remonstrative that the oratory was lost in the general disorder that prevailed." A little farther on, several fights "here" occurred. Cheers were "here" given for President Jefferson Davis, General Lee, and Stonewall Jackson. Somebody "here" shouted three cheers for the South generally, and "a scene of great confusion ensued." At another "juncture," two or three more fights occurred, "consequent on the attempt to expel from the room some persons who were loud in their dissent." At a subsequent stage, matters had become so lively that "a reinforcement of police was sent for from the A. division, but they were not called upon to act." I should think not. Their mere presence was resented with yells of indignation at so perverse a display of the fleshly tyranny of the law in support of the odious moral tyranny of the platform. Such, then, was the Guardian's report of a meeting, whose "views" were such as to "harmonise" with Mr. Seward's. But, notwithstanding the relish one has of writing upon a subject to one's liking, I must break off here for the present.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, September 15.

THE arrival of the Florida in Brest harbour has given rise to a good deal of correspondence, and not a little controversy, which may interest many of your readers, and, to tell the truth, is in this very dull season a small god-send to your correspondent. I shall, therefore, make no scruple in treating the question in some detail, the rather that it may give rise to others of great interest in international law.

Your readers are aware that the Florida claimed the hospitality of the French Government, to enable her to repair her machinery and to overhaul her hull, and that this was accorded by order of the Emperor, with the proviso that this permission should not extend to increasing in any way her powers of offence against the enemy. Such a condition was in strict accordance with the rule of neutrality proclaimed both by England and France. American questions are distant questions, and such, when they regard other parties, excite in France little interest, unless that interest be stimulated by some other. Such being the case, we must give all credit to the majority of the French press, which has so faithfully stuck to the cause of justice and independence by its constant advocacy of the South, for the South has taken a position which leaves it neither the power nor the wish to suborn witnesses in Europe. But it is no secret, or if a secret it is that of the comedy which all the spectators know, that enormous sums have been lavished by the Federal Government on those, not numerous, papers, which here and elsewhere support its cause, per fas aut nefas. Its agents are everywhere; it is not, therefore, to be wondered at if their pretensions are constantly intruded on the public ear; the rather that in France, at least, the friends of the North are also without exception the more or less avowed enemies of the Imperial regime. Orleanists, republicans, and that other nuance, which is not legitimist, but which for want of a better name we may call Palais-Royalists, all unite in aiming a shaft at Imperialism under the shield of those United States which they would persuade their readers, France and Lafayette founded. For them the so-called work of legitimist France is more sacred than that legitimacy which they once decapitated and afterwards exiled. The friends of revolution in Europe are, in America, the enemies of the most justifiable revolution that history can tell of—the separation of States with equal sovereign rights; and, on one side, the universal assent of the people.

There is a certain gallantry in the ardour which the Russian Nord, so pressed as it must needs be with the affairs of Poland, displays in favour of its natural ally; ally, as we were, and natural, if the old proverb suum cuius summa injuria, mean—as I am told, that the Autocracy and Democracy are twins. The Nord, under the heading of Brest, gives an account of the Florida's arrival, and of the seizure attempted by the proprietors of a French vessel, the Brémontier, which was alleged to have been forcibly turned from its course to carry the crews of two United States' vessels ashore at Pernambuco. The maritime Prefect forbade the seizure, so long as the Florida lay in the Government docks, and I regret to say that the account given by the Nord and consorts is so little lucid, that I am unable to make out whether this legal seizure has yet been effected. The proprietors claim the small sum of £4,000, probably five times the amount of their freight from Bordeaux to their destination, New Caledonia, as compensation for their pretended forcible deviation to land the American crews at Pernambuco. In publishing the ex parte statement of the captain of the Brémontier in May last, the Moniteur used the word corsaire to designate the Confederate man-of-war. This word was again used in the note explaining why the Florida had been admitted to the Government docks at Brest, and it seems to have been adopted by the French press to designate all the vessels belonging to the Confederate States. As the Nord remarks, corsaire means either a privateer or a pirate, and it leaves Captain Maffit to choose which he will be called. Fortunately the Patrie used the same expression, and as it has taken no oath to Master U. S., it gave admission in its columns to a spirited note from Captain Maffit, in which, disclaiming either gloss, he informs the ignorant that the Confederate States, being recognised by all the world as belligerents, have the same right to fit out ships of war as to equip armies—that he and all his officers hold regular commissions in the Confederate States' navy, and also that his ship is regularly commissioned. These facts had, to my knowledge, been plainly put before the Siecle some months ago, and they were, of course, systematically ignored. Having dealt with the words we shall now proceed to the facts, not, however, before remarking that this and two or three other actions with which the Florida is menaced, all on the ground that she is a privateer, are dodges resorted to by the representative of Mr. Lincoln in the hopes that time may thus be gained to enable a few Yankee men-of-war to blockade the Florida in Brest. The clown in the play says that "Cunning and courage are near akin, for one and other with C begin." Now for the facts as stated in the Pays of this date, and taken from the log of the surgeon of the Florida, Mr. Ganelson:—

On the 21st April, 1863, the Florida gave chase to a ship which, on nearing it, was found to be the Brémontier of Bordeaux.

On the 23rd, captured the barque Henrietta, Capt. Browne, from Baltimore, bound for Rio. Took the crew on board and burned the vessel.

On the 24th, captured the Oneida, Captain Potter, bound from Shanghai to New York. Crew taken on board and vessel burned.

Seeing a sail under the wind, the Florida made for it, but on nearing discovered that it was the Brémontier, which she had chased on the 21st.

Then, Captain Browne, addressing the lieutenant and surgeon of the Florida (the extract is from the latter's journal), represented that he had boarded the Brémontier some days before; that the captain was a brother Freemason, and that he was sure that if Captain Maffit would send him on board he could procure a passage for himself and his passengers. On this Captain Potter said that he also was a Mason, and that he probably could obtain the same favour. The officers conveyed to Captain Maffit this message from the Yankee captains, and, anxious to save them all possible inconvenience, he at once acceded to their desire. The Brémontier was then hailed, and a boat sent on board with the two captains only.

On their return the two prisoners announced to the Captain of the Florida that the Frenchman had yielded to their entreaties, and that he had agreed to take them, their passengers, and some of their crew, to land them at Pernambuco.

In accordance with this arrangement, which was strictly private, between the captain of the Brémontier and the Yankees, two females and thirteen men were put on board the Brémontier, and with them the usual supply of provisions, although the officers of the Florida were perfect strangers to the arrangement entered into.

It was only on his arrival at Pernambuco that Captain Maffit learned to his astonishment that the Captain of the Brémontier had made a declaration before the French consul that he had been forced to take these passengers on board. Captain Maffit lost no time in sending the French consul a letter stating all the circumstances as here related.

The captain of the Florida had taken no share in this transaction, as, commanding a man-of-war, he could have summoned the Frenchman to come on board, or could have sent an officer to verify his papers; it is therefore difficult to understand under what intimidation the Frenchman acted; but at all events it is evident that if he were the dupe of some Yankee finesse, he had only himself to blame. It is also to be observed that the Frenchman made his bargain and sailed off, without making any protest, either verbal or written.

Taking, as we have a right to do, the above account of the affair of the Brémontier as correct, there can be no doubt of what the decision of any court will be. The French tribunals have decided already a claim for damages sustained by the burning the cargo of a ship, so that any other actions on this score are certain to be rejected. The only object which such claims can be made for—to detain the Florida till a fleet assembles to blockade the harbour—is, at all events, as I am informed, likely to be frustrated, for the Florida has more than one shot in her locker.

At the close of last week a variety of alarming rumours created a panic on the Bourse, but all of them having been contradicted, the market has resumed the ascensional movement of the last fortnight. Victor Emmanuel's death was one of those reports, the fact being that he is ill, and that by many it is thought that the hard life he has lived is beginning already to tell upon him, although he is only forty-three. The only French news of the last few days is the decree conferring the title of Duke on M. F. de Persigny, who is now Duc de Persigny, without the prefix of his original name, Fialin. The title was offered and refused last spring, but the comments which have been made on his sudden expulsion from office, at a time when he assured every one that he was more firmly seated than ever, seem to have induced him to reconsider his decision, and to request the Emperor to confer on him this mark of favour. To have been dismissed from high place is always considered by his Majesty as a sort of claim to some sort of favour. He parts with a minister only when he has found it impossible to retain him, and then hastens by marks of regard to show that the fallen minister has lost nothing in his esteem. To the companions of his exile the Emperor has been royally generous, and both in this capacity and as a fallen minister M. de Persigny had strong claims on his warm-hearted disposition.

The Independence of Brussels alleges that the North is having vessels built in England, as well as the Confederates, and that all such vessels have been embargoed as well as those in the Mersey. I mention this as I have seen no notice of the sort in either French or English papers.

THE SOUTHERN PRESS ON FRANCE IN MEXICO.

(From the Richmond Sentinel.)

The Southern people, while fighting against vast odds for their independence, and tacking every energy they possess to maintain the unequal conflict, have had no time to study the struggles of other countries. Therefore the French expedition to Mexico has excited but little interest at the South, the general conviction being, that France aimed merely to secure justice for her citizens, and that this result the power of the French arms would soon be able to effect. We have seen this expedition on its path, without a thought of apprehension or jealousy, and the triumph of Puebla inspired a feeling of gratification among us, second only to the annoyance it has given to the Government which aims first to enslave the South, and then to control the whole of the North American Continent.

No one who is conversant with the state of affairs in Mexico, for many years past, can fairly arraign France for a resort to arms. A country, full of wealth and resources, blessed with a genial climate and rich soil, Mexico has been the prey of alternate factions, and given over, it would appear, to the spoiler and the robber. The Germans, French, English, and Spaniards who have settled in Mexico, and applied their capital and industry to develop its resources, have been plundered until scarcely a motive was left for exertion. There has been no safety for property or labour, and the only really thriving trade has been that of the half robber, half warrior class, who have nearly made a ruin of the fairest portion of the globe. Year by year things have been going on from bad to worse. No flag of any foreign power has availed to protect its citizens. All the better class of the Mexicans, and of foreigners residing in Mexico, have sighed for any government, whether native or foreign, monarchical or republican, which would give them order and security. * * *

Under the influence of Seward's diplomacy, the Juarez Government, which had so long refused satisfaction for injuries to French subjects, were willing to promise payment of indemnities when they found a French army on their soil to enforce them. Spain and Great Britain chose to content themselves with the empty promises of the Juarez Government, and withdrew their troops. But the Emperor of France was more sagacious and provident, more just to his own subjects and to Mexico. He sought a radical cure for a chronic disorder. What value to him had the fresh pledges of men whom "no signature could bind," and the very tenure of whose power was anarchy and persistent rapine? Had he turned back at this point his enemies might well have taunted him for having employed the rich resources of the Empire for a fruitless display of arms whose sole trophy consisted in the barren contract of a perfidious Government. But he aimed at something more practical—to release Mexico from a Government of brigands, and pave the way for a dynasty to be freely chosen by the Mexicans themselves, which should assure security for foreign residents, and hold out some hope of order, development and rational freedom. It was a rôle for honour and civilisation well worthy of a great Empire.

There were, however, not a few obstacles to its accomplishment. It was easy to rally an ignorant populace under the cry of repelling foreigners, and those of the opposing party who saw through the deception were without arms or organisation. The Government of Mr. Lincoln lent every aid in money and counsel to Mexico, and would have gone much farther, had they dared, or their hands not been tied by the South. It is more than probable that the system of defence adopted at Puebla was the work of Federal officers. The British press misrepresented the aims of the expedition, and the Northern press and Government beheld it with undisguised jealousy and hate. The more candid of Yankee journalists freely avowed that all that prevented their armed interference in favour of Mexico, was the war with the South; so that, in effect, we have been the allies of France. Even at home, the Emperor has had to struggle with factionists who publicly condemned the expedition and secretly wished for disaster to the arms of their country. But in spite of all this opposition, and of obstacles of climate, want of transportation, &c., the movements of General Forey have gone on until crowned by the capitulation of Puebla and the surrender of its garrison. Here the Mexicans had made their great struggle, and accordingly, when the French advanced, they found the capital deserted by the Juarez faction, and the Church party in power, who welcomed them with open arms.

We are told by the New York Herald that the Juarez Government has betaken itself to San Luis de Potosi, carrying with it all "the treasure" arms, &c. This place is to the extreme north of the country, and nine-tenths of the population are far to the southward. So that the Church party is now fully installed in power, and, with the aid of the French, they will probably retain it. The Herald is weak enough to say that the fugitive Government of Juarez can form an alliance with the Southern Confederacy, and that "with the aid of an army of twenty thousand Confederates, the French could easily be driven out of Mexico."—Could absurdity or impudence further go?—"The South is to ally herself with a defeated faction—her known enemies and the allies of the North—in order to put down the party which gives for Mexico a pledge of order and progress, and assures justice to the Confederacy in the intimate relations which must one day necessarily exist between the two countries! But if there can be anything more absurd than this, it is to imagine that the Confederacy would seek a quarrel with the great ruler and statesman of France, whose sympathy for them in their struggle has been more than once manifested.

Animated by those sentiments of mutual respect which brave nations always entertain for each other, the French and our own people, remembering, too, how each has in its time been called on to combat against great odds in struggling for self-government, are far more likely to fight side by side hereafter than to engage in a war which could only benefit the depraved race who are seeking our subjugation, there is scarcely any possible conflict of interest between France and the Confederate States in the future. At this moment they have every motive to cordial amity, and this truth is so obvious that it can hardly escape the attention of either Government or people.

Notwithstanding the defection of England from the enterprise, on its very threshold, and the secret or open opposition, both of England and the Federal Union, the Emperor has gained his point after a short war; has achieved, perhaps, the greatest work of his reign, and established a predominating French influence in the fairest region of the New World. Henceforth, the Gulf will be swarming with French ships of war; French soldiers will be seen on the Rio Grande; and in all political arrangements of this continent, France will be counted for something. At this we profess ourselves more than pleased. Mexico, in her chronic anarchy, was bound to fall under the overmastering influence of either England, the United States, or France. France is the only Power in the world that has manifested any friendly feeling towards the Confederacy in its terrible struggle for independence. She is united to us by many ties of interest and sympathy; and of the three Powers above named, she is the only one we could tolerate on our southern border. By settling herself in Mexico, he not only keeps out enemies, but introduces a friend. The principles announced by General Forey for the future government of Mexico, are, on the whole, fair, just, and moderate. They approximate, as nearly as circumstances permit, to the governmental system of France itself, and France is one of the best governed countries in Europe.—Richmond Enquirer.

ARMING THE NEGROES.

The following letter of the Washington Correspondent of the New York Tribune seems to have been the authority for the report brought by the Hibernia of the Confederates intending to arm the negroes:—

Converting blacks into soldiers for the defence of the national territory is not a new idea with the Confederate Government. As early as 1861, when the Union forces under McClellan were scattered along the extensive line of the Chickahominy swamps, many of the most prominent wealthiest planters, frightened by the dangers of the fall of Richmond, which they then considered as an inevitable event, proposed to arm and to lead their slaves, and to bring them to the rescue of the threatened capital. But public opinion having not yet been prepared by repeated reverses and losses in men to overcome one of its strongest prejudices, nor to contemplate without a shudder of contempt the possibility of seeing one day a free man fight side by side with a slave, the proposition was looked upon as dangerous and visionary, and was so treated by the great majority of the people. Still, it was rumoured at the time that the members of the Cabinet would have willingly accepted the proffered aid had it not been for the sake of their popularity. Jeff. Davis, who since the beginning of this war, had been pressed by European Cabinets to adopt some reformatory measure in reference to slavery, said, on that occasion, that it would be desirable to see the tide of public prejudice recede from its course, and black regiments formed for the defence of cities and strongholds. It was obvious, then, that the Cabinet was already contemplating the feasibility of arming the slaves, and that they were deterred from doing so only by the fear of hurting too violently existing prejudices, and thus weakening their own power. The series of victories won by General Lee inflated the pride and vanity of the Southerners to such an extent that, for a moment they believed themselves to be indebted for their success to the holiness of the institution of slavery as well as to the superior valour of their men. The victory at Gettysburg, and the conquest of the borders of the Mississippi by the Union armies caused this stupendous edifice of pride and error to crumble down, and demonstrated to them the emptiness and folly of their iniquitous theory. They then turned their eyes towards their 4,000,000 blacks, and asked themselves how it was that the Government had not yet availed itself of the resources offered by this large recruiting field, and why an army of blacks was not raised forthwith. I may say, however, that those who wished at first to use the blacks as soldiers did not think that their services in that capacity were entitled to a reward; they would have held them in slavery all the while. It was, I understand, the sentiment of the army which modified the views of the planters in that respect. The army refused to fight unless the slaves be made free before entering the ranks, and received equal advantages with those enjoyed by the whites. Before this question was ripe enough to be brought before the rebel Government, Beauregard, supported in this by the opinion of the Governor of South Carolina, had been asking for authority to arm a few negro regiments for the defence of Charleston, and Governor Shorter, of Alabama, pressed by the necessity of providing for the defence of Mobile, had addressed the same request to Richmond, and recommended, in a public proclamation, the arming of negroes in his own State. These unexpected demands coincided too well with the secret sentiments of the Cabinet not to be used by it as the ground of a new policy. Thus, while Beauregard's claim might be considered as justifying the arming of negroes under the plea of military necessity, the proclamation of Governor Shorter, of Alabama and the endorsement of the Governor of South Carolina, more important still, unreservedly placed at the disposal of the Government a force of several thousand men, and paved the way for a powerful military organization all over the extent of the Confederacy. Jefferson Davis was too shrewd not to avail himself of these fortunate circumstances. By his order, every governor in the rebel States was consulted concerning the propriety of arming slaves for the war, and was invited to Richmond to confer with the President on that subject. This invitation was, it seems, immediately complied with, and after fifteen days of close conference between the Governors of the States and the members of the Cabinet, it was decided that the salvation of the country required the arming of the slaves, and that a call of 400,000 blacks, one from every eight inhabitants, should take place forthwith. Outside of military and social considerations, the importance of which cannot be fully estimated now, one of the motives which urged the adoption of this measure is, I understand, the effect it is likely to have upon European Powers. While the discussion on the measure was going on, a member of the Cabinet removed all the objections raised by stating that the enlistment of the blacks in the Confederate ranks, and the gift of their freedom and a portion of land as their reward for their services, would cause the great majority of the European people adverse to slavery to become friends of the South, and force their Governments to interest themselves in its behalf. It would at the same time show that the black, who had been represented as the enemy of his master, was in reality his friend; and the greatest mark of this friendship was to be found in the confidence the white man has in the obedience and fidelity of the black, who by this call was suddenly elevated to a position of trust and confidence unparalleled in the history of the world. All these considerations could not fail, it was said, to engage the attention of the European public, and to place the Southern Confederacy upon higher political and moral ground. It was these remarks, I am told, which destroyed all opposition, and led to the unanimous adoption of the measure. The proceedings I have just related have been kept secret, and will not be divulged until Jefferson Davis's proclamation submitting the whole matter to the whole people is issued.

The blockade at Wilmington, it seems, by a report from a conscript, is of no avail. Seventeen vessels have recently entered that port with immense supplies for the Confederate army; consisting of thousands of arms, shoes, clothing, and other materials for the comfort of the Southern troops. Locomotives and railroad iron have been supplied, too, in large quantities.—New York Paper.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, September 16.

The Money Market still remains in a very firm condition, and the demand for discount accommodation both at the Bank and in the open market continues very pressing. At one period during the week there was a slight relaxation in the inquiries, and the terms were slightly easier; but it was only temporarily, and to-day scarcely anything has been done under the Bank minimum. It is considered that the present demand is likely to prove only of short duration, and arises from exceptional circumstances, consequently there is no apprehension entertained at present of the rate being advanced. The Joint Stock Banks are disposing of their resources very reservedly, and do not part with anything under 3½ to 3¾ per cent. On the Stock Exchange money is in considerable demand owing to the settlements, and short loans on Government Securities are not negotiated under 4 per cent. The payment of the dividends in October may make some change; but it is not now very generally believed that the value of money will experience any permanent reduction. A good business in most departments is looked forward to through the winter months.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The total amount of gold sent into the Bank of England this week, including £54,000 this afternoon, is £223,000, and there have not been any withdrawals. The arrivals of bullion reach £362,413, of which £89,020 only is from America, the remainder being from the West Indies and the west coast of Africa. Of the £271,341 from the West Indies, £142,518 was in gold and £128,823 silver. There have not been any operations in bar silver, which remains nominally as before. The inquiry for Mexican dollars has been rather active, and those brought by the previous mail have now been disposed of for China, at 63½d. per oz., being an advance of ½d. on the price formerly realised, but transactions had been effected in the interval at 63½d. and also at the present rate. The dollars by the last mail are still for disposal. The India Mail takes out to Bombay £448,350, of which £122,500 is gold, and £323,850 silver. About £2,000 in gold also goes to Alexandria. Advances from Australia notify the departure of 121,312 oz. of gold, valued at £485,248. Of this 43,500 oz. are by the Roxburgh Castle, which sailed on the 27th June; 45,022 oz. by the Wave of Life, sailed on the 6th July, and 32,790 oz. by the Wellesley, which sailed on the 16th July. The Anglesca, with £145,000 gold on board, previously reported, is still at sea.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 3,000,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were—to Calcutta 1,635,000 rupees, and to Madras 165,000 rupees. The minimum price was declared to be 1s. 11½d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1s. 11½d. on Bombay, being a reduction of ½d. in the case of Madras. The applications within the limits amounted to 223 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta at 1s. 11½d. will receive about 6 per cent.; on Bombay at 2s. about 87 per cent. All above these prices, and all tenders on Madras, will receive in full.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English Stock Market has not shown much animation, the operators having been more particularly engaged in the settlement of the accounts in Foreign Stocks and Railway Shares. The commencement of the Jewish New Year, which is always kept as a strict holiday, has prevented the attendance of the Hebrew members for two or three days during the week, and which has also tended materially to circumscribe business. Prices, however, continue under the circumstances to be fairly sustained, though they are a fraction lower than this day week, the closing price this evening being 93½ to ¼ for money, and 93½ to ¾ for the account. Exchequer Bills are very steady at par to 3s. prem. In the Foreign Stock Market a very large and animated business has again been transacted in Mexican, Spanish, and Greek securities, but the most important operations have been in Mexican, which have again advanced between 2 and 3 per cent. in consequence of the reported official acceptance of the throne by the Archduke Maximilian, and further that three large French banking-houses have proposed to take the new loan and negotiate it. Spanish have also improved in price, notwithstanding the rumour of a new loan being asked for, from the proceeds of which it is said that arrangements will be made to satisfy outstanding claims. Greek stock has further slightly improved, and Turkish remains very firm. The latest prices were—Greek 37½. Mexican 44½ to ½. Spanish Passives 36½. Do. Certificates 14½ to ½. Turkish Six per Cents. (1854) 95½ to 96. Do. do. 1862, 71½ to ¾.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The transactions in American Government and Railway Securities have been on a more limited scale than for some time past. The successive mails from America during the week having brought news less favourable to the Federal cause, dealers and speculators appear to have become far more cautious with regard to their dealings, and consequently prices have gradually and rather seriously declined. The next mail is now looked for with increased anxiety, and unless there should be adverse intelligence with regard to the Confederate movements, a further retrogression may be anticipated. The dealings have comprised United States Six per Cents. at 75. Virginia State (Six per Cents.), 42. Atlantic and Great Western Railway (New York Section), 80, 79½, and 79½. Do. do. (Pennsylvania Section), 77½, 78, 78½, 79, and 77. Erie Shares, $100 shares, all paid, 85, 84½, 84, 75, 74, 74½, 75½, and 74. Do. do. Seven per Cent. Preference, 74 and 73½. Illinois Central, 85, 86, 81, and 80. Do. do. Seven per Cents., 80 and 80½. Do. do., $100 shares, $90 paid, 5½, 6, 6½, 5½, 6½, 12½, 10½, 11, and 11½ dis. Do. do., all paid, 83, 82½, 83, 82½, 83, 82, 81½, 78, 78½, 77, 77½, 76½, and 77½. New York Central, $100 shares, 94, 93½, 94, and 90. Pennsylvania Central Bonds, second mortgage, 87½.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

There has been only a limited business in this stock during the week, but a marked change has taken place in the tone of the market. The accounts now reaching us from Charleston indicate that the previous report from Federal sources vastly exaggerate the progress of the bombardment, the prospect of success of the expedition being now very much lessened. From 30 to 28 there has been a gradual improvement; the opening quotation this morning was 26 to 24, and throughout the day the market ruled steady, the closing price being 25½ to 24½ firm.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Business in the English Railway Share Market has not been particularly active, the dealers having been chiefly engaged in the arrangement of the half-monthly account. Prices, however, have been fairly maintained, though in some instances, particularly where the traffic receipts do not contrast favourably with previous returns, a decline has taken place. The chief variations have been an improvement of about 1 per cent. in Scottish Midland; of ¼ in Great Northern; and Chatham and Dover; of ½ in Midland and North British; and of ¼ in Metropolitan. On the other hand, there has been a fall of ¾ per cent. in Great Western; of ½ in Brighton, London and North-Western, North Staffordshire, and West Midland (Oxford). There has been a very quiet business transacted in Foreign Railway Shares, and without any material alteration in values. In the Shares of British Possessions the transactions have been on a rather more extended scale, at firm and steady prices.

NEW BANKS.

A formal prospectus has been issued of the Imperial Royal Privileged Bank of Austria, for which preliminary subscriptions were obtained in May last. It is now brought forward by an influential body of directors residing in London and Vienna, who, it is said, have obtained for the establishment an Imperial concession for ninety years, and which confers the privilege of conducting banking operations in all parts of the Austrian Empire. The directors state that they have reason to expect that the Company will become the bankers for several important state departments, besides assisting in the financial arrangements of the Government. The capital is fixed at £2,000,000, in 20,000 shares of £100 each; these however, are convertible at option into five shares of £20 each.—A second Austrian Bank is also in contemplation, but has not yet been officially announced. It is to be called the Anglo-Austrian Bank. The concession, it is understood, will be immediately arranged, and, in addition to the appointment of correspondents, a manager has already been secured. In this case the seat of direction will be in Vienna, but in London the affairs of the Bank, it is said, will be administered by a committee. With regard to these banks, a strong feeling of jealousy appears already to have sprung up, as the solicitors to the latter Company have just given publicity to the following telegram, which they say they have received from the Finance Ministry of the Austrian Government, in reply to an inquiry concerning the former:—"Vienna, Sept. 14th.—Union Bank has no special privileges or arrangements with Government." In reply to this the solicitors to the Union Bank say,—"The Imperial Royal Privileged Union Bank of Austria, so named by the Austrian Government, has obtained its concession for ninety years, and has come before the public in a prospectus every statement of which we are prepared to substantiate;" and so the matter rests, pending further explanations.—It is stated that information has been received in London of the final confirmation and signature of the Emperor of Russia to the concession for the establishment of an English and Russian Bank. The concession gives the privilege of carrying on banking business (with such branches as the directors may at any time consider advisable) in any part of the Russian Empire for an unlimited period. This undertaking was brought forward in a preliminary form some time ago, and a considerable amount of the capital is stated to have been already subscribed.

BANK MEETINGS.

At the usual half-yearly Court of the proprietors of the Bank of England, R. D. Hodgson, the Governor, stated that the net profits of the establishment for the half-year ending the 31st August were £669,208, making the amount of "rest" on that day £3,671,505. The Court therefore proposed that a dividend of £4 10s. per cent. for the half-year be declared, without deduction on account of income-tax, after the payment of which the "rest" would stand at £3,016,620. A proprietor thought the dividend ought to be larger, considering the distributions made by some of the Joint Stock Banks, which amounted in some instances to between 17 and 20 per cent. The Governor having given a satisfactory explanation, the dividend, which was 6s. more than that declared in March last, was unanimously agreed to.—At the first ordinary general meeting of the shareholders in the Union Bank of England and France, a series of resolutions were agreed to, authorizing the amalgamation of the Bank with that of the English, Belgian, and Netherlands Bank. In making the proposal, the Chairman (Mr. Colchester) said that their business had so materially improved in many of the countries of Europe that they required a larger capital to conduct the business that was flowing in. At the same time the new company had not only brought them an accession of influential directors, but had also brought them an additional million of capital. It was also agreed that the ordinary meeting of the Bank should be postponed till the 13th October, as in consequence of the proposed amalgamation they had deferred making out their balance-sheet till the 31st August, and they had not yet been able to get in their accounts from all their correspondents. The new title is to be the European Bank.—The meeting of the English, Belgian, and Netherlands Bank was held to-day for the purpose of passing resolutions for the amalgamation above referred to. It was stated that, as the two establishments were to have operated in the same field, the necessary expenses that would be saved would amount to about £5,000 at the outset, and £10,000 a-year afterwards. The expenses incurred by the English, Belgian, and Netherlands Bank amounted to £5,000.—The directors of the Bank of Australasia have notified that a half-yearly dividend of 24s. per share, with a bonus of 32s. per share, being together at the rate of 14 per cent. per annum, will be paid to the proprietors of the old share capital on and after the 13th October.—The directors of the Ionian Bank have declared a dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, with a bonus of 7s. 6d. per share for the half-year ending the 30th June last.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

A Company has just been projected for the purpose of purchasing the celebrated Star and Garter Hotel at Richmond, and converting it into a Joint Stock Hotel. The directorate is most respectably constituted, Lord de Tabley being the Chairman. The proposed capital is £120,000, in 12,000 shares of £10 each.—The prospectus has also been issued of the Patent Lubricating Oil and Grease Company, with a capital of £60,000, in 6,000 shares of £10 each. The directors, it appears, have made a preliminary contract for the purchase of certain patents, some valuable works, plant, &c.; and on the enlargement of these works contracts to any extent may be immediately entered into.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The extension of business in some kinds of American produce noticed in our last has not progressed, and we have this week to report a dull trade generally, but without any perceptible change in quotations. In nearly all cases deliveries continue to go on very satisfactorily. The cotton market is still an exception to the general quiet, more or less excitement having prevailed in this department from the commencement to the close, and with sales averaging 20,000 bales a day prices are again 1d. per lb. higher. A favourable change in the weather, and a consequent resumption of activity in securing the harvest, has checked the buoyancy in the grain market, and sales could not now be effected except at 1s. to 2s. decline upon the currency of the previous week. In American provisions this demand is confined chiefly to boneless middles, which, at 30s. to 32s., are taken somewhat freely for export. Of American butter there is little or none here, and quotations are merely nominal. Fine American lard is saleable in moderate quantity at 40s. per cwt. The demand for petroleum has subsided, the market closing flat for both crude and refined. On the former the recent advance has been almost entirely lost, and the latter is about 1d. per gallon lower, the last sales being at 2s. 6d. to 2s. 7d. for American on the spot. The nominal quotation of American spirits of turpentine is unaltered, but the price of French has advanced considerably, owing partly to bear speculators having over-sold, and being therefore compelled to come upon the market as buyers to meet outstanding engagements. This afternoon, business was done at 80s. per cwt. The price, but a short time back, was 67s. No quotable change has occurred in sperm oil, for which there continues to be but a limited inquiry. The buoyancy with which the tallow market closed at the time of our last report has given place to dullness, with a tendency to depression. Prices have not, however, graduated down more than 6d. per cwt., and if there is not much disposition to buy, there is as little to sell at the reduction. In American descriptions the variation is even more trifling. The tobacco trade, without being active, is steady. Purchases are made only to supply immediate orders; but holders are firm, and in what is passing late rates are current. Fine American rosin is scarce and in demand, with an upward tendency in value. In drugs there is scarcely any variation worth naming. Tartars are firmer. Aloes fully support the recent advance. Camphor, in the absence of business, remains nominally as before. Dye-stuffs generally are firm but inactive. Bengal turmeric still sells at 35s. to 34s. per cwt. Business has been done in Kowrie gum at 45s. for scraped. Some parcels of cutch from the United States have this week been sold at 24s. to 25s. This market during the last day or two has been rather weaker. The advance on iron, both raw and manufactured, progresses. Scotch pig has further risen 1s. per ton, and bars in proportion. Tin is also firmer.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, September 16.

The Liverpool Cotton Market has exhibited a scene of wild excitement throughout the week. The sales have been enormous, and prices have continually and rapidly advanced. This is, doubtless, to be in a great measure attributed to the more satisfactory news received from America with regard to the Confederate cause, particularly to the unsuccessful attempt on the part of the Federals to capture Fort Sumter, and consequently the failure of that dearly cherished object, the possession of Charleston. In all private circles in Liverpool a strong feeling prevails on the subject, and the most intense desire continues to be manifested for further intelligence. Although the above must be attributed the main cause of the excitement in the market, still there are other causes which are exerting considerable influence, for instance the improved state of trade at Manchester, the reported freeing of a large number of slaves in the Southern States, and the jeopardy in which the Egyptian crop of cotton is placed by the unusual height of the Nile. Many of the brokers, however, allege that the excited state of the market is entirely owing to the firm conviction entertained amongst buyers that the war will be protracted for a very long time; on the other hand, however, it is stated that the excitement is merely caused by some very large orders received from Manchester, and not influenced by the late news. The sales this week have reached 110,000 bales, of which 65,000 have been taken on speculation and for export. The total sales during the present year have been 1,691,890 bales, against in the same period in 1862, 2,193,320 bales. The imports this week have been 37,371 bales; total this year, 1,058,183 bales; same period last year, 712,111 bales. This year there have been exported 317,640 bales, against 323,891 bales in 1862. The present computed stocks 207,610 bales, at the same period last year 76,760 bales. There have been taken for consumption this year 922,300 bales, and to the same period last year 934,400 bales. Generally prices have advanced during the week fully 2d. per lb.; the latest quotations are—Middling Orleans, 27d. to 27½d.; do. Mobile, 26d. to 27d.; do. Uplands, 26d. to 27d.; Surat, 15d. to 22½d.; Egyptian, 26d. to 27½d.; Pernambuco, 27d. to 28d.; Bahia and Maceio 25d. to 25½d.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, September 15.

The past week has been one of excitement in our yarn and cloth market, and a very large business in both staples has been done at daily advancing prices.

Mule yarns in bundle, also twist and pin-cops, up to No. 50s, have advanced in the week as much as 1½d. per lb.; whilst Bolton spinings, from No. 60s upwards, are held for as much as 3d. per lb. advance; which advance is about equivalent to the rise in Egyptian cotton, from which this class of yarn is spun.

32s. twist has at least reached 2s. 6d. per lb.—the highest point attained last year; but manufacturers who use this are in a much better position than at that time—as they are now well under contract, making goods at prices which will pay them.

Goods of all kinds advance in price to about the same extent as the yarns from which they are made, and stocks in producers hands are nil.

Advices from our foreign markets report an increasing demand which will shortly overstep production.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLLY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

As was foreshadowed in the private letter from Richmond which we published last week, the Confederate Government has decided to withdraw its diplomatic representative from this country. We give elsewhere the text of the letter to Earl Russell, in which Mr. Mason announces his withdrawal. From this it appears that the order of recall bears date of the 4th ultimo. It has therefore no reference whatever to recent military events. The step is, in fact, simply an assertion of national dignity and self-respect, rendered necessary by the systematic discourtesy of the head of the Foreign Office towards the representative, albeit not officially recognised, of a proud and sensitive people—a discourtesy which the Confederate Government is blamed at home for not having resented much earlier. The want of tact which refused the cheap tribute of common civility to the representative of a Power which commands armies greater than those of a first-rate European monarchy, and which for over two years has maintained with at least an even balance of success one of the most memorable and gigantic struggles in history: such a want of tact—especially when the representative is a man who, from his position as a distinguished American, for many years the Senator in the United States Congress from the Ancient Commonwealth of Virginia and Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations of the American Union, was surely entitled to no less consideration than is freely accorded to the emissaries of the Polish insurrection—is wholly inexplicable. The Anglo-Yankee press will, of course, affect to ascribe the withdrawal of Mr. Mason to pique at the refusal of this Government to recognise the Confederate States; but that this is not the motive, though a just subject of complaint, is proved by the fact that a similar course was not thought necessary in the case of the Confederate representative near the French Court. For the honour of this country, however, it is to be hoped that Earl Russell will not improve the occasion to take credit to himself, and make capital with Mr. Adams and the "friendly Power" enthroned at Washington.

On the 5th instant Wagner and Gregg were again furiously bombarded by the Federal land batteries and fleet. The enemy might as well have fired into the sea. Next day Morris Island was evacuated by the Confederates, but not on account of the bombardment. The Federals had advanced their sappers to the moat of Wagner, and it was therefore impossible to hold it. The garrison withdrew in forty barges, one of which, containing twelve men, was captured. General Gilmore himself testifies to the uselessness of the bombardment. In his despatch to General Halleck he says, "Fort Wagner is a work of the most formidable kind. It is bomb-proof, and is capable of holding 1,800 men. It remains intact, after the most terrible bombardment to which any work was ever subjected." General Gilmore adds, "We have captured nineteen pieces of artillery, and a large supply of excellent ammunition;" but he omits to mention the trifling circumstance of the guns being spiked, and we think that the nineteen should be nine.

The possession of Morris Island, and consequently of Battery Gregg and Cumming's Point, gives the Federals the opportunity of bombarding the city of Charleston, but this triumph of the enemy is by no means the end of the struggle. Even the Northerners are constrained to admit that their fleet must now advance in the face of formidable batteries and dangerous water obstructions. The Southerners are confident that Charleston will be held in spite of the loss of Morris Island and the probable loss of Sumter. Nor are they without warrant for this anticipation. Aided by the army, the fleet has done nothing except destroy the brickwork of Sumter, but on the other hand it has been damaged by the Confederate fire. Will it fare better when it is alone? Hitherto it has been out of range of a concentrated fire, but so soon as it is within the harbour it will be within range of a bombardment compared to which the fire of Sumter was a bagatelle. We hear, too, that the heavy artillery, of which we announced the arrival in the Confederacy in our last issue, is at Charleston and in position. We do not assert that the defences of Charleston are impregnable or that the monitors will not succeed; but it is certain that the problem is not solved by the evacuation of Morris Island, and that if Charleston is taken it will be at a cost of blood and treasure that will tell upon the resources of the North.

Singularly enough, Sumter, which, by the way, commands Cumming's Point and Wagner, was at the last date, still in the possession of the Confederates. Admiral Dahlgreen had demanded its immediate surrender. Major Elliott, commanding at Sumter, had replied, by order of General Beauregard, that Admiral Dahlgreen can have Sumter when he takes and holds it, and that in the meantime such demands are puerile and unbecoming. Upon this the fleet again opened fire upon Sumter, to which the batteries on Sullivan's Island replied. The bombardment was ineffectual. On the night of the 8th an attempt was made to take Sumter by assault. The Federals were repulsed with the loss of sixty men, including seven officers. This is the Northern version of the affair. It must be exceedingly annoying that a fort which the Federals knocked to pieces a few weeks since, should be repaired and again an obstacle to their advance.

The latest Southern advices from Chattanooga are to the 5th instant, at which date, beyond an artillery duel of half-an-hour's duration, there had been no military operations. According to Northern reports, which seem to be reliable, the Confederates evacuated the place on the 8th and the Federal General, Crittenden, took possession of it the next day. The reported capture of 2,000 Confederates and 14 cannon at Cumberland Gap is, we believe, a "Halleck" capture. The evacuation of Little Rock, Arkansas, needs confirmation. According to the Atlanta Appeal, General Price had an engagement with the Federals, fifteen miles below Little Rock, and was victorious.

The rest of the war news is unimportant. General Burnside occupied Knoxville, Tennessee, on the 5th, but no military advantage accrues to him from holding it. A party of the 6th Ohio Cavalry returning from a reconnaissance, fell into an ambuscade near the Rappahannock and lost 30 men. A skirmish took place on the 3rd at Diamond Gap, in which Colonel Morrison, of the 1st Georgia Cavalry, succeeded in repulsing the Federals.

In his official report of his operations in Tennessee General Rosecrans states that his captures were 59 commissioned officers, 1,575 non-commissioned officers and privates, 3 rifled siege guns, many small arms, 89 tents, 89 flags, and 3,500 sacks of corn and meal; and that his total losses were 85 men killed, 462 wounded, and 13 missing. Well, General Rosecrans is fortunate. He did not lose a flag, or tent, or gun, or even a rifle! His despatch will perplex any Colenso who may, generations hence, undertake to criticise the history of the Second War of Independence in America. According to Federal accounts their army is four times as numerous as the Confederate army, and now we learn from General Rosecrans that the Federals capture 125 men for one capture of the enemy. How, with such superiority, the Confederates are not captured and killed, is a marvel that will discredit the veracious despatches of the Northern commanders. From the small number of deaths—85—the inference is inevitable, that so far from a man risking his life by going into the army, the Federal army is the place to enjoy long life and immunity from disease. Of course, in giving his "total" loss, such a frank person as General Rosecrans would have told us if any of his men had died from sickness.

We ought to mention that the gallant General Schenck has gained a victory in Maryland. He has arrested and sent into the Confederate lines the editors and proprietors of the Baltimore Republican for publishing a piece of poetry, entitled "The Southern Cross."

On the 25th of November last, Mr. Fernando Wood heard, upon what he deemed good authority, "that the Southern States would send representatives to the next Congress provided that a full and general amnesty would permit them to do so." Mr. Wood must have been exceedingly sanguine to place any reliance on a palpable fiction, and which was probably a thought founded on the hearty wish of some staunch Democrat; but, doing so, he was right in seeking to bring it before the Federal authorities. He addressed himself to Major Opdyke, telling him the good news, and requesting him to communicate it to the Administration. Mr. Opdyke, who is an ultra War-Republican and a large government contractor, must have been disgusted and annoyed at the intimation, and he determined to repay his informant's frankness by a trick in which there was a little low cunning backed up by an unmitigated falsehood. He promised Mr. Wood that he would communicate the matter to some New England senators, who were then in New York on their way to Washington. Mr. Wood waited for an answer till the 8th December, when Mr. Opdyke coolly told him that he had not seen the New England senators and that he had not made the proposition. Mr. Wood then wrote to President Lincoln, beseeching him to proclaim an amnesty, or at least an armistice, until by an unofficial correspondence it could be ascertained whether or not the South was willing to come back into the Union. Mr. Lincoln replied on the 12th December, 1st, that he did not believe Mr. Wood's report; 2nd, that an amnesty would be granted "within a reasonable time," if it would lead to the submission of the South; 3rd, that his merciful intention ought not to be communicated to the Southern States, either formally or informally; 4th, that he will not suspend his military operations; and, 5th, that Mr. Wood's information "might be more valuable before the 1st January than afterwards;" from which we suppose he meant that after January 1st, 1863, the gates of mercy were to be closed against the Southern States, even though they repented in sackcloth and ashes. Mr. Wood wrote another letter to Mr. Lincoln, in which the arguments in favour of a suspension of military operations are recapitulated, and in which Mr. Lincoln is reminded that even if the Southern States wish to return to the Union they cannot do so unless an opportunity is afforded them, and that "it cannot be expected that the Southern people will cease resistance so long as we proclaim our intention to destroy their local institutions, their property, and their lives, and accompany the declaration with corresponding legislative, executive, social, and political action." So closes a correspondence, from which Mr. Fernando Wood must have learnt, if he did not know it before, that the war which was inaugurated to make the restitution of the constitutional Union utterly impossible, was being carried on for conquest and not for reconstruction; and we dare say he has by this time further learnt, that the Republican party is not only essaying to subdue the South, but also to build up their own power upon the ruins of the Northern democracy.

A person signing himself John G. Winter, of Georgia, (where, as in Alabama, that surname is most unfavourably known in connection with a certain very 'cute Yankee swindle, remembered by the sufferers as the St. Mary's Bank), has written to the Morning Star, claiming the recent election of Mr. Watt to the Governorship of Alabama as evidence of disaffection in that State to the Confederate Government. Without entering into the political antecedents of the Governor elect—which conclusively refute any such misconception of his present position—it is sufficient, to expose the shallowness of the trick with which the Federal partisans endeavour to deceive the English public, and the shamelessness of the falsehoods to which they resort, to mention that the Hon. Thomas H. Watts, of Montgomery, Alabama, was at the time of his election, and is still, a member of President Davis's Cabinet, in which he has, ever since Mr. Randolph's appointment as Secretary of War, held the distinguished and important position of Attorney-General, the chief law adviser of the Government, and equivalent to what in continental countries is styled the "Minister of Justice."

We have in our last impression exposed a similar attempt of fraud on the part of the Yankee and Anglo-Yankee press, based upon the exceptional disloyalty of an obscure newspaper in North Carolina, too insignificant to provoke a violation of the fundamental principle of Confederate policy, absolute freedom of the press and of speech. To the resolutions, which we then published, of the various North Carolina Regiments in the Confederate service, we might to-day add a great number of others, showing, were such proof necessary, the spontaneous indignation and the unanimous loyalty of the North Carolina soldiers, wherever stationed for the defence of the common country of all Southerners. Governor Vance, whose name has been most unjustifiably dragged in to give consistency to these slanders against the gallant "Old North State," we have already on a previous occasion vindicated with his own words, copied from a recent letter of instructions to his representative and agent in London.

The report of General Pemberton's death, said by the Northern papers to have been caused by his own soldiers, turns out, as we expected at the time, one of the many sensation canards. A court-martial, called at the General's own request to inquire into the circumstances of the surrender of Vicksburg, was to meet on the 20th instant at Montgomery, Alabama.

Two official Federal documents on that well-worn text, "Mexico and the Monroe Doctrine," have been lately published. The one is a circular dated December 20th, 1860, from Mr. McLane, United States Minister in Mexico, to the representatives of European Powers in that country. Mr. McLane describes the Mexicans as being divided into two parties: the Liberals, who are for a Constitution "that guarantees political equality to every citizen," and the Conservatives, who are opposed to such equality. He declares that the United States approve of the foreign policy of the Liberals, which is antagonistic to any intervention; and he warns Great Britain, France, and Spain, and the other European Powers, that the United States are "determined to resist any forcible attempt to impose a particular adjustment of the existing conflict against the will and sanction of the people of Mexico, and also any forcible intervention by any Power which looks to the control of the political destiny thereof." Mr. McLane adds insolently, that "the Government of the United States does not deny to the European Powers the right to wage honourable warfare, for a sufficient cause, anywhere, or against any nation; nor does it deny their right to demand redress for injuries inflicted on their respective subjects, and, if need be, to enforce such demand; but it does deny them the right to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the political independence of the Republic of Mexico, and it will, to the extent of its power, defend the nationality and independence of the said Republic."

The other document is a despatch from Mr. J. L. Motley, United States' Minister in Austria, to Mr. Seward. It is dated Vienna, February 12, 1862. Mr. Motley called at the Foreign Office and had an interview with Count

Rechberg. Mr. Motley "spoke of the recent victory of the national troops near Somerset, Kentucky," and dilated on the insurrection being surrounded and crushed on land, "even as it had been already shut off from the sea by a stringent blockade along three thousand miles of coast." We are not surprised that after this the Count "observed spontaneously" that he and his Government were sure the United States would win. The Austrian was too polite, by silence or coldness, to let the inexperienced diplomatist suppose he did not believe him. The little matter of the "rebellion" being thus pleasantly disposed of, Mr. Motley, in rather an eccentric manner, turned the conversation on Mexico. "I observed that perhaps it might hardly seem fitting that anything should be said between us just now about the Mexican matter." So far from desiring to avoid the subject, the spontaneous Count said, "I am quite ready." Having sought and obtained permission to speak, Mr. Motley writes, "I then replied that I had nothing to say on the subject at present." Despite this odd announcement, he did, to borrow from Sam Weller, "get a-talking." Mr. Motley had previously, in a private letter, informed his Government that the Archduke Maximilian was a candidate for the throne of Mexico, and he now determined to terrify Austria from entertaining the project. The Count said, "The three maritime Powers had made an expedition to Mexico. We have nothing to do with it, and intend to have nothing. Should the result of the enterprise be to establish a stronger government in Mexico—a monarchy—it will then be for the Austrian Government to consider whether sufficient guarantees of various sorts as to its stability can be offered in order to induce an archduke of our imperial house to make the great sacrifice of mounting its throne." This was frank, and seems rather to have disconcerted the United States minister; for he writes, "I made no reply to Count Rechberg's observations." However, being asked if there would be opposition to the scheme in the United States: he, not perceiving that the spontaneous Count was poking his fun at him, delivered, "as a private person, not officially," rather a well composed lecture on the Monroe doctrine, the Count merely spurring him on by asking, "if the monarchical form of government was considered so objectionable in America?" Mr. Motley, in the course of his lecture, said he could not believe "that the enlightened Powers of France, England, and Spain intended the perpetration of a crime, and it seemed to him improbable that the end proposed could be accomplished except by crime," and spouted a great deal more of what his countrymen call Monroe bunkum. Mr. Motley has lived to see the crime perpetrated, and that the spontaneous Count was not instructed or terrified by his lecture.

We invite attention to our Richmond correspondent's remarks on retaliation. According to this well-informed authority, no instance has ever occurred in the Confederacy of a negro soldier, or an officer commanding negroes, being treated otherwise than a prisoner of war; though a distinction is made by the authorities between Southern slaves impressed into the Federal service and free negroes born at the North who are captured in arms.

Under the extension recently given to the Conscription Act by President Davis, all the able-bodied clerks of the various Government departments (who have ever since the removal of the Capitol to Richmond been formed into a brigade and subject to daily drill,) are sent into the field. Their places are taken by females and invalid soldiers.

Mr. Memminger, the Confederate Secretary of the Treasury, has addressed a letter to Senator Hunter relative to the currency, the text of which will be found in another part of our impression. On the 8th August, 1863, the total amount of currency notes issued was $452,979,806, and of this about $150,000,000 was beyond the Mississippi. The total amount of bonds into which currency had been funded was at the same date $317,846,670. Estimating the circulation that the Confederacy can bear at $150,000,000, this statement shows that the currency is three times that amount; but whilst the value of the currency has been increased three-fold, its proportion to the price of gold is more than six-fold; and this, as Mr. Memminger observes, shows the fallacy of estimating the value of the currency by a comparison with gold. The precious metal, owing to the blockade and consequent suspension of foreign trade, has become as much a commercial commodity as tin, and it obtains a fancy price, not because the Confederacy has not the means to buy gold at a lower rate, but because the supply is artificially cut off. Mr. Memminger says the excess of new issues will be kept down by taxes and the sale of cotton bonds, and that the payment of the tax in kind for the support of the army will further aid in restoring the currency to a sound condition. He also suggests other means for remedying the present inflation.

As our readers are aware, Chattanooga was, when shelled, without warning, crowded with private citizens, women, and children, and the numerous hospitals were thronged with the sick; but probably our readers are not aware of the precise moment the savage foe selected for the attack. The 21st of August was the day set apart for humiliation and prayer. The various places of worship were crowded with eager and earnest congregations. The services in the Presbyterian Church were being held by the Rev. Dr. Palmer, of New Orleans. The first prayer was over, a hymn had been sung, and Dr. Palmer had commenced the long prayer, when the congregation was startled by the report of cannon. We learn from the Chattanooga Rebel that the Doctor continued his devotions; "it was the long prayer and he did not shorten it; he prayed it to the end, and the cannon did not drown it from those who listened, as they could not drown it from the ear of God." We are glad to add that the Federal commander was disappointed in his fiendish purpose. His shells did not fall in the midst of the congregations, and but few persons were injured by them.

Mr. Lincoln requires an army to guard his recruits, and will have to furnish new recruits for those he shoots down en route for camp. The 33rd New Jersey Regiment having, by means of large bounties, nearly been filled up, was under marching orders. The desertions were so numerous that the colonel had to apply to General Dix for a guard to maintain discipline. This guard was not effective, as it refused to fire on the deserters. The 3rd Vermont Regiment was then given the charge of the 33rd New Jersey, and commenced operations by killing three and wounding several others. The regiment was marched to the wharf, where three more men were shot. Under these circumstances the 33rd New Jersey was disarmed. There has also been a collision in Illinois between some soldiers and deserters aided by citizens.

Mr. Charles Sumner, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, has been denouncing England and France at the Cooper Institute, amidst loud applause from "the most numerous audience that ever assembled in New York." He declared that Earl Russell's treatment of the Federal Government, since the commencement of the war, had been unfriendly, and his correspondence had been curt, captious, and cynical. The noble lord may think this surprising ingratitude, but it seems to us the very natural result of cringing to Yankee bullying. Just as red makes a bull savage, so showing the white feather makes the Yankee aggressive. In connection with this, we invite attention to an article which we have quoted from the Times.

The Federals often boast of getting news from deserters from the Confederate army, but a dodge has just been discovered which rather discredits information so obtained. It appears that "substitutes" have been deserting from the Federal army, dressing themselves up to look like "rebels"—that is, so far as uniform is concerned—and then throwing themselves in the way of Federal scouts and giving themselves up as deserters from the Confederate service, of which they give most doleful accounts. The next step was to take the oath of allegiance to Mr. Lincoln and then to be sent North at the public expense.

A Boston paper says, "The demand for rifled cannon is so great that the foundries of this country are unable to supply them, and extensive orders are sent to Europe. The State of Massachusetts alone has ordered seventy from abroad." We are not surprised to learn from the Times (City article, September 23rd) that our merchants do not appreciate the neutrality which insists that "the Confederates may be shot down by English-made cannon, but the Federals must not have their cotton and tea seized by English-built ships."

The Northern press is now obliged to confess that instead of the South suffering from famine the Southern harvest is wonderfully abundant. The Baltimore correspondent of the New York Herald estimates the quantity of wheat harvested in the South at 59,689,500 bushels, whilst in 1860 it was 31,366,894 bushels.

We see by the Brownsville Flag (Texas), that, by order of General Bee, after the 30th of July all cotton in transitu and then north of the Sand Desert was to be directed to Roma or Rio Grande City, and that no cotton from beyond Barton's Rancho, was to be transported to Brownsville. This order was issued in consequence of there being some apprehension of the Federals making a raid on the last-named place.

General Hardee has been placed in immediate command of the army of the Mississippi, under the general supervision of General J. E. Johnston. The post-office at Jackson has again been opened under Confederate authority.

In the second week in August the Confederate States Medical Department, at Charlotte, North Carolina, received a valuable cargo of medical stores from London. This cargo was purchased by the Agent of the Confederate Government. In the lot were 200 cases of amputating instruments.

The Confederate Press Association reports, under date of August 10, that Mrs. Saunderson, of Natchez, has been hanged by the Federals because she refused to disclose the whereabouts of her husband.

The Confederate steamer Georgia has captured the Constitution from New York, and the City of Bath from Callao. The last was ransomed for $20,000.

The Douglas and Breckenridge section of the Democratic party have met at New York and arranged their differences in order to present an united opposition to Mr. Lincoln's administration.

The New York Democratic Convention have resolved that they will support the Government, to restore the Union as it was and the Constitution as it is. But the Government will not have the Union as it was, though it may not object to the Constitution as it is.

ENGLAND.

THE Right Honourable Edward Ellice, M.P., died on Thursday last at Glengarry, at the age of 79 years. This well-known public man was descended from a race of freeholders in the county of Aberdeen. In the middle of the last century his grandfather engaged in business in the Transatlantic States, and his father, on the outbreak of the War of Independence, being a loyalist, removed from the State of New York to Montreal, and there founded the mercantile house of Inglis, Ellice, and Co. At the close of the last century the house in the City of London was established, and the father came to reside in Golden-square, where the deceased gentleman was born. The latter was educated at Winchester School and then at the Scotch University of St. Andrews, turning his attention principally to the study of the moral sciences and modern literature. Afterwards he entered the mercantile business and visited the United States in the year 1803, at which time New York had but 80,000 inhabitants, and Chicago boasted scarcely a single house. As might be expected, Mr. Ellice made the acquaintance of the leading politicians and merchants in the States, and such an acquaintance was extended and strengthened by many subsequent visits, the last of which he made in 1859. His public life in England commenced with early associations with Burdett, Lords King, Radnor, and Althorp, and Sir John Cam Hobhouse. He married the sister of the late Earl Grey, and in 1809 was elected a member of Brookes's Club, on the motion of Earl Jersey. With such friends and associates as these, Mr. Ellice was of course a declared Radical. In 1818 he was elected to the House of Commons as member for Coventry, which town he represented, with a short interlude, to the time of his death. In the first three Parliaments he usually supported the resolutions of Mr. Hume. In 1830 he was made Secretary to the Treasury, and "Whip" of the Liberal side of the House, and he moreover had the principal management of the great election of the First Reformed Parliament. Shortly afterwards he was made Secretary of War under Earl Grey, and resigning that office on the accession of Lord Melbourne in 1834, he never again could be induced to enter official life. He supported Lord Palmerston as Premier, and was not an ardent admirer of Earl Russell. He was most strongly opposed to any further reform of the representative system, and withstood the attempts in this direction of the Russell and Aberdeen Cabinets. He was on intimate terms with the Earl of Derby, the late Sir James Graham, and many members of the Conservative party. He was also the friend of M. Thiers and other French statesmen of the Orleans dynasty. Probably, however, his opinions on the state of affairs in America will be found to be most interesting and instructive. It must be borne in mind that he never kept exclusive American society, that he visited throughout life Americans of all shades of opinion, and that shortly before his death he had been the host on different occasions of Mr. Mason and Mr. Adams. Now, Mr. Ellice had for years asserted that he had outlived the American race of statesmen—that Calhoun, Webster, and Clay were the last of that class. He considered that the intelligent, instructed, and wealthy classes had let fall the reins of power by the concession of universal suffrage, and were utterly unheeded and put to silence by the creatures of the ungovernable caprice of the mob. For years past he had said and written that a political crisis was impending, a contest in the form of civil war between protection and free-trade, between the gentry of the South and the men of the North, between the upholders of the institution of slavery and the emancipators. When the war broke out he declared that it would be of long duration, that practically it was a contest for boundaries between two classes of States, that it would necessitate an inconvertible paper currency, ending in national bankruptcy and grievous suffering, and that the war must be fought out, till it ended in the conquest and ruin or the independence of the Southern people. He through all the chances of war firmly believed that the South would finally be triumphant. Their subjugation, even if it could be brought about, would, in his opinion, be the ruin of both North and South. Lastly, he held that the present revolution was but an example of those which were to follow, and which would split up the Northern continent of America into three or four distinct governments and nations.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, induced by a memorial signed by 1,500 members of the Church of England, has addressed a letter to Viscount Sydney, the Lord Chamberlain, entreating his lordship to restore the time-honoured custom of closing the London theatres in Passion Week. The Lord Chamberlain declines, for reasons which have by him been before explained, to impose on the whole metropolitan theatrical profession restrictions which are imposed upon no other community in London or in any other town of Great Britain or Ireland.

The Royal warrant appointing the Right Rev. Bishop Trower, D.D. (formerly Bishop of the Scottish Episcopal Church at Glasgow), to the see of Gibraltar has passed the Privy Seal and is now at the Crown Office, whence in a few days the letters patent under the Great Seal will issue. A new bishopric is to be founded in Australia, to be called "the Bishopric of Grafton and Arundale," and to be created out of the present diocese of Newcastle. The appointment is, of course, in the gift of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, on the recommendation of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

An attempt is being made to revive the system of Diocesan Synods in the Church of England, the main purpose of such synods being to remove the impassable gulf which at present lies between the bishop and his clergy, and to overcome the obstruction to useful endeavours on the part of the bishop which results from his isolated position. In the rural-deanery of Frant, in Sussex, a meeting of clergy and laity has been held for the purpose of considering the expediency of such revival and the means of carrying it into effect. The Rev. Sir Henry Thompson (rural dean) presided, and Mr. A. J. B. Beresford Hope addressed the meeting. Resolutions were adopted to the effect that it was desirable that diocesan synods, under the presidency of the lord bishop of the diocese, and consisting of clergy and laity, should be periodically assembled, for the purpose of deliberating on all matters affecting the interests of the Church. Copies of the resolutions have been sent to the dignitaries of the Church and several of the Church societies. Petitions are also to be sent to the Bishop of Chichester and to both Houses of Convocation.

The last volume published of the Census of 1861 exhibits some interesting statistics of the married and unmarried population in England and Wales. In the month of April in that year there were found to be 12,032,157 persons—men, women, and children—who had never been married; while 6,917,395 persons were in the married state, and 1,116,672 persons were widowed. The females numbered altogether 10,289,965, being 513,706 more than the males. However, it must be remembered that the soldiers, sailors, and merchant-seamen abroad reach nearly to the number of 200,000. It is satisfactory to find that, though females increase at the rate of barely 13 per cent., yet wives increase at the rate of more than 15 per cent. In fact, the number of married women has increased by nearly half a million in the last ten years. If the calculations be confined to persons in the prime of life, that is, from the age of 20; and not exceeding 40 years, it is found that only 42 men in every 100 are bachelors, and only 39 women in every 100 are spinsters; the corresponding figures in 1851 being 45 and 41 in every 100 respectively. Still, of the persons between the ages of 20 and 40 years, 1,201,576 men and 1,229,051 women were in a state of celibacy. The figures generally show a most undoubted time of prosperity and comfort, and a steady advance in the population.

The company of Captain Macfarlane, of Milang, South Australia, possessed the greatest number of marksmen in the colony in the year 1862. From him, therefore, a challenge has emanated that ten men of his company would shoot a match against ten of the company claim ing similar honours in England. The 1st Company of the Robin Hoods, according to the certificated statement of its commander, Captain Mundella, was selected by Colonel McMurdo to represent England, and the match was shot on their part on the 15th and 16th of September. The ten Robin Hoods obtained permission from Lord Vernon to shoot over his celebrated range at Sudbury, it being a condition of the match that each side should shoot at butts where they had not been accustomed to practise. The distances were from 200 up to 900 yards inclusive, seven rounds per man at each range, and the rifle used was the long Enfield. In spite of a strong wind the shooting was extremely good. The grand total of the score was 1,155, the average being 115.50 per man. The highest score was made at 400 yards' range.

The Channel Fleet has been for some days off Liverpool, and the ships, of course, have been visited by all classes of people from the town and neighbourhood. Luncheons and balls have been given on board several of the ships, and these hospitalities have been amply reciprocated on shore. The Mayor has given a banquet to Admiral Dacres and the officers, and the banquet was followed by a fancy ball. The Royal Mersey Yacht Club have also given a banquet in the Philharmonic Hall. Admiral Dacres has been entertained at dinner by Mr. John Laird, M.P., at the mansion of the latter at Birkenhead.

Nearly one hundred men of the crew of the Confederate ship-of-war the Florida were brought last week by the Paquet de Brest to Cardiff, and thence sent on to Liverpool. Many of them are said to be Irishmen, and all are fine athletic men. They are said to hold prize-bonds for considerable sums, and also to have been the bearers of notes from Captain Maffit to Messrs. Fraser, of Liverpool, stating the amount of wages due to them.

Last week one of the famous steam-rams constructed in the Mersey, and the subject of so much controversy in the field of conjecture, evidence, and international law, was towed out of Messrs. Laird's dock at Birkenhead, and taken into the Morpeth Dock Basin, where the remainder of her fittings will be completed.

Rope-dancing at frightful altitudes and the struggles of the prize-ring are as eagerly sought by the mob as they are solemnly criticised and condemned by the respectable portion of the community. An amusement more brutal has, however, an existence in this country, and enlists among its admirers both the rude and the cultivated classes. That amusement is death by hanging. At Liverpool, some ten days since, four men were hanged on the same gallows, and the mob proved its appreciation of the spectacle by assembling to the number of 100,000 persons. This is surely bad enough, but the question is, whence did this multitude come, and how was it conveyed to the spot? Why, it is affirmed that on the eventful morning an excursion train of thirty carriages arrived from Bradford, and that other excursion trains brought vast crowds from Huddersfield and Blackburn. If this be so, at whose door is the charge of barbarism to be laid? Surely the directors of the railways are the true culprits. These gentlemen would doubtless be horrified at the insinuation that they were present in person; yet they did not for one moment hesitate to convey thither the very persons whom at another time they pretend to humanise and cultivate, for the paltry purpose of putting a few pounds into the pockets of themselves and the shareholders. Perhaps the next time these gentlemen ascend the platform at a social science congress, an emancipation committee, or a missionary meeting, or in any other way assume the character of philanthropists, they will be good enough to recollect the quadruple execution at Liverpool and the excursion trains, and confess that they are not yet qualified to lead and instruct the people.

The Great Northern Meeting at Doncaster has exhibited even more than its accustomed success in company, horses, and weather. Never have such crowds assembled on the Moor, and never have the contests been more exciting in inception, or more satisfactory in results. The races occupied four days of last week, more than thirty struggles of varying interest were decided, and the aggregate number of competitors fell little short of 250. Pre-eminently, however, above the residue of the races, stand four: namely, the Great Yorkshire Handicap, the Great Doncaster St. Leger, the Doncaster Cup, and the Doncaster Stakes. The handicap was won in a canter by Lord Stamford's Dalcibella, a daughter of Voltigeur, against whom at starting the odds of six to one were laid, and who, having been purchased after her victory in the Cesarewitch Stakes at Newmarket in 1860, has only now returned to the speed and excellence which she displayed on that occasion. The race for the St. Leger Stakes, the great event of the meeting, was run on Wednesday, September 16th. This contest is confined to horses and mares of the age of three years. The price of entry is £55 each, and the animals are entered as yearlings. This year there were 204 subscribers, and the net value of the stakes was £4,975. Indeed, the race may fairly be described as the northern and autumnal Derby, and generally the horses which have competed at Epsom here meet again to test their prowess, and to verify or falsify the results of the race for the Derby. On this occasion, however, Macaroni, the winner of the Derby, was not to take part in the struggle, never having been entered for this race. Nineteen horses came to the post, and of these Avenger, the property of Lord Stamford, purchased for an enormous sum as a two-year-old, and the winner of the Prince of Wales Stakes at Ascot last June, was held in high esteem. The Ranger, too, a son of Voltigeur, who won the Grand Prix de Paris in May, beating the French mare La Touques, was backed for large sums of money. So also was Borealis, the daughter of Newminster and the renowned Blink Bonny, winner in her day of both Derby and Oaks. There was also Queen Bertha, having Kingston for her sire, and commanding, by her victory this year for the Oaks, the unbounded confidence of John Scott, the Wizard of the North. But, beyond and above all these, Lord Clifden formed the centre of intense curiosity and wild speculation. This horse, it must be remembered, had been purchased by Lord St. Vincent as a two-year-old for 6,000 guineas, had won all his races in 1862, and having been first favourite for the Derby for more than six months before the race, was beaten on the post by Macaroni by the shortest of heads. Two days after the Derby he only succeeded in beating the wretched Jarnicoton by a head, and shortly afterwards he was transported to Paris, and finished nowhere for the Grand Prix. Immediately there arose against him a host of calumniators, who, forgetting that the horse had suffered severely at Epsom, declared that he was no racehorse at all, and even denominated him "a brute, a camel, an impostor, and a clothes-horse." The whole legion of "touts" surrounded him, and pronounced that he had undergone no preparation for the Leger, that he was as good as dead; the multitude of tipsters advised their followers to bet against him with vigour; his owner was held insane when he accepted the bet of £11,000 to £1,000 against him, and the ring drove him to 25 to 1, offering to bet that he would not start, and that if he did start he would never pass the winning-post. Eventually, however, on the morning of the race he rose to the position of first favourite—3 to 1 being laid against him, while 9 to 2 was laid against the Avenger, 6 to 1 against the Ranger, 7 to 1 against Queen Bertha, and 100 to 7 against Borealis. The race itself was marvellous. When the remaining horses were already in full stride, Lord Clifden was yet at the starting-post; within three-quarters of a mile from the winning-post he was yet more than 100 yards behind; within half a mile from home he had shot to the front with amazing rapidity, and held victory in his grasp. He passed the judge half a length in front of Queen Bertha, winning cleverly and without any violent struggle, the mare being four lengths in advance of Borealis. The shouts of the crowd during the early part of the race were frightful with derision at Lord Clifden and his supporters; and to all present, sportsmen and mere spectators, that he could win after such a start seemed incredible. His performance stamps him as one of the most extraordinary horses that have ever run in England, and for ever silences his detractors. In these columns, in spite of his Derby defeat, he was pronounced a magnificent animal, and it was boldly asserted that had he been well ridden Macaroni could never have defeated him. Lord Clifden is by Newminster, the son of Touchstone, and himself the winner of the St. Leger. The dam of Lord Clifden was the Slave, who was the daughter of Melbourne and Volley, the latter being the daughter of Martha Lynn and thereby sister to Voltigeur. Martha Lynn also bore Eulogy, the mother of Impérieuse, and so she has now to boast that she has been the dam, grand-dam, and great grand-dam of St. Leger winners. By the victory of Lord Clifden, Lord St. Vincent wins, besides the stakes, about £25,000. On Friday, September 18, Macaroni won the Doncaster Cup, defeating Queen Bertha by a length and a-half, and thereby rendered the question of his superiority to Lord Clifden still more debatable. It should, however, be noticed that Queen Bertha must have suffered by her efforts in the St. Leger, and was also jostled heavily in the race. On the same day Lord Clifden defeated Borealis in a "canter" for the Doncaster Stakes, and confirmed the reality of his former victory. Whether Lord Clifden and Macaroni will ever again meet to decide the open controversy as to their respective excellence remains to be seen. Already Lord St. Vincent has made the challenge, offering to run for £1,000 or even £10,000. When the contest does arrive, it will excite as much interest as the grand match between Voltigeur and the Flying Dutchman; and, whatever be the result, it is at least certain that neither the splendid Lord Clifden nor the stout Macaroni will be disgraced by the struggle.

Mr. Forster, M.P., took the chair at an "Emancipation" meeting at Leeds on Monday night. The hon. gentleman's speech was a repetition of his former deliverances on behalf of the North, except that he complimented Earl Russell upon his neutrality—and we may be sure the noble lord's neutrality must be very warm indeed to meet with the approval of such a zealous Anglo-Federal. Mr. Forster endeavoured to slur over the ill-will of the North towards this country by saying that the New York Herald did not represent the public opinion of the United States. The hon. gentleman did not attempt to explain how it is that the New York Herald has the largest circulation, and is more quoted than any other journal in the North, if its policy is not popular. We suppose Mr. Forster reads no other Federal journal except the New York Herald, or he would know that that paper is not singular in abusing England.

A little "Emancipation" meeting was held in London on the same evening at the Craven Chapel, Golden-square. We gather from the report of the Morning Star that a Rev. J. Kennedy said, "The King of Dahomey was tolerated by Providence; and, should a vacancy occur on that throne, he thought they could not do better than have Mr. Craft to fill his place." Mr. Craft, who moved the next resolution, is an Abolitionist, and, for all we know, the Rev. Mr. Kennedy may be right in deeming him a fitting successor to the King of Dahomey, but it was hardly courteous to say so.

Justice in this country is sometimes blind indeed in awarding punishment, if the penalty ought to be proportioned to the offence. Lately newspaper readers were angry at a magistrate sentencing a fellow who had brutally maltreated his sister-in-law to two months' imprisonment. In this case the punishment was inadequately mild, but other cases have lately occurred which show that transgressors of the law are not always so dealt with, and that oftentimes the sentence is inadequately severe. For instance, a man who stole some mushrooms, value one penny, from a field was fined half-a-crown, and, being too poor to pay the fine, was imprisoned fourteen days. Another instance of justice without mercy, nearly as remarkable as the above, is that of a man who purloined a paper-weight, value sixpence, and had to expiate his offence by two months' imprisonment.

THE CONTINENT.

The Archduke Maximilian is reported to have finally accepted the Crown of Mexico. This involves some family arrangements at Vienna. The Constitution of the Empire of Austria enacts that the eldest brother of the reigning Sovereign shall remain at the disposal of the country, to assume the Regency in the eventuality of the Emperor's death. The son of the present Emperor was born on the 21st of August, 1858, and will, consequently, not attain his majority till 1876. Until then his uncle, the Archduke Maximilian, having to be prepared to act as Regent, could not accept any position abroad without some arrangement being made. As, therefore, the Archduke Maximilian accepts the Crown of Mexico, his claims to the Regency are transferred to the Emperor's second brother, the Archduke Charles, who was born in 1833. The Mémorial Diplomatique of the 20th announces that the English Government has cordially concurred in the establishment of the Mexican Monarchy, and agreed to acknowledge and support it. The Mémorial says, "The English Cabinet has acknowledged that in the present state of affairs no proposition offered so many guarantees as that of the Archduke Maximilian. Placed in difficult circumstances at the head of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, this Prince gave the most striking proof of his capacity in the art of governing. He is, it is known, connected with the Royal family of England, and the choice the Mexican nation made in him could not, therefore, be otherwise than agreeable to the Court of St. James's. England has promised henceforth to favour by every means the realization of the loan necessary to place Mexico in a position to fulfil her engagements abroad, and to insure the regularity of the different administrations at home."

The Polish National Government has addressed a letter to Prince Czartoryski, in which the position is elaborately reviewed, and the recognition of the belligerent rights of the Poles insisted on as a just and expedient act. This letter has been published in the Moniteur.

The Polish question is still in statu quo, and will remain so until the return of the Emperor Napoleon to Paris. Some of the French papers are in favour of a solution by the sword; but it is supposed that the Emperor will not act without the concurrence of England and Austria, and that these Powers are not disposed to go beyond diplomatic action. It is rumoured that a joint note will be presented to Russia in answer to the late despatches to the three Powers. Count Rechberg is said to advise that no reply be sent to Prince Gortschakoff's despatch, believing it necessary to await the acts of the Russian Government.

Meantime, several skirmishes are reported, in which the Poles are generally victorious. Massacres, assassinations, and executions are as numerous as ever. An Orsini bomb was thrown from a window at General Berg as he was driving through a suburb of Warsaw. The general escaped, but one of his suite was killed. The house from which the bomb was thrown was sacked by the Russian soldiers.

The Grand Duke Constantine will not return to Warsaw.

The Federal corvette Kearsage is at Brest, repairing her masts and rigging. The France says: "She has been sent with another vessel of war of the same nation in pursuit of the Confederate steamer Florida. The latter will have completed her repairs on Tuesday, and will leave on the following day. She will proceed to meet the second Federal corvette, which is now at Lisbon, and attack her before she can be joined by the one at Brest."

Marshal Forey and M. de Saligny have received the Grand Cross of Our Lady of Guadalupe, and are about to return to France.

Spain has demanded reparation from Morocco for injuries sustained from the Riff tribes. The Emperor of Morocco is said to have declared that he would without displeasure see Spain vigorously chastise the refractory tribes. Spain unless she obtains satisfaction, is prepared to send 10,000 men to Melilla, under the command of the Marquis Novaliches.

The Epoca asserts that the Cabinets of Washington and Madrid have determined to submit the question of jurisdiction within Cuban waters to the arbitration of the King of the Belgians. If so, there can be no doubt about the award, and it is difficult to understand why the Washington Government should have submitted such a question to arbitration.

The Holstein question is again attracting attention. At the last sitting of the Federal Diet the United Committees upon the Holstein question reported in favour of a Federal execution being carried out in that province. The Committees recommend taking possession of the administration of the entire duchy, and the entry of 6,000 Hanoverian and Saxon troops, Austria and Prussia furnishing the reserve. The vote of the Diet upon the report will be taken on the 1st of October next. To this measure Denmark has replied by issuing an order that the regimental lists shall be filled up to war strength by the 1st of October. It is not thought that the Diet will take the extreme step of a Federal execution, since it is likely to involve the intervention of the Western Powers.

The King of the Greeks is in St. Petersburg, and, after visiting his family in Germany, will come to England.

The Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath having protested against the arrest of Deputy Rogawski, who was charged with acting on a secret Polish Committee, as an infringement of members' privileges, he has been set at liberty.

There has been a grand review near Milan, at which the King of Italy was present. His Majesty was enthusiastically cheered by the people.

The case of the editors of the seven Berlin papers has been tried. The accusation was for having excited contempt and hatred against the orders of the authorities by publishing a declaration hostile to the press ordinances. The editors were acquitted.

A GREAT deal of conjecture was lately rife as to the cause of the assembly in Paris of the principal members of the Rothschild family. Some of the Paris papers declare the sole object of their meeting to have been the liquidation of the Naples house. Baron Gustavus Rothschild retires from business with, it is asserted, a fortune of 150,000,000*fr.*, and there are now in Europe but four houses of Rothschilds—in London, Paris, Vienna, and Frankfurt.

LETTERS FROM RICHMOND.

We are going through the "heated term" of our summer, which, as you know, is something fearfully beyond what any Englishman who has not been in the East India service nor made a voyage to the tropics has any idea of—a season of overpowering, demoralising heat, which utterly incapacitates one for any sort of exertion, mental or physical—a time for reading Pickwick in the country, beneath the shade of ancestral trees, with sherry-cobblers at one's elbow, or lying all in the bath and smoking cabanas. The sun pours down upon the hot roofs and baking streets of the city with absolute fury. Such a blaze, if it were possible, over London, would produce a consternation in Ludgate Hill and Cheapside greater than the announcement of a French invasion, and Dr. Cumming would probably conclude that the hour of the Great Tribulation was at hand. Such a chaleur in Paris would depopulate the Boulevards and set the asphalt pavements to running in a hundred little black rills of molten pitch into the Seine. In this terrible heat, we are wholly without the accustomed mitigations, and debarred from the ordinary modes of relief. The Yankees possess the sea-coast, so that salt water and the sea-breeze are out of the question. None of the better class of fashionable watering-places in the mountains are open to visitors. The country all around us, except on the south-west, has been laid waste by the enemy. By far the larger part of our population are therefore under compulsion to remain in town, and so remaining must endure the tropical midsummer temperature as best they may. The sherry-cobbler suggestion is quite impracticable, for there are no lemons and no sherry and no ice. Of the latter I say there is none, by which I mean none within the reach of the deliquescent public, although there are "saloons" where the amateur, who is not fastidious in the matter of French brandy, may get a julep (iced) at the moderate charge of two dollars; and Pizzini, a Corsican restaurateur, who is to Richmond what Gunter is to London and Tortoni to Paris, sells infinitesimal frozen creams and water-ices at one dollar a head. When the warm weather first set in, ice could be bought at ten cents, or a Confederate postage-stamp, per pound; in a fortnight's time it went up to twenty cents, like the leaves of the sibyl, the remainder becoming more and more valuable as the supply was diminished; and now it sells readily for fifty cents, though the pound has melted down to eight ounces before it can be wrapped up in a blanket, and the trade has to be carried on surreptitiously, as the Government impresses all the ice it can lay its hands on for the use of the hospitals. This is eminently proper, of course, and gives rise to no other complaint than this: that the Government by exhibiting a reasonable energy and precaution last winter might have laid up a sufficient supply for all the wants of the sick and wounded soldiers, and left what was secured by private enterprise for the community at large. Oh! when one thinks of these sick and wounded soldiers prostrate upon their beds of pain—poor fellows that have left an arm or a leg on those terrible hills of Gettysburg—when he considers what they have undergone in nights of agony and long watches of loneliness, and remembers with what cheerfulness and courage they have borne it all—he might well write himself down a coward for complaining that his wonted luxuries are denied him, that the summer is hot, and that he cannot go to the Springs!

The intelligence from Charleston gives us good reason to hope that the enemy is as far as ever from the capture of the city. The bombardment of Fort Wagner has been going on at intervals, and the Yankees are engaged in erecting batteries on Morris Island (under a heavy fire from our guns) with which they hope to lay Sumter in ruins. Fort Wagner is said to be stronger than it has been at any previous time, and the trial of strength and resolution is not now between Pemberton and Grant, but between Beauregard and Gilmore—Beauregard the brave and fortunate! Our troops there are in excellent spirits, and the temper of the Charlestonians is that of lofty defiance and indomitable firmness. An order of General Beauregard's has been published and enforced by which all travel into the city has been suspended. A guard is stationed at Branchville, on the Columbia railroad, and no women, children, or non-combatants are permitted to approach nearer to Charleston without special permits from head-quarters. Meanwhile the Yankees are exceedingly boastful of their ultimate success in the reduction of Charleston, and their fleet off the harbour has been so much increased that the port is, for the first time since the establishment of the so-called blockade, effectually closed. Several steamers from Nassau, finding it impracticable to run through the close line of the Federal ships, have returned with their cargoes to that port.

The army of General Lee now lies round about Culpeper Court-house, and the army of General Meade swarms in the counties of Loudoun and Fauquier. A report was in circulation a day or two ago that the Yankees were about making the attempt to occupy our old lines of entrenchment at Hamilton's Crossing, where the first battle of Fredericksburg was fought; but the latest accounts from that quarter, up to this morning, give no confirmation to the idle rumour. The belief is widely entertained that a great battle will be fought between the two armies before many days: a belief based upon the rational supposition that it would be sound policy for General Lee to attack Meade before he is heavily reinforced by the troops that have been withdrawn from Vicksburg. My own belief is that a serious shock of arms will not take place before the 15th or 20th of the month, though it is likely enough that cavalry skirmishes in considerable force may occur at an earlier date. The armies are near enough together for their pickets and foraging parties to encounter each other daily, and it is difficult for any respectable numbers to come together without crossing swords and exchanging shots. Though the army of General Lee has been weakened by the fighting at Gettysburg, it is strong enough to vanquish any force that may be under the command of Meade; and the feeling of every corps, division, brigade, regiment, battalion, and company, is that of assured victory when the trumpets shall sound to the charge.

The riots in New York city having been put down by military force, and intimidation having succeeded in quelling all insubordination elsewhere, the draft is going on throughout the Northern States with greater success than three weeks ago would have been thought possible. The Yankee press teems with paragraphs on the patriotism of the conscripts who waited for compulsion to bring them into the field. The pulpit is not exempted from the relentless lottery, and when we recollect how much it has done to bring on this war and to deepen the hatred of the Northern people towards the South, we must admit that it is reasonable the preachers should now shoulder their muskets. Two sons of the Hon. Edward Everett have been drafted, and we are told that they intend serving in person, as if it were the most magnificent sacrifice ever made in the cause of country, that these shining ornaments of the society of Beacon Street should go forth to imperil their precious lives against the rabble of "the rebellion." Far better men than they rushed to arms from all parts of the South on the first approach of Lincoln's myrmidons—the young promise, the nascent genius, the expectancy and rose of fifteen fair States, and lie buried on a hundred battle-fields between the Chesapeake and the Mississippi. It was even said that the eminent Edward Everett himself, who, as late as the 5th of February, 1861, declared, invoking the name of Heaven, in Faneuil Hall, "that if the Southern States wished to secede they should be permitted to go in peace," had resolved, if the draft fell upon him, to hire no substitute nor pay the $300, but to buckle on his armour and march to the field; though, seeing that the Honourable Edward is on the verge of 70, and therefore not liable to the draft, he might have published this resolution with perfect safety. That the draft is not popular in the North is evident enough, apart from the violent resistance that has been made to it in many quarters, and all manner of pretexts have been resorted to in evading its inexorable demands. Among others, that of proclaiming one's own infamy by certificates of having served out terms of imprisonment in the Northern penitentiaries has become common. It may be thought with some reason that a levy of reluctant raw recruits is not the best mode of filling up armies which are to meet the well-disciplined troops of Lee, Beauregard, Bragg, and Johnston, and that Punch was happy in placing in the mouth of the Yankee conscript the honest warning:—

Don't think I'll volunteer for you to conker the ascendant.
Of them that's as much right as we to flourish independent;
An' ef you press me, understand, you force a man unwilling!
That aint the sort of sojer, quite, for bein' killed and killin'.

But we build no hopes upon the repugnance or contumacy of the new Yankee levies, who will probably be converted by military discipline in two or three months into as good soldiers as any that have ever been brought against Richmond. Our duty is plain. We must consider the raising of the 300,000 men as un fait accompli, and endeavour to meet and overcome them with inferior numbers, as we did the legions of McDowell, McClellan, Burnside, and Hooker.

Speculation on the future of the war by an unmilitary writer is nothing more, perhaps, than blind guess; but if I may be permitted to place on record my own conjectures, I would say that I think the great battle on which the safety of the Confederate capital must ultimately depend will be fought on the old trodden field of the peninsula below the city. There will be another advance of a mighty host along the path of the Young Napoleon, and the plains of the Seven Pines, like those of Manassas, may be made memorable by a second conflict, which will terminate, let us hope, as did the Manassas struggles, in the utter confusion and rout of the enemy.

You will have learned the mischance which has befallen the gallant John Morgan, over whose capture, many times before falsely asserted, the whole North is now jubilant. The strain of pious gratitude in which the fortunate colonel who took him prisoner announces the fact is quite refreshing, and Lincoln might well proclaim a Day of National Thanksgiving over so auspicious a result. The error of our dashing cavalry leader was in supposing that he could traverse 1,500 miles of a densely-populated country, the people of which will fight readily enough for their farm-yards and "plunder," as easily as Grierson went through Mississippi, which had been almost drained of its male citizens, and was sparsely inhabited at the beginning of the war. It is a high compliment to the qualities of John Morgan, and a striking proof of the great terror with which his name had inspired the whole race of Yankees, that not less than 75,000 men were called out in pursuit of him. That such a force should have succeeded in cutting off his retreat will not astonish mankind.

Seven hundred and seventy paroled Confederate prisoners arrived at City Point this morning from Fortress Monroe. With their accustomed inhumanity the Yankees sent back only such as were sick or desperately wounded, in consequence of which nine poor fellows died on the journey, and many others were so ill as to make their removal to Petersburg by rail a matter of great danger. It has been long notorious that the Yankee is "the cutest chap of the universal air" in a swapping match, and their object in returning the wounded and invalid prisoners was twofold: 1st, not to strengthen our ranks by giving up men capable of fighting; and 2nd, to relieve themselves of the trouble of nursing our incapables—reckless, of course, of any consequences that might result from the fatigues of the journey to men so borne down by wounds or disease. But in this instance the Yankee Commissioner gained no advantage over Judge Ould, who will send back tomorrow 780 sick and wounded Yankees from the hospitals in this city. Not a sound Yankee will be given up, though he will not emulate the barbarism of the enemy by sending off men in articulo mortis.

President Davis has issued a Proclamation, a copy of which I enclose, setting apart Friday, the 21st of this month, as a public day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer, in recognition of the chastening hand of Divine Providence so heavily laid upon us in the recent reverses we have sustained.

Burton N. Harrison, Esq., late private secretary of the President, has resigned that office for the purpose of going into the military service.

RICHMOND, August 8.

THE terrible heat, of which I wrote you last week, continues, and the thermometer has not indicated a lower temperature than 82° at any hour of the day or night for twelve days past. The range of the mercury during daylight is between 86° and 96° in shady spots; fatal cases of coup de soleil have occurred on our streets; and the operations in the field have been suspended, as by an informal armistice, till the sun ceases to be an adverse power to both the combatants. Consequently I have little to tell you, which is fortunate, seeing the difficulty which attends writing in such an atmosphere, the demoralisation of the mental faculties, and the physical inconvenience of having the perspiration stream from the hand as the narrative proceeds.

The army of General Lee has fallen back on this side the Rapidan in good order and the finest condition, its right wing extending as far as Marye's Heights at Fredericksburg. Just before this movement was made, a reconnaissance in force was undertaken by the enemy, three brigades having been thrown across the Rappahannock at Kelly's and Beverly's Fords on the 1st inst. The result was a collision with that portion of our advanced guard under the command of Generals Wright and Mahone. The fight was obstinate and protracted, and at first our troops were driven back, but their supports coming up, they pressed the Yankees hard, compelling them to recross the river. The loss on each side was about 100 in killed, wounded, and missing.

On the 5th instant, while the withdrawal of the main body of General Lee's army to the southern bank of the Rapidan was going on, General Stuart, with the view of diverting the enemy's attention, attacked a considerable body of their troops near Brandy Station, and brought on a heavy engagement, in which our loss was less than frequently occurs in a chance combat of cavalry, amounting to not more than six killed and eighteen wounded—while the Yankees suffered severely and were again forced to retire behind the Rappahannock.

On the same day with this very spirited and successful encounter there was a little experiment, in the main satisfactory, made upon the Yankee gunboats in James River by the officers in charge of the submerged defences of Richmond. A fleet, consisting of one iron-clad monitor and two wooden armed steamers, ascended the stream to a point within six or eight miles of Drewry's Bluff and nearly opposite Varina, shelling the woods on shore, when, suddenly, a violent explosion was heard. A mass of water as great as the Athenæum Club-house was lifted into the air, and the foremost gunboat fell into the empty chasm, dashing heavily against the sandy bottom, but immediately afterwards rising to the surface, as the water rushed in to fill the momentary vacuum. The torpedo, of 2,000 pounds of powder, had been discharged just a moment too soon, either from a miscalculation of the position of the vessel, or from nervous excitement on the part of the officer in charge of the galvanic batteries. The gunboat was manifestly very seriously injured, though she had escaped the utter destruction that had awaited these many months the first Yankee craft that should sail over the torpedo—thunder that had slept patiently in its iron cylinder like the geni in the bottle in the "Arabian Nights," and had now burst forth, unhappily not to accomplish all that had been designed for it. The engines of the gunboat refusing to work, she was immediately placed in tow of her companions, and the crippled flotilla slowly made their way back to City Point. At day-break next morning, having stopped during the night below Varina to repair the damages, the flotilla was fired into by a battery of light artillery, which had been moved to a bend in the river known as "Deep Bottom," for that purpose, and again, somewhat later in the morning, at Turkey Island, and all the vessels were more or less disabled. Large pieces of floating timber were picked up in the river. It is supposed that the loss on board the wooden steamers in killed and wounded was considerable. Since the disappearance of this fleet no Yankee vessel has been seen above City Point. Though it is to be regretted that the torpedo did not go off at the right moment, the result of this trial—the first that has been made—of the submerged defences of the capital is highly encouraging, since it establishes both the perfect working of the electric batteries and the immense capacity for destructiveness of the torpedoes.

Since the date of my last letter two most important proclamations or presidential papers have appeared from the chief magistrates of the United and the Confederate States respectively: the address of Jefferson Davis to the soldiers of the Confederacy, and the pronouncement of Abraham Lincoln threatening retaliation should his negro troops captured in the South be treated otherwise than as prisoners of war. Mr. Davis's address is regarded by the enemy as a confession of weakness, and as his last appeal for support to a reluctant fighting class in the hour of extremity; but the language, while it is earnest, is hopeful, and its publication is seasonable when our armies are weakened by the absence or desertion of large numbers of the troops. The amnesty granted by it to those who were held in gaol awaiting their trial for desertion has liberated and sent to the field from the military prisons of this city 1,080 men—enough to make a full regiment. The document of Lincoln, with regard to the treatment of the negroes taken in, battle, is a very difficult one to deal with. It cannot be denied that the whole question of retaliation is seriously perplexed by the recent reverses to our arms and the vast amount of our territory which has been overrun by the enemy. Where the combatants are so unequal in respect of the damage they can inflict upon each other, it is a solemn thing to commence retaliation, even for such savage atrocities as those of Butler and M'Neil, for it may be returned four-fold; and it is this consideration which gives significance to the brutal threat of Lincoln, that he will execute Confederate soldiers for negroes who are hanged or shot. The wretch first instigates the slaves to rebel and tries to incite a servile war; failing in this, he steals or runs off our negroes and puts them in his armies, declaring that we shall treat them as white men. The civilised world, which stood aghast at the effort of Lincoln to light up the flames of domestic insurrection throughout the Confederate States, must have approved the determination of the Confederate Government, set forth in the proclamation of Mr. Davis many months ago, to execute the officers commanding negro brigades, who should be taken prisoners, as murderers, and deal with the negroes as we should see fit. England, certainly, whose authorities in India blew the leaders of the Sepoy insurrection from the mouths of cannon, must have admitted the justice of this resolve; and yet the negroes taken at Fort Wagner, with the officers commanding them, are retained in our military prisons on the exact footing of prisoners of war. In this case, it is true, a distinction is recognised between free negroes recruited in Boston and slaves mustered into service from Southern plantations; but no instance has yet occurred, so far as I know, in which a negro soldier, or the officer commanding him, has been hanged or shot. The hesitation to enforce the lex talionis arises, not from the base motive of fear, but from feelings of the truest humanity, and a natural reluctance to enter upon a course of mutual slaughter, in which the best blood of the country shall drench the scaffold or the parade ground. But the enemy, growing more and more inhuman as their power is extended, have already commenced a system of imprisonments and shootings, in the case of non-combatants, women and children, which must soon result in the raising the black flag. Then, let the responsibility rest on the Christian nations of Europe, which, seeing the inevitable tendency of this struggle, have permitted, may encouraged, the United States to violate all the usages of civilised warfare, and revive in the nineteenth century of our Lord the barbarities which mark the history of the fifth.

In spite of the boasts of the Yankee press, we have reason to believe that the negroes make bad soldiers. At Fort Wagner they gained the parapet in the assault, but they had been previously plied with whisky and they were warned that the white regiments behind them would fire into their ranks at the very first exhibition of cowardice. And yet it is upon the negroes that Lincoln must at last rely to fill up his armies. The draft, which now goes on smoothly in the Northern States, has resulted so far, contrary to all our expectations, in very few conscripts. The Government gets some money, but not more than ten per cent. of the men who are drawn fail to show ground of exemption, and of these ninety per cent. furnish substitutes, who run away at the first opportunity. The negro can show no ground of exemption except physical disability; he cannot pay the $300, he cannot furnish a substitute, and so he is marched off to the receiving camps, a helpless victim to the Government which had offered him freedom. Of the thousands of poor, ignorant, happy creatures who were taken by force or persuasion during the first year of the war from tide-water Virginia and the banks of the Upper Potomac, the immense majority will be compelled to take up arms to fight their former masters, and Exeter Hall itself may well doubt the philanthropy of an emancipation which takes the slave from the tobacco-field and the cotton-field, and sends him, against his will, to the battle-field. Yet this is the hard fate of the luckless contraband, and such is the improvement in his condition which his peculiar friends have brought about! The consequence will be that, if the war lasts five years, these new Chasseurs d'Afrique will be buried under the soil they once tilled, and the race, upon whose properly directed industry in the South the whole world had come to rely for the material of national prosperity, will be exterminated from the face of the American Continent.

The commission for the execution of the monument to Stonewall Jackson has been awarded to Mr. Volk, a young sculptor, till recently employed as a clerk in the Treasury Department. This gentleman has given assurance of his ability to perform the work by very striking and faithful busts of ex-President Tyler, President Davis, General Joseph E. Johnston, and others. He took a cast of Jackson's face after death, and has already produced a study in plaster, which is pronounced an admirable likeness of the original. Mr. Volk has recently sailed for Europe, and, if he escapes the hands of the blockaders, will probably reach London about the time this letter arrives there.

Colonel A. C. Myers, who has discharged the duties of Quarter-master General of the Confederate States since the first organization of the Government at Montgomery, has been relieved of duty in that department. He has been succeeded by Brigadier-General Alexander R. Lawton, of Georgia, late of the army of General Lee.

Among the latest arrivals in Richmond is that of Mr. Soule, who came from Nassau in the last trip of the Margaret and Jessie.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, September 22.
The Paris press has treated no object of interest during the last week. It has been almost entirely filled with the voluminous official documents relating to Poland. From the daily papers your readers have been able to judge of the unfavourable impression they have made here and elsewhere. But if they take the utterances of the Paris press—and they are, for once, almost unanimous in anathematising Russian insolence—for the general feeling of the French nation they will make a great mistake. A friend of mine, holding an important political position, has just returned from a tour in the provinces. He describes the general apathy with which the fate of Poland is regarded, and the universal unwillingness to go to war. The French army is, for the most part, recruited from the agricultural population; a war, therefore, is regarded by the masses, especially a war on such a scale of magnitude, as an unmixed evil. The Government, in times of peace, endeavours to lighten the burthen of the conscription, which is for seven years, by giving furloughs to the soldiers who have served for four years. The reserve is only called out for three months at a time. But a declaration of war is accompanied by a call upon all the military force of France, and every man who has fallen to the conscription is required to join his regiment. Apart, therefore, from the perils to which they are exposed, their parents regard with disgust a measure which deprives the farmstead of its most active hands. The only class in France in which the sentiment of family really exists is the farming class, where all live under the same roof, share the same table, and join in tilling the same fields. The loss, therefore, of a son's labour, which must be replaced by that of a hired servant, makes itself felt not only in the family circle, but in the family budget. It is a mistake to suppose that the passion for gloire exists anywhere but in the writings of literary politicians, and in the love of excitement which military display creates and nourishes in the operative classes of the large towns. The general feeling of the rural population is, at least on the present occasion, largely shared by the commercial and financial classes. Private fortunes are now so intimately connected with the public fortune—thanks to the great loans of the last years, and to the gigantic financial companies which have absorbed such large sums—that whatever is likely to affect the value of these gives at the same time a blow to the interests of each individual. In the higher sphere of politicians the dread of war is not less lively nor less well-grounded. It is only by careful nursing and lucky operations that the public fortune can be placed on a secure basis, and no one has forgotten the panic which, two years ago, followed the announcement of the proportions which the floating debt had then attained—a panic which was only averted by M. Fould's appointment as Finance Minister. The same causes which render the people averse to a war with Russia, render the same classes impatient of the continued status quo in America. The anxieties which attended the Mexican expedition in its outset are now forgotten. With the settlement of a stable monarchical Government a wide field of industry is thrown open, and it is felt that an effective influence is secured in that magnificent region, without the embarrassments which its nearer connection with the Empire might produce. The acknowledgment of the independence of the South is everywhere regarded as the natural corollary to the settlement of Mexico; without the one the other would be precarious; and the benefits to be derived from a well-governed Mexico are as nothing compared with the evils which the prolongation of the American war must produce. Whatever may be the case with the English manufacturers of cotton, the French have discovered that they can look only to America for supplies of the raw material. The manufacturing population of the east and west are therefore equally unanimous in demanding of the Government such measures as shall open this market again. The barbarous war which is waged against the South is not only repugnant to humanity, it is also injurious to the interests of the world. Wherever the Federal armies advance not only are plantations laid waste, cities burnt, and the whole country depopulated, but the stores of cotton which the North has so long been promising to send, instead of being thrown into the market by their advance, are unhesitatingly destroyed. There is not, only therefore daily less chance of new crops being planted and gathered, but even the supplies, for which Europe has so long waited, are daily diminishing. The price will of course rise in proportion, and the value of cotton is above all due to its comparative cheapness. I hear these ideas expressed on every side; but mere ideas, or even facts affecting only a certain class, would not create the feeling which I believe to be now nearly universal in France in favour of some step being taken which shall tend to bring the war to an end. The sufferings which the scarcity of raw material produced in certain districts are now beginning to be felt even in the most distant parts of France. The friend whose remarks I have been using visited, among other parts, the great wine producing countries of Burgundy and the Rhone. He there heard the same complaints, the same hopes, expressed in even stronger language than at Havre or Rouen. France has no Canada into which the infuriated North could pour its hordes, and no one here believes that they have a navy capable of transporting and protecting an army of 30,000 men. It is therefore argued with much plausibility that France is, in a better position than England to take high ground on this question. Now that the Polish controversy is for the present in abeyance, you may expect to see both the provincial and metropolitan press urging these not ungrateful themes on the Government. These are not your correspondent's imaginations, but the remarks of an observer, bound by his position to observe accurately.

The France of Saturday evening had an article on the iron-clads in Liverpool, which points out, in clearer language than I have seen elsewhere, the real position of this knotty controversy. The duty of neutrals is to treat both parties with perfect equality. Supplying contraband of war to either belligerent, it being equally open to the other to procure the same supplies for his money, is a perfectly fair and lawful trade, whether such contraband take the form of gunpowder, gun, or gunboats. But all the stress of the question lies on the word trade.

The builder or merchant who has a legal right to sell the ship, has no right to use it himself as a privateer; he can only be allowed to run the commercial risk. The vessel may be built, but it must not be equipped for war in a neutral port. If Mr. Laird's iron-clads were to be delivered as articles of merchandise in a Confederate port, there would be nothing to say on the subject, as Lord Russell himself will allow; but as the Florida and Alabama were armed long before they ever entered a Confederate port, so the same thing may be anticipated in regard to these vessels. They would sail, therefore, not a commercial venture, but for naval adventure, and thus England's neutrality would be compromised.

There is a good deal to be said in answer to this theory which threatens to prevail. Allowing even that there were full proof that these iron-clads are destined for the Confederate Government, that they are not intended to leave Liverpool fully equipped for war, so as at once to begin their cruise. Far from this. We admit that they will not steer directly for a Confederate port, because the Federals hold the seas, and the risk would be too great. Where, then, will they go? They will sail as the Alabama and the Florida did, for an intermediate port.

Then the ships will be delivered into the hands of the purchaser, the Confederate Government, and the commercial transaction will be concluded. By what right, in virtue of what law, can the English Government require that goods shall be delivered only at the domicile of the purchaser? If any one have a right to interfere in this matter, it can only be the Power to whom the intermediate port belongs. Let Mr. Laird guarantee that these ships shall not immediately and directly on leaving Liverpool be employed as cruisers, and then the law would not authorise Great Britain to seize these vessels, even though the high seas were designated as the place of delivery, and though the armament were to be completed and the crews put on board in the middle of the Atlantic.

This was the course taken in the case of the Alabama. Either the Queen's Government violated the law then, or it threatens to do so at present.

This morning's Moniteur contains the manifesto of the Polish committee, which produced a fall on the Bourse. The pessimists regard this as a first step to the recognition of the Poles as belligerents, which would almost inevitably produce a declaration of war. It is, however, not necessary that such should be the intention of the French Government, it is more probably meant as a reply to the cavalier language of Prince Gortschakoff, which was little expected here. Had the tone of his communication been as polite as he could have made it had he pleased, there is little doubt that its matter would have aroused none of the indignation with which it is regarded. It is hardly possible to believe that the diplomacy of Russia, so long vaunted as the most successful in the world, can have made a mistake in choosing this tone. It is more likely that, foreseeing the infinite complications which a war for Poland must produce, it trusts to the prudence of the Continental Powers to avert the danger, and gives itself the safe pleasure of hard words. Such a calculation is too likely to prove false. There is a powerful, though not perhaps numerous party in every country in Europe, which is interested in producing the convulsions the governments they live under dread; and an insult to national feeling may change even the current of opinion in England, and render war inevitable. The English go to war, not for ideas, but for feelings; and it is notorious that if the co-operation of England were secured, a part of the objections felt here, and of which I have already spoken so lengthily, would fall to the ground.

The Mexican deputation was to leave this morning for Biarritz, its first mission being that of thanking the Emperor for the re-establishment of order. It will, in about a week proceed to the Archduke Maximilian's seat near Trieste to offer him the crown. His acceptance seems now beyond all doubt.

The American corvette Kearsage, which has put in at Brest for repairs, will receive the same treatment as that accorded to the Florida.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER, September 23.

It would sorely vex Mr. Bright's soul to read some correspondence lately placed in my hands. Nor would many of the homelier letters make entirely pleasant reading for people whose political and personal sympathies are rather more English than Mr. Bright's. You must know that scarcely a hamlet in Lancashire but has its "Southern Club," composed mainly of Mr. Bright's ex-protégés—the working men; and really it is in some sense painful to note the hardly articulate struggles of these poor fellows in making known their crying needs in regard to the American war. If the letters prove anything, they prove that the writers are, to their unbounded credit, all unskilled in the arts and shifts of "agitation." I cull from the heap one of these characteristic effusions as a fair sample of the rest, and try to assure Mr. Bright that in replying to it the honorary secretary of the Central Club in Manchester spared his single-minded correspondent every tyrannical taunt and the faintest smile of derision:—

RAWTENSTALL, September 11, 1863.

SIR,—I received your pamphlet with the greatest pleasure I must also beg pardon from you for not coming to your meeting as I could not get from my work. I was surprised when you sent me a circular with rawtenstall in one of its branches, for we had not then completed one. But now you will see by the annexed page that we have one. please let me know what we shall have to pay to join in with you. there are 36 of us in number, and very likely for a good many more and would be glad to join you; but we have written to you several times and you have given us no definite answer what privileges we shall receive from you. hoping you will now do so by return of post,

I remain, yours truly,

The Secretary of the Central Southern Club.

In reporting from time to time upon the gratifying success of the Confederate movement in the Distressed Districts, I am loth to do my subject an injustice by appearing to lay any serious stress upon its minor, though in their way not absolutely insignificant features. Abstracts of enthusiastic proceedings at Southern meetings are pouring into my hand from town after town throughout the cotton country. But, as a rule, I am unwilling to give any one of these even so much prominence as a mere mention would afford, at the cost, probably, of unfairly isolating any single expression of our general goodwill. Besides, thanks to the Union and Emancipation Society, there is a certain taint of ridiculous doubt attaching to anything coming in the questionable shape of "unanimous resolutions." This consideration alone would quite confirm me against weakening, in the mode I have alluded to, the authority which more general statements, moderate in matter and tone and supported by internal evidences of their truth, rarely fail to command. Having said this much, I need add nothing to explain why I take no notice of Northern paragraphs, stowed away in corners of the Daily News and the Morning Star, about little packed meetings held from time to time in village temperance-halls, or such other wayside edifices laudably built for mutual improvement purposes. This kind of beer, though of the smallest, may make very sufficient chronicling for such journals as care to keep a tally of it. But, as I have hinted, it seems desirable, as a rule, that our peddling Federal GRACCHI should air unchallenged their new-born horror of sedition; though in doing so they take what I consider an unfair advantage in bringing to bear upon their expositions of that unpardonable iniquity a Jacques-like amount of the too eloquent unction of the experienced and temporary "convertite." In their own obscure fashion, they were all free-footed libertines of political disloyalty only the other day, and now, forsooth, they are busying themselves in doing

Most mischievous foul sin, in chiding sin. But no doubt, spokesmen as they are of the Rump of the Old League, they will all return to their natural courses, so soon as their present platform totters finally to its fall. My sole anxiety is lest, in casting their next professional programme, they may fail to find a suitable character for their faithful collaborateur and Man Friday, President Davis's negro ex-coachman—to whom, by the bye, I mean no improper disrespect in pointing to him as a facetious argument, in his own singularly amusing person, of either the laxity or the favouritism of that capriciously operating instrument, the Fugitive Slave Law.

It was announced some days ago that "the Rev. W. H. Channing, from Washington, and nephew of the famous Dr. Channing," was about to deliver a lecture in this city in praise of a "Free and United Republic." By way of rejoinder to that announcement, some anonymous querist had the self-possession to publish for the better part of a week the following inquiry in the morning papers:—

Why should the Rev. Dr. Channing come to mock us in our distress in favour of the American war and little wages, instead of remaining at home to discharge, like a faithful Federal citizen, his liabilities to the Conscription Act?

The lecture came off in due course, but before addressing himself to his set subject, the reverend gentleman gratified his audience by giving the following answer to that public question:—

The Rev. W. H. Channing, who was enthusiastically applauded on rising, said before commencing his lecture he wished to make a personal allusion. An advertisement had appeared in the local papers asking why the lecturer had foregone his duties as a citizen of a republic, the imputation being that he had shunned those duties in coming to Manchester to advocate the cause of that republic. He should be very glad to see the writer of that advertisement side by side with him on the platform. (Cheers.) To treat a stranger visiting the city by giving utterance to such an insinuation was a mean and contemptible act. (Cheers.) To honest men he begged to explain—(A voice: "Oh, never mind that; he is not worthy of notice," and cheers.) Nevertheless, he begged to explain that the law of enrolment made the limitation of age to those who should be enrolled forty years, and he regretted to say he had passed that limit—(loud cheers)—for he should very much rejoice, although a Christian minister, to be so enrolled, and had sought these two years for an opportunity to take that place. (Loud cheers.) When Washington during the last summer was threatened with invasion, it was his privilege to advocate the enrolment of a volunteer regiment, and, for being the first to do this, he was allowed to write his name first on the regimental list. (Cheers.)

With regard to the reverend gentleman's complaint about inhospitable treatment, he will pardon me for reminding him that he came into our city, not as a fair-dealing stranger, entitled to a stranger's privileges, but avowedly as a sort of political Sinon, who was bringing with him a huge hobby-horse not at all to our liking. Thus it was the adventurous advertiser hurled his spear, not at the man, but at the machine, and apparently with more effect than we read of in the Æneid. It seems, however, according to the reverend gentleman's explanation, that it is not for lack of will that he is not now "discharging his liabilities to the Conscription Act." And worse than this—the longer he yearns to gratify his vain ardour, the older he is getting; and no doubt to have passed the grand climacteric would go a serious way in invalidating even a "Christian minister" for the exercise of that agility of movement which is mostly of the essence of rapid Federal strategy. It appears, therefore, on the whole, that the reverend gentleman must content himself with having enrolled his name "first on the regimental list," and generally with being a soldier on paper. The lecture itself was of the customary kind, and needs no further mention just now.

The withdrawal of Mr. Mason to Paris is the chief topic of conversation in political circles and on 'Change. The Guardian of this morning contains the following remarks, which may be taken as a fair reflex of public opinion here upon that important and perhaps significant step:—

Whether the interests of the South are likely to suffer—and if so, how much—from the withdrawal of the Confederate Commissioner till now in London, is a question for the consideration of Mr. Jefferson Davis and his ministers. With the best wishes for their success, we can only hope that they have not made a mistake. Judging, however, from the pains which they took to locate a functionary of this character in the English capital, and from what is known of the manner in which he has been employed, we should have thought that he had been able to do many things for them, both political and commercial, better than they could be done by a private individual, and that some substantial loss of efficiency would be the result of his withdrawal. With regard to the impression which the step they have resolved on is likely to have on public opinion, this, again, is a subject on which we have no right to advise them. Something, no doubt, is to be said on both sides, and it is their business exclusively to weigh the pros against the cons. On the one hand, the formal retirement of the Southern Envoy from the proximity of the English Court, will infallibly be represented as a sign that all hope of recognition from that quarter is abandoned. It will be hailed with immense glee by the liberal and philanthropic spirits on both sides of the Atlantic who gloat over every fresh obstacle thrown in the way of the gallant struggle for independence. The same act, on the other hand, will equally well bear the interpretation of a proof that the courage and confidence of the Southern States are no wise abated by the reverses they have recently undergone. Taken in connection with the constant access to the Emperor Napoleon and his ministers which is granted Mr. Slidell, the removal of Mr. Mason to Paris will be held to confirm the rumours of an early recognition by France; and the resolve no longer to court countenance from England will be ascribed as much to its being no longer wanted as to the consciousness that it is not likely to be given. Time must show which of these conflicting calculations will be proved to be better by the result.

CLOSE THE RANKS.

Air—Maryland, my Maryland.
The fell invader is before :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
We'll hurl his legions from our shore :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
Our wives, our children, are behind,
Our mothers, sisters, dear and kind.
Their voices reach us on the wind.
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
Are we to bend to slavish yoke ?
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
We'll bend when bends our Southern oak.
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
On with the charge of serried steel !
We all can die, we none can kneel,
To crouch beneath the Northern heel.
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
We kneel to God, and God alone :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
One heart in all, all hearts as one :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
For home, for country, truth, and right,
We stand or fall in freedom's fight.
In such a cause the Right is right.
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
We're here from every Southern home :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
Fond weeping voices bade us come :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
The husband, brother, boy, and sire,
All burning with one holy fire,
Our country's love our only hire.
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
We cannot fail, we will not yield :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
Our bosoms are our country's shield :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
By Washington's immortal name,
By Stonewall Jackson's kindred fame,
Their souls, their deeds, their cause the same !
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
By all we hope, by all we love :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
By home on earth, by heaven above :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
By all the tears and heart's blood shed,
By all our hosts of martyred dead,
We'll conquer !—or we'll share their bed !
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
The front may fall, the rear succeed :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
We smile in triumph as we bleed :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
Our Southern Cross above us waves ;
Long shall it bless the sacred graves
Of those who died but were not slaves.
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
But God is with us, and our right :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
Beyond the dark is glorious light :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
We'll give our country liberty,
And patriot victory shall be
The guerdon of the brave and free.
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
We scorn their storm of shot and shell :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
And all their hireling works of hell :
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !
Our battle line for victory set
By chiefs who never failed us yet,
On, with the Southern bayonet !
Close the ranks, close up the ranks !

HOW TO EXTINGUISH "GREEK FIRE."

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)
SIR,—If the "Greek fire" used by the Federals is the same as the combustible so called in the middle ages, it is of importance to know that it can be extinguished by very simple materials. "It cannot be extinguished by water," says Geoffrey de Vinsauf, "but is subdued by the sprinkling of sand, and put out by pouring vinegar upon it." Raw hides, too, are said to have resisted its influence. I have no pretension to science; I only refer to historical facts. Very likely others have been before me in communicating the information, but it certainly is worth being stated to the military authorities of the Confederates. I therefore write to you, in hopes the information, if not known already, may be of use. Obvious means of information are sometimes overlooked; I hope, therefore, you will excuse my troubling you with this letter. I quote the above from the Chronicles of the Crusaders, in Bohn's Antiquarian Library. The two passages above referred to are, the first at page 115; the second (as to raw hides), page 206. There is also in the same volume a note on pages 405-6-7, stating the supposed ingredients of, as well the means of extinguishing, the "Greek fire."

You can of course insert this letter in your paper; but my object is to give information, which may possibly be unknown, how to check the destructive combustibles of your inhuman enemies, and therefore I hope you will let it be known in the proper quarters.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
AN ENGLISHMAN.

THE JACKSON STATUE FUND.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—I take pleasure in acknowledging through your columns the receipt of a contribution of £1 7s. from the inhabitants of Collumpton, Devonshire, towards the Jackson Memorial Fund, collected by the Rev. James M. Foster, and made up by subscriptions limited to 6d.

I need not say how gratified the Committee feel at the receipt of subscriptions of this character, which prove the deep and wide-spread sympathy of the people of this country in the untimely end of so good and brave a man, and how glad we shall be to receive similar contributions, however small. I am yours, etc.,
W. H. GREGORY,

Hon. Sec. Jackson Memorial Fund
London, 22nd September.

CONFEDERATE FINANCES.

LETTER OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Treasury Department, Confederate States of America,

Richmond, August 24, 1863.

Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER, Lloyds, Virginia.

SIR,—In reply to your inquiries about the finances, I send you a condensed statement of the issue of Treasury notes and of the funding operations of the Treasury. You will see from this statement that the funding has been eminently successful; and you will learn, also, that the amount of outstanding Treasury notes is still within the limits of the depreciation which I reported to Congress at the last session. My Report then estimated the amount of circulation which the country could probably bear, at $150,000,000.

The statement now made shows that the outstanding Treasury notes, used as a general currency, amount almost exactly to three times this amount. But when it is considered that a very large portion of these notes are across the Mississippi, it will be apparent that in the Atlantic States the estimate of three to one is rather over than under the mark. Two absorbents are now added, which will keep down the excess from new issues—namely: the taxes, and the sale of cotton bonds; and when the tax in kind begins to contribute its portion to the support of the army there is every reason to believe that the currency can be well sustained.

It is obvious, from this statement, that the popular notion of estimating the value of the currency by a comparison with gold, while the actual currency has only been increased threefold, its proportion to gold rates at more than double that amount. The fact is, as you well know, that, situated as we are, gold is as much a commercial commodity as platinum or tin, and its price is governed by the law of demand and supply. As I have already shown, in the Report referred to, wheat and corn afford much more reliable standards of value, when their price is not controlled by some local obstruction; and, by referring to these, it will be seen that the currency has maintained itself at the ratio which the outstanding issues indicate. You will perceive, by the Statement, that uniting all the various appliances for funding, there has been funded in Bonds $232,404,670; to which, according to estimate, there is yet to be added about $70,000,000 more, which are yet in the hands of the Treasury officers to be funded; making in all about $302,000,000; add to this, $15,442,000, deposited in the 5 per cent. Call Loan, and we have an aggregate of nearly $318,000,000 withdrawn from the currency.

This result is certainly very favourable, and shows that the measures adopted by Congress have been quite as successful as any of us had anticipated. It is somewhat remarkable that the Yankee Government should have adopted exactly the same measures for withdrawing their circulation, and, according to a statement published in Hunt's Merchant's Magazine for July, they have funded, in Call Loan and Bonds, not more than $200,000,000.

These figures show that there is no reason for distrust as to our currency; and if, when Congress meets, you will address yourselves vigorously to measures which will all restrain its further increase, we shall be fully able to maintain our cause. I would suggest to you two matters for consideration: one is, the export duty which I proposed; and the other is a renewal of the Call Loan for all Treasury notes, upon the same principle with the Six per Cent. Call Loan, which was reported at the last session.

It is worth experiment to try whether, by allowing a deposit in the Treasury, on interest, we may not be able to attract and retain there all the Treasury notes not actually required for circulation. Very truly, yours,

C. G. MEMMINGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Boulevard-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

At Liverpool, to Wm. KNOX, Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings, At Manchester, F. A. Hasleham, Esq., Manchester Southern Club Office, Market-street.

At Paris, to Messrs. PFEIFFER and MULLER, 52, Rue du Château d'Eau, Paris.

At Turin, to Sr. FILIPPO MANETTA, 4, Borgo Nuovo.

At St. Thomas (West Indies), C. W. WHITE, Esq.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1863.

The Withdrawal of the Confederate Commissioner.

We are permitted by Mr. Mason to publish his letter to Earl Russell, announcing his recall as Special Commissioner from the Confederate States of America to England, and the termination of his mission.

It will be seen by the extract given in the letter of recall, that it is placed by the Confederate President on the ground of the persistent refusal of England to enter into the relations of amity usual between Foreign Powers—a condition of things which, in the opinion of the President, would make the continuance of the mission "neither conducive to the interests nor consistent with the dignity of the Government of which he is at the head." Mr. Slidell, we understand, will remain in France as Special Commissioner to that Government, nor is it at all contemplated to terminate that mission; and yet France, equally with England, has so far refrained from entering into international relations with the Confederate States. All England will admit that the Government of those States is in the hands of able, experienced, and judicious statesmen; and we are sufficiently conversant with Southern circles and Southern men to know that with other marked differences between the sections North and South in America, there exists this: that in the South the general feeling to England has been one of good-will and respect. There must be, then, some over-ruling cause for the difference thus made between France and England in the termination of the mission to the one, and not to the other. To those at all conversant with what is passing in the Southern States this is no mystery. Mr. Slidell has been received, and has been uniformly treated by the Government of France, with every mark of consideration and respect for the Government he represents. There may be grave reasons regarding policy or public law, why France, like England, may not deem it incumbent as yet to recognise those States as an independent political Power; but their representative has been freely admitted to every form of intercourse with the Government of France, to personal interviews with the Emperor whenever he has asked for them, with immediate access to all or any of the Ministry, at first request. This would seem indeed but an ordinary courtesy to a gentleman in his position; the refusal of it would be more than a discourtesy: it would be an actual indignity to those whose representative he is.

In England, Mr. Mason has been held by the Government in the very opposite position. His correspondence with the Foreign Office, laid before Congress at Richmond, we know from the Southern press, produced a feeling of deep and universal indignation. It showed, that with the exception of a single and formal interview with Earl Russell, on his first arrival, appointed at his residence and not at the Foreign Office, he had been admitted to no intercourse whatever with any member of the Government; whilst a second interview with Earl Russell, asked for some months after the first, was by that minister curtly refused. It showed further, that to all outward or other manifestation, the presence of a Confederate Commissioner in London was no further recognised than by brief replies to such communications as he was from time to time instructed to make to the Minister of this Government.

Whilst we sincerely regret, therefore, the necessity which has imposed on President Davis the duty of terminating the Confederate Commission to England, we are bound to admit that his forbearance has been tested to the utmost.

Earl Russell has now succeeded in establishing absolute non-intercourse with the Confederate States—those States, where our commerce has found sources of incalculable wealth and profitable employment for countless millions of our capital, with like profitable employment for hundreds of thousands of the people of England. We say absolute non-intercourse, because we know through the press that of the three British Consuls who remained in the Southern States, exercising their functions by permission of the Government there, Mr. Bunch at Charleston, and Mr. Magee at Mobile, were recalled by this Government; and Mr. Moore at Richmond was dismissed by the Confederate Government for contumacy.

It remains to be seen hereafter what advantages France may derive from a course of policy more consistent with her own self-respect and with national decorum.

The Military Operations before Charleston.

THE first gleam of success which has attended the operations of the Federals before Charleston since the day of their landing on Morris Island, nearly ten weeks ago, has sent New York once more into ecstasies, and inspired the Federal organs in this country with new Io Pæans over the decaying fortunes of the Southern Confederacy. Although the capture and occupation of Charleston would exercise as little influence on the issue of the war as the discharge of Greek fire upon the sleeping townsfolk had upon the defenders of Fort Sumter, it is perfectly reasonable that New York, already gratified by the ruin of New Orleans, should rejoice over the destruction of another dangerous rival; nor is it to be wondered that the small section of Federal sympathisers in England should profess to see in the fall of Charleston the doom of the rebellion. But there is in sober reality very little cause for jubilation either in New York or in this country over the murderous conflict that now threatens the fairest city of the South with the fate of Moscow. For every shot fired upon that devoted city severs more widely the commercial links that once bound the trading communities of the North and the South, and is another striking protest against that reconstruction of the Union to which the pseudo-humanitarians of the Bright school look forward. In fact, it but gratifies a sentiment of revenge, carries out the principle of intimidation, and furnishes useful artillery experiments. It is difficult to see how the destruction of Charleston can repay the Federals for the enormous sacrifice they have made of life and treasure in front of its batteries. Its smoking ruins can never be held. An army of 100,000 men and one or two campaigns would be required to occupy it and march inland for the subjugation of South Carolina. The siege must be regarded as an isolated operation, of which the only result, supposing the anticipations of the Federals to be realised, would be the closing of the harbour. And as such, though it may be full of dramatic grandeur, of curious suggestions, and, for the people of the South, of hallowed memories, it scarcely merits the concentrated attention it has received. Charleston is not a vital point in the defences of the Confederacy. It is not of so much importance as was New Orleans. It is hardly more valuable to the Confederacy, from a military point of view and for present purposes, than Mobile, or Savannah, or Wilmington. To look upon the issue of the battle now raging in its waters as the turning point of the war is a foolish or wilful error. Though Charleston should be lost, there would be no gain to the Federals. Nothing would be changed: there would only be one Southern city the less.

We have spoken of the fall of Charleston as a possible contingency. But it is also a remote one. For ten weeks the whole resources of the workshops and navy-yards of the Federals have been employed, and with what result? They have captured Morris Island and battered Fort Sumter to pieces. They have accomplished this at an awful cost of life, and with the loss of several of their best naval officers. They have advanced, as it were, two steps, and there are twenty to be taken. It is easy to calculate at what date and at what further cost they will reach Charleston if their future is equal to their past progress. For ten weeks General Gilmore has been approaching Fort Wagner. He has assaulted it four or five times, each time meeting with a bloody repulse, the last assault on Forts Wagner and Gregg having been as murderous an affair as the preceding ones. At last, finding the enemy's approach at the very edge of the fosse of Fort Wagner, his means of provisioning imperilled, and his brave and exhausted garrison menaced with an assault from greatly superior numbers, General Beauregard has withdrawn his troops. Nineteen useless guns are the trophies of the ten weeks' siege, not of Charleston, but of Fort Wagner. There is the destruction of Fort Sumter to add to General Gilmore's laurels. That is a feat creditable to Mr. Parrott, but apparently not very useful to the Federals. Fort Sumter is in ruins, but its ruins hold out. Fourteen times its colours have been shot away and rehoisted. At intervals of hours or days, from Morris Island and from the big guns of the iron-clads, there sweeps through its crumbled casemates a great storm of bursting shell. And when the storm has ceased the brave defenders pile up fresh works and man new batteries, and again the struggle has to be recommenced. General Gilmore once more demands the surrender of the ruined fortress. Beauregard's answer is, "Take it." And the attempt is made. The naval forces, piqued into action by the sneers of the army, adventure an assault. They are driven with heavy loss pell-mell from the walls by the garrison, and seven naval lieutenants are left prisoners. As Fort Sumter cannot be taken, Sullivan's Island is engaged. There is no possibility of a coup de main. The work must be done by good hard pounding; and so day after day the iron-clads go up within a certain distance of Battery Bee and Fort Moultrie, and a great artillery duel, ships against forts, takes place, which, so far as we know, terminates invariably in favour of the latter. But Fort Moultrie and Battery Bee must be destroyed whilst their batteries dominate the main ship-channel. Gilmore has accomplished very little towards the reduction of Charleston. It is against these positions that the whole fury of the Federal attack is now turned, and sooner or later it must succeed. Then the outer line of the defences of Charleston will have fallen, but only the outer line. There will still remain more formidable works to be carried and stronger batteries to be reduced. The steamers heading up through the harbour to the city, pass within short range of heavy batteries planted wherever the ground is favourable. At more than one point the attacking squadron would be exposed to a terrible cross-fire. The guns of Forts Johnson, Ripley, and Pinckney must be reduced, the powerful steam-rams taken or sunk, the obstructions cleared, before the Federal iron-clads can be moored off the wharves of Charleston. General Gilmore's only chance seems to be the reduction of these defences one by one. We may judge by the resistance of Fort Wagner how long his task will last.

It is not easy to follow the movements of the Federal armies in Tennessee, but there is no reason to doubt that the news brought by the last mail is substantially correct, and that Knoxville and Chattanooga are occupied by Federal troops. The fall of the latter place will be a disappointment to many persons in the South, for its natural strength and its strategical value had always marked it out as the final rallying-point for the defence of Eastern Tennessee; and its surrender without a fight is not to be very easily explained. It was reported at Washington that the army from Chattanooga had moved rapidly northward with a view to overwhelm Burnside's army at Knoxville, and that a portion of Lee's army had been detached South for the same purpose. The distance between Chattanooga and Knoxville is about 100 miles, but the Confederates occupy an entire line, and with railway communication could reach Knoxville and give battle to Burnside before Rosecrans had marched half-way. The movement would be in accordance with General Johnston's tactics; and if it has taken place we may hear within a few days of a great battle having been fought. Another report is, that a large portion of the Tennessee army has proceeded northwards to join Lee's force in Virginia; whilst a third states that the Confederate army, numbering 50,000 men, has fallen back eastward and southward for the defence of Georgia. Time will show which of the three accounts is correct, but we are inclined to place most reliance on the last. Had the Confederates intended to make a stand they would hardly have abandoned Chattanooga without a struggle, or they would have met and crushed Burnside when he emerged from Kentucky. The junction of the two armies of Burnside and Rosecrans raises the Federal army to a strength so far superior to anything the Confederates can bring against it in Eastern Tennessee, that it will be the obvious policy of the Confederate general to avoid an action, and by a rapid movement of retreat to carry his army clear of possible pursuit, or by a bold flank movement on the Federal lines of communication to place Rosecrans himself in danger. Under any circumstances, the Federal army is not likely to make further progress this season. It has obtained a strong position in Eastern Tennessee, an admirable starting-point for next year's campaign, and Rosecrans is too prudent a general to throw away these advantages by a fresh advance into a hostile territory. Meantime the news from Lee's army is still threatening. This continued inaction, this lengthened silence, are supposed, reasonably enough, to portend a storm. All we hear is, that the work of reorganisation and re-equipment is going on steadily, and that when the army of Virginia moves it will be in a state of efficiency such as it has never previously attained. Lee's army has never yet advanced against the enemy in Virginia without a victory. For the sake of both North and South it is to be hoped that this Fall it will be a decisive one.

American Policy or English Industry?

SOMEWHAT alarmed, apparently, by the effect of his wild recommendation that England should, in default of evidence against Liverpool shipbuilders, go to war to punish the Confederate States for the monstrous crime of buying ships in Liverpool, "Historicus" has taken up his pen once more to soften and explain away the imprudent violence of which he was guilty. He is still in a state of extreme irritation, as is evident by the supercilious sneers he has thought proper to bestow upon his opponents. From the date of his letter, it is probable that these have no reference to ourselves, and we shall leave them to those whom they more immediately concern; while we endeavour to deal with his arguments as if they were advanced with the coolness and good temper which become the literary condottieri who lend their pens, now to Lord Russell and now to Mr. Seward, and can no more be supposed to have in their cause an interest excusing passion and violence, than the gentlemen who are equally ready, in the service of law and justice, to prove the guilt or the innocence of any prisoner at the bar. What, it appears, Historicus ought to have said, and would have said had he not lost his self-command, is, that we have no more right to proceed without evidence in diplomacy than at law; but that if we have no evidence against the offender whom the law can reach, and have evidence against the offender whom we can only reach through diplomatic agency, we are at liberty to proceed first by way of remonstrance, and then, if needful, by way of reprisals, against the latter only. The application of this statement he illustrates by supposing that a belligerent has ordered a ship of Mr. Laird in the name of a neutral, and that Mr. Laird has supplied it in honest ignorance of the real object and real ownership. This is not a very likely case, and we may put it aside altogether. The real case which Historicus means to reach may be stated as follows:—Mr. Laird built the Alabama. It could not be proved, before she sailed, that she was built for the Confederates. After she sailed, this became clear enough. Therefore, though we had no evidence against Mr. Laird, we have evidence against the Confederate Government; let us then proceed against them. The proposition is not without ingenuity. But unluckily it happens that in this case, and probably in every case, the fact which is evidence against the purchaser—the actual use made of the ship—supplies also exactly that evidence which is wanted, if Historicus's interpretation of the law be correct, to convict the seller. It would be perfectly easy to prove, after the fact, that Mr. Laird knew for what purpose the Alabama was bought; and if the Confederate Government, in buying her, did any wrong, it was only because, as Historicus holds, they induced Mr. Laird to commit a breach of the law. Therefore, if there be any case for proceedings against the Confederates, there is equally a case for prosecuting Mr. Laird. Again, take a case which might have occurred already, and which may possibly occur one day or other. John Smith builds a ship at Liverpool for Jacques Bonhomme, of Havre. At Havre, Jacques Bonhomme sells her to the Confederate Government. Now, in this case, has any offence been committed against the English Government? Clearly, if so, it was committed before the ship left British waters; for, once in French possession and within French jurisdiction, England has neither control over nor responsibility for her proceedings. But if any offence has been committed within British jurisdiction, it was by John Smith, and the Confederate Government can only have been guilty as his instigator and abettor. It seems clear, therefore, that wherever there is a case for diplomatic proceedings on account of the sale of armed ships, there will be a still stronger case for legal proceedings against a British subject; and that if the courts of law decide that the ship-builder has done no wrong, they also decide that, à fortiori, the ship-buyer has done no wrong; for his only act has been to instigate the builder to do that which, ex hypothesi, is declared to be lawful.

It is very plain, however, why the agents of the Federal Government wish to remove this question from the sphere of judicial decision to that of diplomatic action. They know that the law is against them; they know that British tribunals are inaccessible to menace and corruption; and they despair of obtaining from them the exercise of a vigour beyond the law, or the display of a "warm and friendly" neutrality. But diplomatic action depends on Earl Russell; and Earl Russell is liable to be cajoled, bullied, worried, or intimidated into doing anything that Mr. Adams may think fit to extort, provided always he does not see an immediate risk of losing his place thereby. Therefore, abandoning the vain idea of stopping by law the trade in ships between Liverpool and Richmond, the advisers of the Federal Government try to do it by diplomacy; to persuade the Foreign Secretary, their facile tool and creature, to sit as judge in the last resort, and pronounce sentence against the trade; and to obtain from him an order to the Confederate Government to abstain from buying ships in Liverpool, on pain of the high displeasure of John Earl Russell, and—if he remain long enough in office—the active enmity of England. The impudence of the Yankee diplomatist and the ingenuity of the English special pleader are happily mingled in this notable device; which wants nothing to insure its success, except the concurrence of Lord Palmerston and his colleagues and the permission or ignorance of the British nation.

We are far from denying that there might be a case in which the English Government would be justified in addressing very energetic remonstrances to the Government of the Confederate States. All that we say is, that such a case is not afforded by any of the events supposed by Historicus or by anything likely to occur. It is necessary, in the first place, that the offence should be given by Confederate agents. If Mr. Laird builds any number of vessels on speculation, and sends them forth armed and equipped for war, that is no ground for proceeding against anybody but Mr. Laird. Again, it is necessary that some wrongful act should be committed within British jurisdiction. If a vessel be built in Liverpool and sold to the Confederates, and only armed and equipped when outside of British waters, then there has been nothing done, at least on the part of the Confederacy, of which England has a right to complain; for whatever objection might be taken applies only to what was done on the high seas, where we have no national jurisdiction. Finally, as we conceive, it is necessary that the offence given should be not merely a breach of law, but a violation of sovereignty. If the subject, not being actually the ambassador, of a foreign power, violates our laws, our remedy is legal, not diplomatic; against the offender, not against his Government. For example, when the French Government chartered a transport, our Government held the owner to have been guilty of a breach of the very Act which Mr. Laird is said to have broken; but no one thought that any complaint on that score could be addressed to the Emperor of the French. So, if during the period when the export of arms was forbidden, Mr. George Train or any other of the numerous and equally reputable agents of Mr. Lincoln, had contrived to elude the customs authorities and smuggle a cargo of rifles out of Liverpool, there would have been no ground for addressing a remonstrance to the Government at Washington. But if the Federal Government enlists soldiers in Ireland, or if the Confederate Government fits out and despatches a belligerent expedition from the port of Liverpool, an invasion of our sovereignty has been committed; just as when a Federal captain fires on a ship within three miles from a British coast; and the affront should be dealt with in the same manner.

Such is, we believe, the legal aspect of the matter. But it has also a moral side. We are hardly entitled, in the midst of a war in which the interpretation of our laws and neutral rights has an importance of the highest degree for one of the belligerents, suddenly to give to that interpretation an extreme strictness in regard to matters which have hitherto been dealt with perhaps in too lax a spirit. And assuredly we have no right to press our sovereign privileges severely against one party, while we wink, willingly or not, at their infraction by the other. Now, in the first place, we have hitherto been exceedingly lax in our construction of the Foreign Enlistment Act. No conviction, no judicial decision, has ever been obtained under any of its provisions. More: during the Garibaldian invasion of Naples we allowed a whole regiment, armed, uniformed, and organised, to leave our shores in the face of day, to wage war against a Prince with whom we were at peace, under the flag of an unrecognised chief of guerillas. So we allowed a regiment of Irishmen to go forth and fight the battles of the Pope against Italy. We are scarcely entitled, therefore, to be very indignant because the Confederates are, by what is said on very uncertain authority to be an evasion of this same Act, obtaining a certain assistance in their struggle for independence. Again, we know that the Federals are flagrantly violating our sovereign rights in Ireland; we know that they have done so in the West Indies, by capturing vessels within our jurisdiction; and we have forbore to press our claims against them, with a lenity which morally estops us from pressing our less certain grounds of complaint, at their instigation, against the Confederates. Finally, so long as we know that the Federal navy is chiefly manned by British seamen—that it is by English sailors that Charleston is bombarded and Mobile blockaded—we should be departing from the spirit of neutrality if we took stringent precautions to prevent the Confederates from obtaining, if they can do so without committing us to a breach of international law, ships of war built in British yards.

We may consider that we have sufficiently answered any argument which Historicus may have to allege in favour of his method for extending the operation of the Foreign Enlistment Act. There are, however, some persons of less violent partialities who honestly argue that, for her own sake, England ought to set the example of prohibiting by law all participation or assistance by neutrals in foreign quarrels, and who will probably call, next session, for such an alteration of our law as may effectually prevent the Confederates from receiving any more aid from our unequalled ship-building resources. We answer, in the first place, that no benefit will accrue to England from a self-sacrifice which America, when her opportunity comes, will be careful not to imitate; and secondly, that a change in our law durante bello, directed manifestly to the disadvantage of one of the belligerents, would be an act inconsistent with neutrality. As to the advisability of such a measure on general grounds, without reference to the present struggle, we cannot do better than refer our readers to the following admirable remarks of the Economist—a journal which has, by the way, constantly recommended the limitation of the Confederate territory to the States east of the Mississippi:—

No ephemeral object of political expediency can be so momentous as the securing to Great Britain the supremacy in such a branch of trade as the construction of ships of war. No temporary danger can be so great as the suffering this supremacy to pass into other hands. All our efforts should be directed to make ourselves the great war-ship-builders in the world—to surpass all rivals, to engross all orders, to prevent any serious competition from springing up elsewhere. Every fresh experience of actual warfare, every fresh development of naval and military science, alike point to the conclusion that iron-clads and steam-rams and monitors and war vessels of yet undreamed construction, will hereafter be the most formidable instruments both for attack and for defence, and that the nation which can build these best, can build them fastest, can build them in the greatest numbers, will have a superiority inalienable, unassailable, and decisive over all other nations. We need this superiority more than any other country. . . . We have this superiority now; we have every motive for retaining it; we have every facility for clinging to it, augmenting it, improving it into absolute and uncontested supremacy. If our vessels of war are in all respects the best that can be made anywhere—if they are newer, better designed, better constructed, more formidable, and more resistless—we shall gradually acquire something like a virtual monopoly in the art—an art, in the present unfortunate state of the world, about the most important and lucrative that any nation can practise. With such a virtual monopoly we shall be safe. To the acquisition of such a virtual monopoly all the exertions of our scientific engineers, all the enterprise of our manufacturing firms, all the encouragement and facilities legitimately affordable by our Government, ought to be directed in unison. It is not merely the establishment of a profitable branch of trade that is at stake; it is the future security and peace of our native land. If we are right in the high estimate we form of the national value of unquestioned preponderance in the shipwright's art—and who will say that we are wrong?—then surely the notion of hampering or discouraging or punishing those who devote themselves and their wealth and talents to its prosecution, is the very last which an English Government or legislature should entertain; and to forego this needed and desirable supremacy, or run any risk of impairing it, or jeopardising it in any fashion, for the sake of averting the anger of those who were angry with us before the keel of the Florida was laid and who will be angry with us still if a dozen Al-xandras were to be seized, would be the wretchedest bargain ever made on earth since Esau sold his birthright for a mess of pottage.

This view of English interests may be new to most of those who have taken the same line of argument that was adopted by several Liverpool firms in their protest against the doings of the Alabama; but it is none the less sound and conclusive on that account; and we think that so far as English interests and not American impartialities are really concerned, it settles the question beyond possibility of further dispute. If, for the sake of keeping peace a year or two more with the North, we are to drive all actual or probable belligerents—that is, all good customers—from our dockyards, the building of ships of war will cease to be an English trade, and will become a French or a Yankee monopoly; and we may form a pretty fair idea how, in the first war that may break out, that monopoly will be used.

American Political Economy.

THERE can be no doubt that Mr. Chase is a clever man, although his financial system is as utterly unsound as the famous South Sea Company or Law's still more famous Mississippi scheme. We are inclined to think him the cleverest man in the Lincoln Administration, for he is the only man who has done, and done well, the business he has undertaken. We ought not to underrate his talent because his work is not what it never was intended to be. If we see a man building, with wonderful dexterity and steadiness of hand, a card castle for the amusement of a party of children, and so building it that it stands while he piles one story upon another and while the little observers dance and shout with delight around the table, we certainly give the operator credit for no common degree of manual cleverness; and we do not the less admire his skill because, though we cannot pretend to say how many more cards may be safely added to the pile, we know that ere long it must come to grief, to the extreme mortification of the wondering spectators. It is only intended to amuse for a few moments, not to be a κτῆμα ἐς ἄς. The first severe shock must of course upset it; the mere additions which it is receiving must ere long bring it to the ground; but in the meantime it serves its purpose admirably, and wins merited applause for the careful and patient constructor. So with the finance of the North. We know that a crash may come to-morrow and must come in time; and very probably Mr. Chase knows this as well as we do. But it is not his affair. The card castle will have served his purpose if it last his time; at least it has already achieved more than any one expected from it. It has enabled him for more than two years to make war without credit and without taxes; with little perceptible damage to the prosperity of the country and with great benefit to his own popularity. The surprise universally felt that a crash has not come long before this, is the highest testimony to the ability of the ingenious financier who has contrived to outdo all his most reckless predecessors since finance began; and reducing the trade of the chevalier d'industrie to a regular political method, to spend about ten millions a month out of an income of one million, without borrowing and without taxation. Some punctilious moralists are heard to murmur that this kind of finance is, after all, only a gigantic swindle; that it is a sort of treason to the nation which is thus, at unawares, being cheated out of its capital; and that when the day of retribution arrives myriads of ruined families will curse the now popular Secretary of the Treasury as the author of their unmerited misfortunes. Murmurs of this kind only prove the utter incapacity of the European mind to appreciate the men and the ideas of America. A theological writer who has just achieved a nine days' reputation, tells us that the sharp distinction drawn between truth and falsehood, fact and imposture, is altogether a Western notion, perfectly unintelligible to the mind of an Asiatic. Similarly, the distinction between fraud and good faith, swindling and mere acuteness in money matters, is altogether of European origin, and finds no place in the ethical or political code of the New World. There, "it behoves a man to be smart;" and Salmon P. Chase, as the smartest man America has yet produced, will probably be honoured in Yankeeedom long after Washington is forgotten as a myth or doomed to execration as a slaveholder. And in good sooth we must admit that his countrymen have little right to complain of him. Populus vult decipi. The Yankees would have war at any price, and they would not have taxation on any account; they have found in Mr. Chase a man who taxes them without their finding it out, and provides funds for the expenditure of the biggest war that modern times have seen, without bringing home to the consciousness of his countrymen the painful fact that war must be paid for. Moreover, he has the further excuse, that in one contingency—the probability of which it is treason to question—a crash may yet be averted, and the edifice of cards suddenly turned to solid stone. If the South should be conquered and its lands forfeited, they may be sold at a fixed price, and greenbacks be made receivable for this purpose and no other. As the Northerners will not admit that the war can have any other issue, they have no right to blame Mr. Chase that he has taken them at their word, and devised a system of finance which, in this, and in no other case, may prove finally successful.

At present, it is certainly more successful than could have been expected. The premium on gold has never risen above fifty—that is, the paper dollar has never been worth less than about 67 cents; commerce is active, and there are no general complaints of suffering from the poor or of danger and embarrassment among the rich. How comes it that a scheme of finance confessedly rotten has worked so little practical distress during the first two years of its operation?

We must observe, in the first place, that an over issue of paper, with the prospect of indefinite further issues, has in itself a tendency to quicken trade. Prudent men wish to get rid of their money as quickly as may be in exchange for property of which the actual value will not be affected, while its money value will rise with any further issues of paper. And thus there is a double enhancement of the price of good investments: first, that apparent enhancement which arises from the depreciation of money; and secondly, that real enhancement which arises from the desire for security. And this rise of prices, to owners of property and to the commercial classes constitutes "prosperity." It would no doubt injure the working classes and produce much discontent; but this tendency is counteracted by the fact that the war has taken away directly nearly a million of men from the labour market and checked emigration; while there is, at the same time, a vast Government demand for goods and for labour; and thus wages are raised by a simultaneous diminution of the supply of human muscle and sinew and by an increase in the demand. This, by the way, is the phenomenon which has given rise to the paradox that "war stimulates business and promotes prosperity." The classes in receipt of money incomes fixed by agreement, law, or custom suffer in both ways; the value of their incomes is reduced by the depreciation of money, and yet further reduced by the effect of the rise of wages and the increase of demand upon goods; but this class is not numerous enough in America to make itself heard or felt. Meantime producers and merchants receive increased money prices for their goods, workmen receive increased wages, secure investments of all sorts rise rapidly in price, and no one fully understands how much of the increase is merely nominal and how certain it is that what is more than nominal is only the measure of insecurity and the recompense of risk.

The smallness of the actual depreciation of paper is a yet more curious phenomenon than the apparent prosperity which seems compatible with financial rottenness. Mr. Chase has let loose on the country an enormous flood of paper, multiplying the circulation to three or four times its natural extent. How comes it that the depreciation founded on this excess is so small? To some extent, no doubt, it may be greater than is apparent, as Mr. Chase is said to have skillfully rigged the market, and kept down as far as possible the premium on gold. But this is not a principal or powerful counteractive. We believe, also, that he has driven a great deal of bank paper out of circulation by legislative oppression. But the main counteractives of the tendency of excessive issues to produce depreciation are two: the extension of circulation always required by war, and the contraction of credit produced by a sense of general insecurity. Into the reasons of the former we need not enter: suffice it to say that both theory and experience teach us that in time of war governments have need of large supplies of gold. Now, fighting partly on his own frontier, partly in a country which he treats as his own, and on which he forces his money, the Yankee makes greenbacks fill the place of gold, and thus establishes at once an outlet for a vast amount of paper-money. Again, in ordinary times, in all commercial countries, and especially in America, credit to a great extent takes the place of cash; inasmuch that all speculative rises of general prices are accomplished not through the medium of an extended circulation, but simply by a great expansion of credit. Every economist, every man who has studied the machinery of business, knows that if a given amount of business, hitherto carried on with so much credit and so much circulating medium, has to be done without credit, a great increase of circulation will be necessary. Thus in America, the state of the nation has greatly contracted credit, without, as usually happens, contracting business; and thus room is made for the absorption of an amount of currency sufficient to supply the place of that credit which, on account of the general want of confidence, has been annihilated. The withdrawal of that credit is equivalent to the destruction or hoarding of so much money in its effect on commercial transactions; it creates a need for additional money to supply its place; and thus room is made for Mr. Chase's currency. Thus it is that there has been much less depreciation from over issue than might have been expected; because, in fact, the need for currency had increased, owing to the unhealthy state of public affairs; and the excess over the usual circulation is very much greater than the excess over the actual requirements, which last is the cause and measure of depreciation.

There is one point which we must not leave out of sight. In the case of ordinary commodities—take iron as an example—value is regulated by two things: the relation of supply and demand immediately, and the cost of production in ultimate resort. It so happens that the former is always more fluctuating than the latter; but this is accidental, not essential. What is noticeable for our present purpose is, that cost of production gives value, and the relation of supply and demand regulates value for the time being. Now in the case of a paper currency demand is not very variable, and the proportion of value which depends on supply and demand may therefore be said to depend upon supply. This value, by excessive supplies, Mr. Chase has lowered. Now, as this depreciation cannot diminish except by contraction of supply, and as there has been recently no contraction of supply, the amount of depreciation attributable to this cause must be measured by the highest recent value of paper; say gold at 125, or a depreciation of twenty per cent. The depreciation attributable to excess of supply may be less than this; it certainly is not greater. Whence, then, the depreciation exceeding this amount? From a source answering in this case to cost of production. The origin of value, in the case of paper money, is confidence in Government; this performs in its case the function generally belonging to cost of production; only that whereas cost of production is seldom a very variable quantity, confidence fluctuates rapidly and extremely. The range of the premium on gold, between 125 and 150, or that of the depreciation of paper, between 80 and 67, is attributable to fluctuations of public confidence in the will or power of the Government to maintain the value of the currency. And here we come at once to the indication of that which must, sooner or later, bring a crash. Increased issues will lower the value of the notes, first slowly, then rapidly; and by this process ruin must come in time. It may be enormously accelerated or instantly precipitated by any circumstance which spreads in the North the conviction that the Government will be speedily forced either to repudiation or to enormous issues, or to any act which would destroy the intrinsic value of the currency. Defeats, severe and evidently fatal, would accomplish the work at once; delay, slowly sapping confidence, would do it by slow degrees; but sooner or later, repudiation of the greenbacks, if the war last long, or permanent depreciation, if it terminate quickly, must be the resort of the Government. And when once the close approach of either alternative is discerned, the factitious prosperity of the North will come to the ground in one universal and all-destroying "smash."

We do not know if any of Mr. Chase's admirers are really ignorant enough to suppose that the North is less impoverished by spending paper than by spending gold. Of course, in either case, what is really spent is that portion of Northern wealth of which Mr. Lincoln gets hold, and which he spends on buying arms and powder, on feeding his army, on building monitors, and casting cannon. Making all allowances for what is saved to the national wealth by swindling contractors, who prevent the Government from destroying the full value of its expenditure, the Yankee nation is certainly the poorer every month by ten millions sterling of wealth absolutely destroyed; and also by all that the million of men taken away from the plough or the factory would have produced, if left at home, above the amount of their own consumption. It is taxed, too, even though it may not be aware of it; taxed to the whole extent of the difference between its present and past circulation, and taxed with utter disregard of equality and of equity. It cannot have war without paying for it, and paying handsomely; and though the payment may seem to be postponed indefinitely, we may be sure that one day the bill will be presented. The Secretary of the Treasury will place the last card on his castle, or some sudden gust from Europe or from the South will shake its foundation. It will fall without remedy and without warning, and great will be the fall thereof.

MR. MASON'S LETTER TO EARL RUSSELL.

24, Upper Seymour Street, Portman Square,
September 21, 1863.

The Right Honourable Earl RUSSELL,
Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

MR. LORD,—In a Despatch from the Secretary of State of the Confederate States of America, dated 4th day of August last, and now just received, I am instructed to consider the commission which brought me to England as at an end, and I am directed to withdraw at once from this country.

The reasons for terminating this mission are set forth in an extract from the Despatch, which I have the honour to communicate herewith.

The President believes that "the Government of Her Majesty has determined to decline the overtures made through you for establishing, by treaty, friendly relations between the two Governments, and entertains no intention of receiving you as the accredited Minister of this Government near the British Court."

"Under these circumstances, your continued residence in London is neither conducive to the interests nor consistent with the dignity of this Government; and the President therefore requests that you consider your mission at an end, and that you withdraw with your Secretary from London."

Having made known to your Lordship on my arrival here the character and purposes of the mission entrusted to me by my Government, I have deemed it due to courtesy thus to make known to the Government of Her Majesty its termination, and that I shall, as directed, at once withdraw from England.

I have the honour to be
Your Lordship's very obedient Servant.
(Signed.) J. M. MASON.

CONFEDERATE BOOKS.

THANKS to the kind attention of Messrs. West and Johnston of Richmond, we are in receipt of some of the works which that firm has published since the commencement of the war, and which we believe have not hitherto found their way to Europe. They all relate to the great conflict in which the South is now engaged. Whilst the battle of liberty is being fought, there is little leisure for literature, and naturally no inclination to treat on any other than the one engrossing topic. The duty of every man is to do battle for his country with the sword, and the army of the Confederacy is recruited from all classes of citizens. Mr. West, for example, has left his publishing business, and entered the military service. It is creditable to the industry of the people that under such circumstances there should be any publishing business to transact. What is now written, though necessarily hurried and imperfect, gives promise of a brilliant future, when the people of the Confederate States will have a literature worthy of their glory in arms and of their descent.

* A Manual of military instruction, by Professor Gilham, of the Virginia Military Institute, is a profusely illustrated volume of about seven hundred pages, printed by Messrs. Evans and Cogswell, of Charleston, and had it been entrusted to a first-class London house it could not, under the most favourable circumstances, have been turned out more creditably. Professor Gilham does not undertake to treat of the whole art of war, but "to aid the inexperienced so far as to enable them to become familiar with such principles and practical details of the military science as are absolutely essential to those who would be competent officers, whether in the line or staff." Assuredly warriors ought to serve a long apprenticeship. A raw recruit may be turned into an infantry soldier in two months; but a glance at this work will convince the most sceptical that for an officer an elaborate course of instruction is desirable, and that it must take years of service to turn a raw officer into a skilful commander.

† The Royal Ape is a dramatic poem of which the theme is the Federal defeat at the first battle of Manassas and the consequent confusion and dismay in Washington. There are here and there some vigorous passages, but what might have been a smart satire is marred by inexcusable personality. It is to be regretted that even in an avowed fiction a Southern writer should attempt to cast the slightest slur upon the domestic life of Mr. Lincoln. No doubt Mr. Lincoln has been guilty of the most atrocious crimes against the South; that he is the patron of Butler, Gilmore, Milroy, Turchin, and McNeil; that he has endeavoured to stir up a servile war; and that he has brutally violated the sanctity of Southern homes. No doubt Mr. Lincoln is the tool of the faction that has belied the South for half a century. But for such offences gallant men cannot retaliate in kind. If Mr. Lincoln were personally immoral—which he is not—it would still be indecorous to drag his private life into a public controversy.

‡ War, a poem by Mr. John H. Hewitt, betrays a want of finish, but the author is unjust to himself in describing it as "bordering on doggerel." We will, in vindication of our favourable opinion, quote two passages from it, which are fair specimens of the whole. The first tells its own story, and needs no introduction:—

In time to come, when Peace again shall smile,
The lisping child may ask whose sturdy arm
First fell'd a foeman on Virginia's soil
And died a martyr in the opening storm?
'Twas Jackson—he who shot young Ellsworth down,
And then was slain, all covered with renown.
A valiant man was he—a patriot bold;
No suppliant knee he bent, no pow'r of gold
Could buy him o'er, no threats could make him quail.
When he resolved he did not dream of fail!
When Alexandria's streets rang with the yells
Of armed foes—as if a thousand hells
Had open'd their gates and let their devils run,
The Southern flag streamed brightly in the sun
Above his house. He'd sworn that he should pay
The forfeit of his life who tore't away.
The daring Ellsworth, with his Zouave band,
Climb'd to the roof, and with unflinching hand
Tore down the "rebel" ensign, trampled on
The glorious bars, and claim'd the trophy won.
Flush'd with his victory—burden'd with his prize,
He stood before the madden'd patriot's eyes;
Quicker than thought a bullet made its path,
And Ellsworth fell beneath the hero's wrath.
A moment—and a score of bullets flew.
Felling the patriot; bayonets pierced him through.
His gallant soul departed with a sigh,
Scorn on his lips, defiance in his eye.
Thus fell brave Jackson; many as brave a man
Has since that day fall'n in the battle's van;
Many a youth, whose thirsting spirit drank
At Glory's fount in conflict's foremost rank.
Thousands still live whose dying shout will be:
"Our homes all ruins—or our country free!"

The following stanzas are supposed to be addressed by a veteran to a recruit, who is disheartened by the victory gained by General McClellan at Hanover Court-house:

An old man stood upon the battle-field
When all was still, save dying warriors' groans:
The lips of many a gallant youth were seal'd,
While there lay gaping flesh and shatter'd bones
In dread array; skulls riven, limbs torn apart,
And glassy eyes that tolt of madden'd brain;
While some would on a pool their glances dart,
And cry for "Water!" o'er and o'er again.

* Manual of Instruction for the Volunteers and Militia of the Confederate States, by William Gilham. Richmond: West and Johnston.

† The Royal Ape: A Dramatic Poem. Richmond: West and Johnston.

‡ War: A Poem, with Copious Notes, founded on the Revolution of 1861-62 (up to the Battles before Richmond, inclusive). By John H. Hewitt. Richmond: West and Johnston.

A sorrowing youth spoke out to that old sire,
Who mused, and ran his fingers thro' his hair :
"Our cause is lost, soon will the flame expire ;
Nought have we now but sorrow and despair."
The vet'ran stood erect, with haughty pride
He scann'd the doubting youth, and thus replied :

Tho' our roofs be on fire, tho' our rivers run blood,
Tho' their flag's on the hill, on the plain, on the flood ;
Tho' their bayonets bristle and shots rend the air,
Faint heart ! do not utter the cry of despair !

The red moon looks down on the field of the slain,
The gaunt vulture soars o'er the desolate plain ;
By the lov'd ones that, mantled in glory, lie there,
Arouse from thy stupor and never despair !

We have mountains that lift their grey peaks to the skies,
We have rifles whose crack to the war-yell replies ;
We have sinewy arms, we have souls that will dare :
While these are our safeguards, why, doubter, despair ?

The great God is just, and he blesses the right,
He makes the weak rise like a giant in might.
When he strikes for his home and the tender ones there,
There's hope in each blow, there is shame in despair !

Then, shoulder to shoulder, push on with a tread
That will shake the loose earth that is heap'd o'er the dead ;
Bear the torch and the sword to the proud tyrant's lair ;
Let the wild battle shout drown the wail of despair.

Despair—while the old man can flourish his staff ?
Despair—while the boy at th' invader can laugh ?
Despair—while our daughters and wives kneel in prayer,
And our mothers scream out "Don't despair—don't despair?"

Go preach to the rock on the lone ocean shore,
And tell it to battle the billows no more !
While there's life, there is hope—for the death-blow prepare.
It is glorious to battle—it is base to despair !

The last book on our list is

* "CAUSE AND CONTRAST."

This little work, which was mentioned in an article we published from the Richmond Enquirer in our issue of the 16th of April, is intended as an introduction to the history of the Second War of Independence, and it treats upon the institution of slavery as it exists in the Confederate States and upon the disruption of the Union. We need not suppose that any Englishman, from perusing this work, will change his views as to the abstract question of the ethical right of slavery, whilst we are confident that no honest man can read and consider the array of facts adduced by our author without feeling utterly disgusted with the gross injustice that has been done the South by the vile slanders of the North—and, let us add, by the thoughtless manner in which we Europeans gave credence to the wicked and absurd inventions of New England. What Mr. MacMahon now tells with much force and perspicuity the civilised world has been learning since 1861 ; but there is no conceivable reason why these things should not have been known twenty years ago, and so have made it impossible for the Boston Barnums to have succeeded, as they did, in duping us.

The Abolitionists unequivocally consign the slaveholders to everlasting perdition. Mr. Newman Hall, who is a representative of Abolitionism at home and in the United States, has placed on record his solemn conviction that the Southern slaveholders are irretrievably damned. So far as social intercourse is concerned, he treats them as lepers, saying that he will not admit them into his house. In point of religion he regards them as heretics, declaring that he would not receive them at the Lord's table. And further, he avows that for them there is no salvation, that there is no hope of turning them from the error of their ways ; and therefore he, a Christian minister, will not aid them with his prayers. Now mark the inevitable conclusion to which we are driven if we accept this doctrine of damnation. Slavery is not a Confederate invention. Mr. MacMahon reminds his readers that it has existed in all ages and in all countries. The Egyptian Pharaohs, the Hebrew Patriarchs, the free republics of Greece, Rome the sometime mistress of the world, all adopted it. Nor did it cease with the advent of Christianity. It continued in Europe for centuries, and was only done away with by the gradual enfranchisement of the serfs and vassals. And be it observed, this was the slavery of white men, not the subordination of an inferior race. Moreover England and New England have grown rich by slavedealing, and it is only within the memory of living men that we Englishmen ceased to be slaveholders, and that the Yankees reluctantly, and under the compulsion of Southern votes in Congress, gave up the profitable traffic in negroes. What follows ? Why, if the Abolition creed enunciated by Mr. Newman Hall is sound doctrine, then we must look upon mankind—slaves perhaps excepted—as damned, until these latter times ; we must not believe in the salvation of our forefathers ; and for example, we must hold that both Wesley and Whitfield, being slaveholders, were impious personages, who were not fit to come to the Lord's table—for whom Christians ought not to have prayed, and who (and surely this is the utmost depth of degradation) were not worthy to enter the house of such a person as Mr. Newman Hall ! We may agree to differ with the Confederates if we choose, about the expediency of continuing the system of negro slavery, and we may, without offence, think the system wrong because we think it is no longer expedient ; but we cannot, without discarding the Bible and ignoring history, regard it as a sin, or as a crime that should make us shun intercourse, personal or national, with slaveholders.

Our author dwells upon the inferiority of the negro, and whatever may be our opinion as to the propriety of his emancipation, we must confess that this is a strong plea in defence of his enslavement. Without entering into the physical distinctions of the races, the history of the negro is sufficient to stamp him with inferiority. In all ages and in all countries, even in his native land, he has been a slave. The difference between the negro in the Confederate States and in Africa, is that in one case he is a civilised Christian slave, and in the other a savage heathen slave. So far as civil freedom is concerned, he would be no better off in Africa, and in every other respect he is much better off in the South. All travellers concur in describing the negro as naturally savage ; and as our author observes, the race has done nothing, literally nothing, to distinguish itself, or to make history ; its existence has been so far a perfect blank :—

The great sandy desert, called "Sahara," joyless, soundless, lifeless—is not more barren of objects to interest the naturalist, than is the negro race of incidents interesting to the philosopher or the historian. Having "never invented a reasoned theological system, discovered an alphabet, framed a grammatical language, nor made the least step in science or art,"—as Hamilton Smith expresses it—we have to depend upon observation, and the writings of travellers, naturalists, and men of science, for information relative to it.

This manifest inferiority of the race is, we know, rather a painful subject to those who have been taught that human equality is inseparable from human happiness. Now, the negro has a wonderful capacity for enjoyment, and we believe that the slaves in the Confederate States are the most joyous and happiest people on earth. Again, the negro is, as well as the white man, fit to become a member of a Christian Church. His physical and intellectual inferiority does not make him unhappy on earth, or in any way exclude him from participating in the hope of future blessedness. There is nothing cruel or unlovely in the Providential plan.

Mr. MacMahon replies to the charges of Southerners ill-treating their slaves. The events of the last three years have rendered any such refutation almost superfluous, yet there may be a few persons to whom it will be useful. When the North undertook this war it was in the expectation that the slaves would rise in revolt. Nor was the anticipation unreasonable. San Domingo proved how readily the savage instincts of the black race might be aroused. Was it likely the negroes in the South, instigated by the malignant arts of New England and assured of protection in the Federal lines after they had perpetrated crimes of murder and rapine, would remain loyal ? That they have done so is astounding testimony of the kindness with which they have been treated, and of the strong bonds of love that bind them to their masters. Our author, after showing the advantages that the Southern slave enjoys, draws a gloomy picture of the evils that co-exist with our free labour system in Europe. Whilst denying that such evils are the necessary result of free labour, we cannot gainsay his assertions. We must confess that our streets swarm with fallen women, that our hospitals are crowded with victims of vice, that crime abounds amongst us, that our working classes too often end a life of labour as paupers, that our peasantry are worse housed than the farm horses, and that our rule in Ireland has not been productive of happiness. We are sorry that Mr. MacMahon should hold our nobles and rich men responsible for these things, for the corruption and tyranny of our upper classes exist not, save in the imagination of Mr. John Bright. In this country wealth is worthily employed ; the jewelled hand of aristocracy is stretched out to help the wretched, and peers labour zealously in back slums and alleys to ameliorate the condition of the poor. Still, we must not complain too loudly of the injustice of Mr. MacMahon. He unfairly accuses us of being responsible for evils in our social system that do exist, whilst we have unfairly accused the Southerners of being responsible for imaginary evils.

We shall not follow Mr. MacMahon in the second part of his work. We suppose no one now doubts the lawfulness and necessity of secession ; and how the North obliged the South to strike the first blow by its infamous duplicity with respect to Fort Sumter, has already been told in our columns in the words of President Davis. We are wearied with recounting the hideous atrocities of the Federals, but one we may here notice, because it shows that from the first the Lincoln Government resolved on a policy of brutality. Mrs. Greenhow, now in London, the widow of the late Professor Greenhow, and formerly principal translator in the United States Department of State, was arrested without any warrant, except the order of Mr. Seward or one of his colleagues. Mrs. Greenhow wrote to Mr. Seward, and said :—"We read in history that the poor Marie Antoinette had a paper torn from her bosom by lawless hands, and that even a change of linen had to be effected in sight of her brutal captors. It is my sad experience to record even more revolting outrages than that ; for during the first days of my imprisonment, whatever necessity forced me to seek my chamber, a detective stood sentinel at the open door." Nor is the motive of this shameful policy a secret. The Republican faction feared a constitutional reconstruction of the Union, and therefore determined, by perpetuating the most horrid brutalities, to render it impossible.

A PARODY ON THE BIBLE.*

The New Orleans Picayune of August 27 says, "It is significant of the degeneracy of the times that a New York publisher has printed a Bible burlesque 'in language imitative of the Scripture style,' entitled 'The New Gospel of Peace.'" This infamous parody has been republished in England. We will not pollute our columns by describing, much less by quoting from it.

THE CAMPAIGN ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

NEW ORLEANS, August 22.

SINCE I last wrote you Herron's men have come down the river from Port Hudson, and are now in camp at Greenville, a little way above this city. Part of Ord's corps is encamped on the swamp two miles this side of Carrollton, and the rest, with a few negro companies, are at Camp Parapet and across the river, within seven or eight miles of New Orleans. Altogether, the force is nearly, if not quite as large as Banks's army was before he made the advance across Berwick Bay last April. These men are recovering from the fatigues incident to the protracted sieges of Port Hudson and Vicksburg. Camped so closely together, they seem like a large army, and every day we hear in the streets that they are going to Mobile, to Brownsville, Texas, or across Berwick Bay again. None of these movements will take place at present. The navy, the transports, and a much larger army are all waiting before another Federal advance begins. Meanwhile we have advices from all the threatened points, and we learn that the people there are preparing for resistance to the feared invasion.

From the three threatened points we had news, almost in the same hour, yesterday. From Mobile, a schooner from Pascagoula, across Lake Pontchartrain, brings us late Mobile papers—the first we have received for many days. The news is not important. The Mobilians are confident the gathering of Federal troops here is for the purpose of an attack on their city, and they announce themselves prepared to meet it. From Brownsville, Texas, a schooner arriving with refugees, (as they are called), sent to this city by the United States Consul at Matamoras, we learn that General Bee also looks for a Federal attack. He has ordered that no more cotton shall be brought to Brownsville, but hereafter it is to be taken across the river at Rio Grande city, one hundred miles or more above. Enormous quantities have been brought down and sold on account of the Confederate Government or for individuals, at 20 cents per pound, payable in Mexican silver or in foreign goods. There have been from one hundred to one hundred and fifty foreign vessels lying at the mouth of the Rio Grande nearly all the time, for months past, and the Federal fleet at that point has been daily favoured with a view of numberless lighters, coming down with cotton and going back with arms, ammunition, everything in fact needed to carry on the war—in the small town of Matamoras. At present, as you are aware already, nearly all the Texan troops are in Louisiana prepared to meet Banks if he again crosses Berwick Bay, and equally ready to move rapidly into Texas when that State is threatened. Duff's battalion is at Brownsville ; Wood's regiment is at Goliad and King's rancho ; Lockett's 3rd Texas regiment is at Galveston ; De Brays' is in part at Galveston and the rest at Houston ; Holley's men are at Corpus Christi and at Port Lavaca ; Gurley's regiment is at Waco ; Speight's battery is at Sabine Pass, and Fox's battery is at Brownsville. These troops are scattered about for the convenience of feeding them, and they can readily be concentrated at Brownsville or at Galveston, if either of those points is threatened.

The boasted "cutting in twain of the Confederacy" by the opening of the Mississippi, and the temporary suspension of army movements in the East, have led to the formation of a large Confederate army, and to a vigorous conscription on the west side of the Mississippi. Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas are gathering and massing men. General Kirby Smith is fortifying at Trinity on Black River. The war has scarcely touched these States as yet—for in Louisiana it has thus far been only a war of robbery and plunder, and has covered but a portion of the State. It will be a long while before these States are conquered or driven into the Union ; and in the case of Texas that "long while" will be never.

The Federal movement from this point may be towards Mobile for the sake of the cotton, or to the Rio Grande to stop the contraband trade at that in-and-outlet ; or to the western part of this State, again, for the double purpose of securing the very small crops to be made this season, and to force at the point of the bayonet the election of one or two Massachusetts men as loyal representatives of the loyal State of Louisiana in the next Congress of the loyal United States. Once more, however, the movement will not be made, I think, at present. It will require some time for Banks and his men to heal the sores accumulated during their recent "victories."

Pending the next movement—which is a source of far more anxiety to Banks and his army than to any one else—the Federals have turned their attention with renewed zeal and earnestness to the picking up of pennies. General Banks has just issued the following order:—

Head-quarters, Department of the Gulf.
New Orleans, August 17.

Special Orders, No 202.
[Extract.]

7. The several banks and banking corporations in the City of New Orleans will, without delay, pay over to Colonel S. B. Holabird, Chief Quartermaster, or to such officers of the Quartermaster's Department as he may designate, all moneys in their possession belonging to or standing upon their books to the credit of any person registered as an enemy of the United States, or engaged in any manner in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called "Confederate States," or who shall have been or may hereafter be convicted of rendering any aid or comfort to the enemies of the United States; and all moneys in their possession or standing upon their books to the credit of any corporation, association, or pretended government in hostility to the United States.

These funds will be held and accounted for by the Quartermaster's Department, subject to the further adjudication of the Government of the United States.

8. The Chief Quartermaster will require Messrs. Ernest Quertier and Co., E. Rochereau and Co., Anatol Cousin, Abat, Generes and Co., and J. Levois and Co., and all other persons refusing to comply with the provisions of General Orders Nos. 55 and 105, of 1862, and No. 7 of 1863, from these Head-quarters, at once to pay over to such officer of the Quartermaster's Department as he may designate the amounts of the assessments imposed by the said orders upon them as subscribers to the loan raised for the defence of New Orleans against the rightful authority of the United States. By command of MAJOR-GEN. BANKS.

RICHARD B. IRWIN, A. A.-General.

This Order calls for $428,000 due by the banks of New Orleans to depositors now registered as enemies to the United States, and the amount includes $73,000 due by the Citizens Bank to the Confederate Government. The banks do not know who of their depositors are "registered enemies" and ask to be furnished with a list. The deposits were made mostly, if not wholly, in Confederate money, and the collecting agent says he will take nothing but currency or greenbacks—thus actually defrauding the stockholders by confiscating their property instead of that of the "registered enemies." The stockholders care nothing about this. The Federals have rendered the banks nearly worthless by withdrawing their coin, forcing them into liquidation, and by totally destroying the business of the city. A large amount of these stocks is owned at the North and in Europe, and poor people here who hold currency in small amounts will suffer by-and-by. Never mind! Let the banks go—with the books and pictures stolen from private houses, ostensibly to found a public library, but really to send North—with the wasted plantations, with the ruined crops, with the stolen and murdered negroes, with the total destruction, worse than death, that everywhere follows the footprints of the Federal armies in the South.

The second clause of the Order refers to the uncollected balance assessed by Butler upon those who contributed to the fund of the Committee of Public Safety for the defence of New Orleans against a Federal invasion.

Everything relating to restoration, to the suppression of rebellion, to the establishment of Federal rule over the whole country, means one thing only—money. Money, for the almost beggared Federal Government—money for the army of thieves and beggars who have left the shoe-shops of New England to command companies and regiments, and to fill Federal offices in a State that has no sympathy with the Federal Government, and where only a small part of the population is held in subjection by the iron rule of martial law. No matter how fine the phrases, how patriotic and pious the proclamations, all this talk about restoring the South to the Union means "money;" and when the South is stripped and ruined, all talk about the Union and the negro will cease. The South can then go and be—happy.

The New York papers may have given you the official correspondence relative to the Federal occupation of the city of Natchez, Mississippi. The Federals call it a capture. Natchez is on the river, 265 miles above New Orleans and 110 below Vicksburg, with a population, before the war, of about 12,000, and was one of the liveliest commercial cities between here and St. Louis. General Ransom, with a force of infantry of 1,200 men, and Battery F of the 2nd Illinois Artillery, landed above Natchez at 4 o'clock in the evening of July 13. He marched his men down, stationing pickets at all the roads leading out of the place, and as there was no opposition whatever, he walked in, raised the flag of his Government over the Court-house, and took possession of the city. From friends who have been there and back again since the occupation, I learn some particulars that have not been published.

Ransom found in the Post Office and Telegraph Station a large amount of correspondence, not official, of which he took possession. He found in one store 312 new Austrian muskets, and his men, in prowling about the town, discovered in one of the cemeteries a new-made grave indicating the resting-place (so said the head-board) of "Major Parrott, wounded at Vicksburg, and died at Natchez, aged 46 years." The name was suspicious, and the exhumed body proved to be a fine new Parrott gun! There were no defences in the place, and beyond a few arms taken from citizens, the Austrian muskets and the Parrott comprise all the captures of war material there. Ransom heard that an ammunition train had crossed the river on flat-boats to General Kirby Smith, and he sent a steamboat-load of troops across, in time, it is stated, to cut off the rear of the train and to destroy several thousand rounds of ammunition.

Logan had been for some days hovering in the rear of Natchez, and only the night before Ransom's arrival, he crossed the Mississippi with 1,200 cavalry, the horses swimming the river, while four pieces of artillery were carried across on flats. These pieces, by-the-by, were cast from plantation bells, which have been largely devoted to this purpose throughout the Confederacy. In Natchez, there were about thirty Confederate officers and soldiers at home on furlough. Among them were Captain George Rawlston, Tom Harrison, and Frederick A. Boyer, of Connor's battery, and George Nichols, of Logan's cavalry. Captain Rawlston was riding in his own carriage to a place two miles out of the city, with an officer whose name I could not learn, when the carriage was stopped and both were taken prisoners. The few prisoners taken were at once paroled.

Mr. A. L. Wilson's fine house on top of the hill was taken by Ransom for head-quarters. Messrs. Stanton and Stockman's warehouse was devoted to commissary stores. Every carriage horse, riding horse, and pony in the city was taken by the Federals for army use. The Confederates have made Natchez the principal point lately for receiving the cattle from the other side. Almost every evening, for months past, hundreds of cattle have been driven to a point a few miles above on the opposite side, and men on horseback have followed and guided the swimming cattle over the river. Several thousand head were crossed in this way, even after the fall of Vicksburg. When Ransom arrived there were about 1,500 head of cattle in Mr. Bingham's pastures. These were guarded by twenty or thirty men, who "vamosed" at the approach of the Federals. Ransom issued the most stringent orders, forbidding the plunder of private houses, and the property of the citizens has been respected. It was even said that the fruit hung over the walls and fences untouched. You can understand all this. There is scarcely a Southern city which contains so much wealth, refinement, and what is called "good society," as does Natchez. There is hardly an adult there who has not travelled and who is not known abroad. The pillage and destruction of this place, as in the case of Jackson and other Southern cities, would have created a very great sensation in London and Paris, as well as in America. Ransom knows this. His courtesy to the people has even made him popular. His men are spoken of as exceedingly well-behaved. The citizens are all strong secessionists, and they do not conceal their sentiments; but Ransom permitted the mayor and authorities to remain in and exercise their offices, and Confederate money continues to circulate in the markets, shops, and among the people. Indeed, they have no other money, and when that is gone, or when its circulation is prohibited, there will be much suffering in that city.

Grant came down from Vicksburg and made a visit for a day or two. More Federal troops are coming down on the boats. The collectors of internal and infernal revenue, the sharks, the thieves, the adventurers, the "agents" of all sorts, are preparing to go up from here. The work of "restoration" has commenced; and here, as in every instance where the Federal power has secured a foothold, there will be a scene of utter ruin and desolation—another Confederate corpse—one more Federal "restoration,"—beyond all hope of resurrection.

One of the late Federal Memphis newspapers says that the baggage of sundry Federal army officers going North from this city by steamboat up river was examined at that place, and the custom-house officials there pretend to be surprised that these officers' trunks contained large quantities of silver spoons, teapots and milk-jugs. It would have been much more astonishing if nothing of the sort had been found. Thieves carry their booty with them when they are going home. The police and the marines are searching the city now for a volunteer commander of a gunboat who is suspected of stealing the plate from Dr. Duncan's house at Natchez. This search is not so much for the thief who stole a "rebel's" silver, as because the same officer loaded his boat with cotton, which he sold here for six thousand dollars. A few evenings since, three men in Federal soldiers' uniform committed a highway robbery. Not long after, a Government official was knocked down in a street in this city at night and was robbed of a large sum of money. There was never so little security to life and property in New Orleans as there is now under the law-and-order rule of the Federal Government.

In the case of the slave, shot because he tried to escape the negro press-gang, a verdict of wilful murder has been returned by the coroner's jury against the negro sergeant who shot the slave.

Mr. H. M. Renthrop has been found guilty of the murder of his slave George, though the only evidence introduced by the prosecution was slave testimony, which is illegal; and though the defence proved clearly that the planter acted in self-defence, and that the slave witnesses were half a mile from the scene when the alleged killing of the negro occurred. Most singular of all is the fact that the court, after finding Mr. Renthrop guilty of murder, offered to accept bail to the amount of $25,000.

General Gardner is now with his wife and daughter in a private house where ex-Governor Mouton is also residing. They are all prisoners. There are no movements indicating the release of the officers from Port Hudson. Whenever it is necessary to move these officers from one part of the city to another they are paraded through the streets under an armed nigger guard. In fact the Federals seem reckless of public opinion here, and in every act render themselves as offensive as possible. In the absence of other amusements, a Federal band took "Yankee Doodle" to a select audience of negroes on one of the public squares two or three evenings in the week.

The Confederate steamboat Grand Duke is reported to have been destroyed by fire on Red River last week.

The news may reach you by other sources, but a schooner arrived here yesterday, six days from Tampico, and reported the occupation of that place, August 9, by the French forces.

NEW ORLEANS, August 29.

For several days past there has been an unusual activity in this Department. A few regiments with large quantities of stores have been sent to Ship Island. More stores have been sent to Baton Rouge, Port Hudson, and Donaldsonville up the river; and almost every night a train heavily laden with provisions and ammunition has gone by railway to Brashear City. All these things indicated an immediate movement—not necessarily upon Mobile, as the Ship Island concentration would suggest, nor towards Texas; though the accumulation of large quantities of stores at different points, and quartermasters' advertisements for vessels for charter show that all the vessels in the Department will be needed shortly to carry soldiers and horses to some point on the Gulf.

While people have been puzzling themselves about the precise point to be first attacked by the Federal Army of the Gulf, the next movement of General Banks has been indicated to him by circumstances. His next advance is not one of his own choosing, but of compulsion. So far as Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas are concerned, the opening of the Mississippi and the division of the Confederacy have resulted in the concentration of a by no means small army west of the Mississippi. These men have been massed in Western Louisiana. Their camps have extended from Alexandria on Red River to the extreme limit of the Federal lines, which extend no further westward in this State than to Brashear City on Berwick Bay.

The Confederates have been near enough to inform themselves daily and thoroughly with regard to all the Federal movements in this Department. Only two or three days ago two Confederate officers came across the lake above Brashear, changed their uniforms for citizen's clothes at a farm house, and made a personal examination of the numbers and position of the Federal force on the Lafourche. Now and then, a Texan deserter from Colonel Major's advance has crossed Berwick Bay, and has come into the Federal camp at Brashear. From these men, and from other sources, Banks has learned enough about the Confederates across the Bay to convince him of the necessity of making a movement in that direction if he would secure the very small amount of territory he holds in this State from the disasters attendant upon another invasion. For several days he has been preparing to cross Berwick Bay, once more to "drive out the rebels," and to make one more attempt to recover a portion of the Attakapas country, which is already reckoned by Northern Abolition journals as one of Banks's "successes" in the South. The Confederates have prepared for the expected invasion of their territory. They have sent into Texas every able-bodied negro not needed for labour in the camps or upon the defences. Hundreds of mule teams have been for weeks employed in hauling the salt mined on Petite Anse Island, near New Iberia, into Texas. This salt mine is worth more to the Confederacy than a gold mine. It was not discovered till after the outbreak of the war that there were salt springs on the island, and in attempting to improve one of them it was discovered that there was a substratum of pure rock salt, forming undoubtedly the base of the whole island. Works were at once erected, and while the Northern papers were prating about the scarcity of salt in the South, enormous quantities from these mines were sent throughout the whole Confederacy.

When Banks made his march through the country to Red River last April, he sent a force to destroy the works erected at the mines. They burned the buildings and destroyed the steam-engine and machinery, but so soon as the Confederates recovered the country they resumed operations, and by blasting and mining have secured at least sufficient salt to cure all the Texas beef needed by the Confederate army west of the Mississippi the coming winter.

And while Banks has been preparing for another raid along the Teche, the Confederates have not waited to see the head of his advancing column without making a movement of their own. The last deserters who came into the Federal lines reported that as soon as the Confederate officers returned from their tour of inspection in the Lafourche, the whole column began to move from the New Iberia down to Berwick Bay. The plan was to divide the force near Franklin, sending part of the men across Flat Lake to Napoleonville for a double movement towards Plaquemine on the Mississippi, and down to Weitzel's brigade near Thibodeaux. The rest of the force was to concentrate opposite Brashear City to repel Banks's advance, should he attempt to cross the Bay.

That this movement has been made as indicated is quite evident from the fact that very early yesterday morning the advance by way of Napoleonville fired upon Weitzel's pickets above Thibodeaux and drove them into their camp. There was a panic, of course. A special messenger came in to Weitzel who was in this city, and a telegraphic despatch later in the day announced that 8,000 men had crossed, that they would fight Weitzel's brigade, and then move upon Bayou Boeuf and Brashear, "gobbling" the two regiments there and carrying away the immense stores accumulated at that point.

This would be only a repetition of the brilliant movement made by a Confederate force of less than 1,000 men only a few weeks ago. There are reasons that operate against such a movement now. There are four or five gunboats in Berwick Bay which could shell and destroy Brashear before the Confederates could carry away the stores accumulated there. It is noticeable that they crossed to the Lafourche this time by a route inaccessible to the gunboats. They were and are out of harm's way till they choose to risk an engagement with Weitzel's brigade. Meanwhile, it was reported last night that a force was already in Plaquemine, and we may expect to hear to-day that a battery is firing upon the boats passing up and down the Mississippi river.

The Confederate force engaged in the new movement consists of Walker's division, Henry McCulloch's division, Green's brigade of cavalry, Major's brigade of cavalry—a total force, as estimated, of 5,000 cavalry, from 5,000 to 8,000 infantry, and 75 pieces of artillery. It is the most formidable Confederate army yet concentrated in Western Louisiana. We do not know to-day how many men have crossed into Lafourche. Enough are on the other side to hold the defences at Camp Bisland, three miles above Pattersonville, on the Teche, against the advance of the Federals.

Banks had his first fight in Louisiana at Camp Bisland last spring. It was a short but bloody affair. The Confederate force at that point then comprised only a few hundred men, and Banks advanced with a column numbering nearly 23,000 well-armed troops. They left along the line of the Teche and sent back to the hospital at Brashear nearly as many killed and wounded as there were Confederates in the field against them during the entire march to Alexandria. Indeed the whole route of the Federal advance to Red River is marked by graveyards. There are a very different army and far more formidable fortifications on that route now; and if Banks sends an army through that country again, the United States Paymaster's duties in that division next quarter-day will be exceedingly light.

The Confederate advance was undoubtedly for the purpose of preventing Banks from making an immediate movement upon Mobile or towards Texas, as he intended. A mere raid through Lafourche would be otherwise objectionless, as only a few weeks have gone by since Taylor's men completely stripped the whole region from Donaldsonville on the Mississippi to Berwick Bay, closing the campaign by a general clearing out of everything in Brashear City. The presence of a large force close to and actually within the Federal lines will warn Banks of the impolicy of withdrawing his troops from Louisiana at present, and thus exposing New Orleans even to the danger of an invasion. Meanwhile, the Confederates, who are now hovering about Weitzel's brigade, near Thibodeaux, and in the rear of two or three towns occupied by the Federals, on the Mississippi river, are well aware of the danger of an advance of Augur's Division (which Weitzel is to command) now at Baton Rouge. This force could cross to Donaldsonville and march down the Lafourche Bayou road upon the Confederates. But Colonel Jim Major's men, who are believed to be the invaders, are all mounted on good horses, and have no doubt secured a safe retreat to the Teche again, if a retreat should be necessary. We look for lively days in that direction very soon, and we do not look immediately for the feared and expected movement upon Mobile.

Banks has commenced another wholesale "gobble" of negroes for his army. I enclose his order for a general black conscription. You will note that he proposes to conscript the slaves in such number as may be required for the military defence of the Department—that is, he intends to raise a black army large enough to leave here while he withdraws his white soldiers for operations elsewhere. God help us all when we are exposed to the "defence" of these bayonet-armed slaves!

TRADE IN SHIPS OF WAR.

The following, from the Times' City Article of 23rd, is the most concise and complete exposition of the common-sense view of this subject that we have yet seen in print:—

Much surprise is excited among the impartial merchants in the city at the doctrines promulgated by casual writers from day to day on the question of neutral obligations and the Liverpool iron-clads. The international law on the subject, as the commercial world at present understand it, is, that according to all the statutes respectively by the United States and England, and the decisions of their Superior Courts, vessels of war may be built here for any State, whether belligerent or otherwise, that chooses to order them, provided they are not built and sent to sea with the intention that British subjects should use them for hostile purposes. This being the law recognised by both countries, the natural impression would be that a strict regard for neutrality would induce us to observe it to the very letter, and that at all events even those who might consider the condition of the law too lax, and that it would be expedient for us to alter it before we are certain that the United States are prepared to make a similar alteration, would at least insist that the Government should not to favour any party stir a step against it, or outside of it, until it had been duly changed by Parliament. Yet writers are to be found who declare that this scrupulous adherence to our law of neutrality would be "an offence against neutrality," and that if such vessels are allowed to depart the United States will have a title to complain—a statement which simply amounts to an assertion that we shall violate our obligations to them if we act upon their own admitted laws of neutrality whenever the operation of such laws does not happen to be in their favour. The aim of all these persons would appear to be not to promote but to prevent the exercise of neutrality. They make no demand that measures should be enforced for stopping the supply of munitions of war to the Northern States, which now constitutes one of our important branches of trade, nor to the enticing of British subjects from Ireland and elsewhere to recruit the Northern armies. The Confederates may be shot down by English-made cannon, but the Federals must not have their cotton and tea seized by English-built ships; and all kinds of sophistical and special pleading is resorted to to establish some fanciful distinctions between these respective classes of belligerent supplies, although it is plain that we enter a path of danger the moment we attempt refinements of that description. In matters of this sort the only safe plan must be to declare that we are ready to build or make any instruments for which we can find customers to pay us, even including a supply of Greek fire if it should be wished for. Even the Federals themselves scarcely go so far in their pretensions as some Englishmen are found to go for them; and only three weeks back the New York Journal of Commerce admitted that if England stopped the iron-clads it would be only fair she should stop the supply of arms and ammunition to themselves. As to the argument that an international law to prevent vessels being built for a belligerent might at a future time prove highly beneficial to ourselves, all that can be said with regard to it is that there will be time enough to consider it when the United States have signified their wish to change their present law, since there can be few who will suppose that, if we now without some guarantee set an opposite precedent, that precedent will be held sacred in our favour, supposing at any time we should be at war with them. There would be no objection to a discussion of the whole matter in Parliament, where the paramount necessity of keeping open our trading rights, and of not allowing them to be sacrificed to suit the desires of a Government to avoid temporary disquietude, would be duly argued; but it is felt by many persons that these constant exhortations to the Ministry to stretch or override the actual law in anticipation of Parliamentary action are likely to prove very injurious, and also that they bear an unpleasant resemblance to the views of the Federal politicians who are ready utterly to disregard every point of their own Constitution on the plea of exigency. If there is true impartiality in any circle in the world, it is among the traders of the city of London. Merchants cannot afford to take sides. They want neutrality in its rigid sense—not a neutrality that is to be set aside or relaxed when one of two parties threatens war if we are stubborn. It may be remarked, moreover, that among our well-informed merchants there is no sentiment even of concealed partisanship. They have their opinion of the Federal conduct of the war, and they express it, but they do not fancy that the South loves us more than the North, or suppose that Messrs. Mason and Slidell, and those that they represent, have changed the views they have proclaimed against England for the last twenty years. Neither do they forget that, come what may throughout the future, all our great trading relations with America must as heretofore be with the North. But they know the Americans well enough to see that just in proportion as we give way to any unjust pretensions or manifest the slightest desire to purchase peace by timid words or acts, so do we encourage their aggressive tendencies, and beget the very danger it is wished to deprecate. When it was lately sought on high authority to frighten us into a seizure of the iron-clads—with or without law—on the ground that their departure would be a signal for the United States to attack us, a blow was struck at the cause of peace which it would be difficult to repair. Every one must have noticed that the wild threats against this country with which the New York press inflame their ignorant and credulous readers have gained strength with every concession made, while the submission to France in face of her bold defiance of all their most cherished ideas and dogmas is developed precisely to a similar extent. We received some civility after the affair of the Trent, and people in the city, remembering the tone of all their correspondence at that period, and contrasting it with that which they get at present, feel they have reason to apprehend that if the cry of concession for expediency sake be suffered to increase, the peril will become beyond control. A system which tends to stimulate the worst points of the Northern character is more cruel to the North even than it is hurtful to ourselves, and hence it is among the real friends of the respectable portion of the American public that the greatest regret is felt at any absence of dignity that may be betrayed on this side.

THE CONFEDERATE CAPTURES ON THE RAPPAHANNOCK.

(From the Richmond Dispatch, August 26.)

From a participant we have obtained some particulars of the capture of the Federal gunboats Satellite and Reliance, at Stingray Point, mouth of the Rappahannock, on Saturday night last. The expedition, numbering some sixty men, under command of Lieutenant John Taylor Wood, Confederate States Navy, left Richmond on Wednesday, the 12th of August, and proceeded to the Rappahannock, where preparations were at once made for the work which was so successfully completed on Saturday night. Having secured four open boats, the expedition embarked on Saturday night, and proceeded to the point designated, which they reached about half-past twelve o'clock. On approaching the boats they were hailed by a negro guard, to whom they replied satisfactorily, and in a few moments were under the bows of the boats, cutting away the nettings and clearing the way for boarding the Yankee crafts. The crews having in the meantime become aroused offered resistance, but they were so taken by surprise at the audacity of the undertaking that they were soon overcome by the gallantry and rapid movements of the men under Lieutenant Wood, and finally yielded, surrendering the boats, crews, guns, and everything pertaining to the vessels.

In the night we had three men wounded, including Lieutenant Hoge and Midshipman Cook. The enemy had one killed—a negro—and six or seven wounded. Lieutenant Hoge was severely wounded in the neck in a hand-to-hand fight with the captain of the Reliance. The captain was also wounded. The armament of the Reliance consisted of one 32-pound Parrott gun and a 24-pound howitzer; that of the Satellite of a 32-pound smooth-bore gun and a 12-pound howitzer. Their crews numbered forty men each. They had no opportunity of firing their heavy guns, our men being too close to them when the alarm was given. Among the captured were seven negroes, who, with the rest of the prisoners, are expected to reach Richmond as soon as they can be brought. Our informant left the boats on Sunday morning at Urbanna, on the Rappahannock river, and it is probable that since then they have been run further up that stream.

We saw yesterday, at the office of the chief clerk of the Navy Department, some of the captured trophies, consisting of flags, sextants, glasses, and charts of the rivers and coast of Lower Virginia.

The following is the official report of the affair:—

C. S. S. Satellite, August 23, 1863.—Sir: I am thankful to report to you the capture last night, off the mouth of the Rappahannock, of the United States gunboats Satellite, two guns and forty men, and the Reliance, two guns and forty men. Lieutenant Hoge dangerously wounded.

Midshipman Cook and three men slightly.

Captain Walters, of the Reliance, dangerously wounded, and some seven or eight others of the enemy; one or two killed.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed)

J. TAYLOR WOOD,

Lieutenant Commanding.

Hon. S. R. Mallory, Secretary of the Navy.

(From the Richmond Enquirer, August 29.)

Another brilliant exploit took place last Tuesday, in the Bay, off the mouth of the Rappahannock, which resulted in the capture of three Yankee sailing vessels—the Coquette, Golden Rod, and Twin Brothers. One of the ships was laden with coal, and the other two with anchors and chains. The Golden Rod, drawing too much water, was, in consequence, destroyed, but the other two were safely anchored in a Confederate port. Fifteen Yankees were captured at the same time, and have been received at the Libby prison. Lieutenant Wood has thus secured five prizes and made about ninety prisoners. The last expedition was attended with no loss on our side.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, September 23.

There would at present appear to be no prospect of a reduction in the rate of discount. If a chance shall take place, it will be at or about the time of the payment of the dividends in October, and then it is questioned if it will prove of more than a temporary character. A good deal of reliance is placed upon the large sum to be released by the India Council just before the dividend payments, and this, with the distribution named, will, it is thought, leave considerable totals in the market for employment. We shall, nevertheless, find no doubt, after all, that the great proportion will have been absorbed; and if this surmise shall turn out correct, the balance will not be sufficient to produce any permanent effect. The remarkable course of speculation which is showing itself in the principal second and third class foreign securities will, there is reason to believe, be followed by the introduction of several new miscellaneous companies; and the natural result of this must terminate in sinking capital in a variety of channels, which may or may not, according to circumstances, become immediately reproductive. Trade is likewise steadily advancing, and, despite the difficulties presented by the cotton question, will, it is thought, further increase as the winter approaches. The latest rate this evening for first-class paper in Lombard-street was  $3\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 per cent., but the chief transactions were at the latter quotation. The demand has latterly again become strong at the Stock Exchange, where the prices have ruled from  $3\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 for loans on the best English securities.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The amount of gold sent into the Bank this week has been only £199,000, against which there have been withdrawals to the extent of £105,000, of which £45,000 was for Mauritius and £60,000 for Alexandria. The arrivals of bullion have again been rather extensive, reaching £567,222, of which only £119,935 is from New York and the bulk of the remainder from Australia. The silver market remains very firm, there being an increased demand from Bombay, and the steamer on Friday will take out a large amount. The bar silver brought by the last West India mail has been sold at  $91\frac{1}{2}$ d. per oz., being an advance of about  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. on previous purchases. The Mexican dollars brought by the same vessel have not yet been disposed of, but the price remains nominally at  $5s. 3\frac{1}{2}$ d. per oz. The only gold ships at present known to be on their way from Australia are the Wave of Life with £162,000, and the Wellesley with £131,000.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

In the early part of the week business in the English Securities was tolerably active, and prices were well sustained, though there was no positive improvement, but within the last day or two there has been less animation, and prices have slightly receded. This has been chiefly caused by the receipt of lower quotations from Paris, the decline there being attributed to the unfavourable interpretation of the note of Prince Gortschakoff, with regard to the Polish question. Consols closed this evening at  $93\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{3}{4}$  for money, and  $93\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{3}{4}$  for the account, which, as contrasted with the prices of this day week, is a decline of about  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Exchequer Bills remain very quiet at par to 3s. prem.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The business transacted in American Government and Railway Securities has this week been on an unusually limited scale, the general tone of the recent advices from America tending in a great measure to repress anything like a speculative movement. Yesterday there was not a single transaction recorded, and to-day there have not been more than two or three bargains. The dealings comprise Virginia State Five per Cents., at 49 $\frac{1}{2}$ . Do. Six per Cents., 42 and 41 $\frac{1}{2}$ . Atlantic and Great Western Railway, 78. Do. do. (Pennsylvania Section), 79, 78, and 78 $\frac{1}{2}$ . Erie Shares, \$100, all paid, 73, 74, 75, and 74. Do. Seven per Cents., preference, 70. Illinois Central \$100, \$90 paid, 13, 14, 13, and 12. Do. do. all paid, 77, 76 $\frac{1}{2}$ , 75 $\frac{1}{2}$ , 74, 77, 76 $\frac{1}{2}$ , and 76. New York Central, \$100 Shares, 90, 89, and 90. Panama Railway, Second Mortgage, 102, 101 $\frac{1}{2}$ , and 102. Pennsylvania, First Mortgage, convertible, 73 $\frac{1}{2}$  and 74. Do. do. \$50 Shares, 44.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

A rather extensive business has been transacted in English Railway Securities, and prices in the majority of cases showed a steady advance; but within the last day or two, in sympathy with the other departments, there has been less firmness exhibited, but nevertheless, as compared with last week, quotations generally show a favourable contrast; for instance, there has been an improvement in Edinburgh and Glasgow and Glasgow and South-Western of 1 per cent.; in London and South-Western of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and in Great Eastern (East Anglian Stock), Great Northern, Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, and Metropolitan, of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. On the other hand, Caledonian and North British exhibit a decline of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; and Great Eastern, Lancashire and Yorkshire, and London and North-Western, each  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. In other shares there has been no alteration. In Foreign Railway shares the dealings have been to a fair average extent, but without any material alteration in values. In the shares of British Possessions there has been more animation, Indian and Canadian being in good demand at full prices.

NEW LOAN FOR COLUMBIA.

Proposals have just been issued for a small loan of £200,000 for the United States of Columbia (formerly New Granada) in a six per cent. Stock at 86, with dividends from the 1st October next, and redeemable by a sinking fund in 1874. The objects of the loan are,—the construction of roads within the territory of the republic, the improvement of the river Magdalena, and the general promotion of commercial resources. Payment is secured by special mortgages of 15 per cent. of the gross revenues accruing from the salt mines of the country; and from three of the mines alone the hypothecated amount will be sufficient to provide for the dividends and the redemption of the bonds at par. The instalments are to range from 5 per cent. on application to 6 per cent. on the 1st April next (less the dividend of 3 per cent.), the intervening payments varying from 10 to 15 per cent.

THE NEW ZEALAND LOAN.

The Bank of New Zealand have notified that they are prepared to receive tenders for the first instalment of £100,000 of the loan for £500,000, recently authorised by the Provincial Government of Auckland, New Zealand, for raising funds to purchase from the natives the waste lands of the province, and for encouraging immigration. The debentures, with coupons attached, are to be issued in sums of £100, £250, £500, and £1,000, the interest commencing on the 1st April, 1863, to be redeemed in thirty-three years by a sinking fund of £2 per cent. on the amount borrowed. A deposit of £5 per cent. on the total of each tender must be previously paid to the Bank of London. The highest bidders will be deemed the purchasers, provided the prices are not lower than the minimum placed on the table. The adjudication is to take place on the 1st October.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY PREFERENCE STOCK.

Tenders were opened on Friday last by the Directors of the London and North-Western Railway for the £2,197,666 Preference Stock. It was considered that the stock was quite worth £115, and accordingly that was the minimum fixed upon. A large amount was tendered for at sums ranging from £110 to £114 10s., and there were also a number of tenders, some for large amounts, at par. The tenders, however, at and above the minimum price only amounted to £161,536, the highest being for £17,000 at £117 12s.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

An Extraordinary General Meeting of the shareholders in the Oriental Inland Steam Navigation Company was held on Thursday last for the purpose of considering and determining as to the propriety of removing Mr. John Bourne, the managing director, from his office, pursuant to the powers given to a General Meeting of shareholders; also as to the expediency of removing that gentleman from the office of an ordinary director. The chairman (Colonel Grimes) having recapitulated the grounds of dissatisfaction with Mr. Bourne, which mainly regarded his want of discretion with regard to the management of the affairs of the Company, and which it was alleged had reduced the Company to its present unsatisfactory position, Mr. Bourne defended himself at some length, and reiterated some of the charges he had made against his co-directors. A lengthened discussion ensued, and eventually it was agreed that Mr. Bourne should at once tender his resignation upon the charges preferred against him being unreservedly withdrawn. This having been done officially, Mr. Bourne's resignation was accepted, and the proceedings terminated.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In most descriptions of American produce, transactions continue restricted, and prices nearly stationary, cotton forming the only important exception. This article still attracts great attention, and is again dearer. Another week of fine weather, with the harvest, even in the northern districts, drawing rapidly towards completion, has increased the depression in the grain markets. English wheat has fallen 2s. to 3s. per quarter, and American 1s. to 2s. Flour is saleable only in small quantities at 6d. to 1s. per barrel decline. At the close of business to-day, however, the tendency was towards reaction. The American provision trade has not presented any new feature; quotations remain in all cases the same as last week, and the dealings upon the smallest possible scale. Holders of petroleum are firmer, owing in some measure to the advanced rates advised from America; but any very important buoyancy in the market is checked by the disinclination of dealers to purchase beyond the requirements of the moment. The quotation of 80s. for French spirits of turpentine noticed in our last was the culminating point of the market; and, with a decided pause in operations, there are now more sellers than buyers at 2s. per cwt. decline. American remains nominally at 100s. For sperm oil the demand is a trifle better at the previous currency. The tallow trade continues sensitive and unsettled. The tone was depressed until Saturday, by which time prices had further given way 1s. per cwt. Since this, the current has set in a contrary direction, and the decline has been more than recovered. Nothing new politically has occurred to account for the recent fluctuations, and the market is alone swayed to and fro by the heavy speculative account which is now open. Meanwhile the trade, as usually is the case under the circumstances, keep aloof—not that the present range of prices is considered in itself unsafe, but, with extensive speculative engagements to be arranged, there is always the danger of collapse—one which might at any time carry prices much below their legitimate level. The tobacco trade is not so active, but a fair moderate demand prevails, and as sales are not pressed quotations are generally maintained. The drugs sales have manifested a full average amount of orders, both home and export, and the terms obtained have in every instance equalled those of the previous week. In dyes there is nothing new to note, except that Bengal turmeric is cheaper. With continued activity in Scotch pig iron, the price has touched 59s. 9d. to 60s. per ton, being a fresh advance of 2s. to 2s. 6d.; but to-day there was a reaction, and the closing rate was 58s. 6d. In other metals the variations have been unimportant.

The following are the current prices of the principal articles of American commerce with this country, compared with the rates current at this time last year:—

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, September 23.

The Cotton Market this week has exhibited increased excitement, and prices have daily advanced under the influence of a greatly increased demand. The trade generally have been large buyers, being stimulated thereto by the buoyant state of affairs at Manchester, and speculators have shown increased activity, with extreme confidence in their purchases both on the spot and for cotton to arrive. At one period the market showed rather a declining tendency, but it speedily regained its strength, and the upward movement still continues. The sales during the week have amounted to 82,000 bales, of which 40,300 bales have been taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 1,802,400 bales, against 2,217,820 bales down to the corresponding period last year. The total imports this year have been 1,075,862 bales, whilst in the same period in 1862 they were 725,917 bales. The exports this year have amounted to 328,060 bales; at the same time last year they were 330,954 bales. There have been taken for consumption this year 965,100 bales, and in 1862 942,800 bales. Taken on speculation this year, 450,950 bales; last year, 888,480. Computed stocks at the present time, 172,080 bales, and at the same period last year 91,060 bales. More attention has been paid this week to American cotton than for some time past, in consequence of the very limited supply, and the probability of the future arrivals being further diminished; the advance in price has, therefore, been greater than in other descriptions. The latest quotations were—Middling Orleans, 27d. to 27½d.; Upland, 26½d. to 27½d.; Mobile, 27d. to 27½d.; Surat, 15½d. to 25d.; Egyptian, 27½d. to 28d.; Pernambuco, 27d.; Bahia and Macao, 26d. to 26½d., and Maranham, 28d.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, September 22.

The amount of business transacted during the past week, although large, does not equal that of the week previous, still prices are advancing steadily and keeping pace with the rapid advance of the Liverpool market. Spinners and manufacturers are well engaged under contract, and not in a position to take further orders for early delivery.

There has been some heavy buying of water-twist for China at prices never before paid for that market—say 2s. 6d. per pound, for 16s. to 24s. in bundle.

The continental agents are increasing their purchases more and more every day, their clients being almost starved out for want of yarns of all kinds.

Home trade yarns from 32s. upwards are in good request, at an advance of from ½d. to 1d. on the prices of last Tuesday.

Orders for cloth have not been so plentiful this week as a few days back; but this is owing entirely to the inability of producers to deliver at an early date, and not from a lack of orders in the hands of merchants.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

There has been very little business doing in this Stock, and this may be ascribed to the heaviness in other Securities, consequent on the decline in French Rentes. The fluctuation in prices has not been considerable. The opening price yesterday was 31 to 29 discount, but at the close it was rather firmer, the quotation being 30 to 31 discount.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence.

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. Courts and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmers Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

MR. LINCOLN, after having murdered liberty in the United States, has formally decreed its death. He has proclaimed the suspension of the habeas corpus throughout his dominions at the discretion of his officers, civil and military. We are told that "the public generally treat the matter with the greatest unconcern," and such indifference is natural. Practically the habeas corpus has long been a dead letter, and Mr. Seward hardly indulged in his habitual exaggeration when he said that by touching a bell on his right hand or on his left he could effect the arrest of any citizen in any part of the Union; and as the injury has been so meekly borne, the insult is not likely to be resented. What Mr. Lincoln's motive can be in adding insult to injury, and reminding his subjects of their degradation, is not very clear. Perhaps he is a little nervous, and administrators this last kick to be comfortably assured that there is no vitality left in his prostrate victim; or, if there is, he may be warned in time to take proper measures of security for the coming elections.

A public man, troubled with a large private correspondence, adopted the plan of only opening his letters once a week, as he then found that the majority of them no longer needed answering. It is much the same with the Federal reports of military movements. At least half of them are contradicted before they are a week old. As there was no news from Charleston—at least none of a very pleasant complexion—it was announced that the Federal troops occupied half James Island, and that Fort Moultrie had been surrendered. The next mail declared that these assertions were not correct. Up to the 15th September the position was unchanged. Sumter had been almost unmolested since the assault which was so gallantly repulsed. What was the Federal loss in killed and wounded in that affair we have no means of ascertaining, but General Beauregard reports that he captured 113 officers and privates, four boats and three flags. Morris Island is found to be anything but comfortable quarters. The Confederates keep up a constant fire upon the enemy's works, and have exploded a large magazine in Fort Gregg. In the most exposed situations black troops have been placed, which is a proof of Yankee prudence if not of Yankee love. It is cheaper to have negroes shot than to expatriate them, according to Mr. Lincoln's benevolent intention. The casualties reported on the Confederate side are, the explosion of a magazine on James Island, by which a lieutenant and five privates were killed, and the bursting of one of the huge Blakely guns. It is said that General Beauregard does not approve of monster ordnance.

We hear very little about the Federal fleet, except the rumour of a dispute between General Gilmore and Admiral Dahlgren, and that the monitor Patapsco has been towed to Port Royal for repairs. The iron-clads are not altogether shot-proof, and now the rough weather is coming on it will, unless they retire, be seen that they are not storm-proof.

Putting aside the speculations of Wall-street on events to come off and the various guesses about the strength and position of General Bragg's army, the military intelligence of the week from Northern sources is very cheering to the Confederates. The report of the Federal occupation of Little Rock is confirmed, but there is every indication that the enemy will not enjoy quiet possession of the city. The Federals had a skirmish on the 11th of September with General Wheeler, and the Confederates had to retire before a superior force. General Pleasanton is said to have crossed the Rapahannock and captured 100 prisoners and three guns, but another mail is tolerably sure to make the capture of men and guns much less. These are the only advantages claimed by the Federals, and on the other hand they admit a long list of disasters. General Franklin, with a portion of the Texan expedition, attempted to land at Sabine City, was repulsed, and had to retire. One of the Federal gunboats, the Clifton, was destroyed; and another, the Sachem, was captured with all on board. At Dug Gap, Tennessee, there has been an engagement, and the Federals were driven back. General Buckner has captured 300 Federals. The Federal General Neyley has been driven back at Fair Gap for three miles and a half; but it is stated that the next day he recovered his ground, with the loss of 35 men. The Confederates have crossed the Rapidan and captured 150 men of the New York Cavalry. There is a feeling of uneasiness about the army of Rosecrans. We are also told that a body of 8,000 Confederates in Western Virginia are preparing for an expedition, and that "guerillas" are swarming all along the banks of the Mississippi, so that the river is only open to ironclads.

The Boston Courier, in an article the essential portion of which we reproduce elsewhere, boldly challenges Mr. Sumner to cite the authority or usage, under the law of nations, which requires a man-of-war to be fitted in, or sail from, a home port. And it most opportunely brings to mind two facts which had been overlooked in the recent discussions on the subject of belligerent rights at sea. The Bonhomme Richard, Paul Jones's famous ship, which destroyed the Serapis in the first American Revolution, never was in a home port of the flag she wore. The Essex, so efficient under Commodore Porter against this country in the war of 1812, never was in a home port of the flag she wore. Similarly, it challenges the authority which requires, under the law of nations, that prizes should be brought into port for condemnation. We commend this fearless argument of one of the oldest-established and ablest journals in the Federal States to the attention of the Federal apologists in this country.

From a statement in the New York Times, copied into the Washington Intelligence, the semi-official organ, without contradiction, and which we give elsewhere in full, it appears that Mr. Lincoln has virtually yielded the point of the right of the Confederates to refuse to exchange the officers of negro regiments, and has in practice abandoned his threats of so-called "retaliation." "Officers of such regiments" are informed that they "knew when they entered the service, the peculiar risks incidental to their position, and for the present must endure the disagreeable consequences."

The Alabama Legislature adjourned on the 29th of August. The Act for the reorganization of the militia was passed. It provides for the enumeration of all males from sixteen to sixty, and divides them into two classes. The class first embraces all from sixteen to seventeen, and forty-five to sixty. These constitute the county reserves.

The second class comprises all from seventeen to forty-five. Three districts in North Alabama are exempted from the operation of the law as regards the first class, on account of the presence of the enemy. State and Confederate officers, and others deemed necessary to the community, regardless of age, are included in the first class. A joint committee reported a resolution in favour of the proposition to employ slaves in the military service of the Confederate States. After discussion in the House, the resolution was adopted by a vote of sixty-eight yeas to twelve nays, after striking out the word "military" before service, and "soldiers" at the end of the resolution. The resolution, as amended, reads as follows:—

That it is the duty of Congress to provide by law for the employment in the service of the Confederate States of America, in such situations and in such numbers as may be found absolutely necessary, the able-bodied slaves of the country, whether as pioneers, sappers and miners, cooks, nurses, and teamsters.

Hon. W. C. Rives, of Richmond, a prominent member of the Whig party, so long as parties existed in the South, and who, on account of his former party connections, had been charged by the Northern press with a secret desire for reconstruction, has written an eloquent letter on the present aspect of the struggle, which is published in the Richmond Whig of the 1st September. Mr. Rives calmly reviews the position of the belligerents, paints in graphic language the terrible consequences of subjugation; and, comparing the struggle of the South with other memorable contests for independence, draws from the comparison encouragement for renewed efforts and bright hopes of the ultimate issue. We hope in our next impression to find space for this interesting document. General Robert Toombs, of Georgia, has also written a letter in reply to insinuations somewhat similar to those made against Mr. Rives, in which he says, "I can conceive of no extremity to which my country could be reduced in which I would for a single moment entertain any proposition for any union with the North, on any terms whatever."

Governor Letcher's address to the Virginia Assembly is mainly directed to the question of defence. After noticing the ferocity of the invader and his avowed design of desolating the South, the Governor suggests that all able-bodied persons, with the exception of foreigners temporarily residing in the State, shall be enlisted in the militia. He explains that local defence does not mean merely protecting certain counties or cities, but that the militia is liable to serve in any part of Virginia. The Governor recommends the repeal of an Act passed last session, which provided that no Confederate issues of a date anterior to April 6, 1863, should be received for State taxes. The object of this enactment was to induce people to fund their notes, but in practice it is found inconvenient. Governor Letcher announces that a requisition has been made upon him by the Confederate Secretary of War for 5,340 slaves to work on the defences of Wilmington. He directs attention to the necessity of repairing the railroads, and concludes a thoroughly practical address by advising, as a means of putting an end to extortion, the re-enactment of a law passed in 1777 for a similar purpose.

In the course of a debate in the Virginia Assembly on the sequestration of the property of deserters from the army, Mr. Hall, of Wetzell, severely criticised the conduct of the officers in Richmond, and expressed a hope that the Legislature would rebuke President Davis before it adjourned. However ill-founded may be Mr. Hall's censures, and however unjust his imputations, his utterances will do no harm and ought not to excite surprise or anger. License to abuse the Government is inseparable from perfect liberty of speech and publication. Mr. Hall cannot say more bitter things about the Confederate President than did some staunch patriots against General Washington during the first War of Independence. The difference is, that Washington had to deal with a powerful opposition, whilst Mr. Davis's policy is only disparaged by an insignificant minority.

In the Virginia Senate, on the 11th instant, Mr. Garrison, of Accomac, submitted a preamble and resolutions, the former representing the propriety of declaring what is the present purpose of the Commonwealth in regard to the war. The resolutions set forth:—

1. That it is the settled determination of Virginia never to yield, come what may.
2. That this being her purpose, every effort to secure peace upon any terms other than the independence of the Confederate States, is treasonable in its efforts, &c.
3. That reverses should nerve the people to greater exertions; and all attempts to sow the seeds of discontent should be boldly resisted and discountenanced; and the 4th reiterates the declaration made by the preceding Legislature in regard to maintaining the integrity of the State.

Mr. Collier has proposed in the Senate of Virginia that, in the event of a majority of the Confederate States agreeing to take similar action, the General Assembly of Virginia shall appoint three Commissioners to proceed to the several United States governors, to appeal from the Federal Administration, and to ask those States to decide by the ballot-box whether or not they will continue to wage war against the South, or will recognise her separate existence without further dispute. Mr. Collier submitted, that if the Confederate Commissioners were refused admission into the Northern States—(the Richmond Sentinel suggests that if Mr. Collier were to start on such a mission “he would have abundant leisure to felicitate himself on his practical wisdom in the dungeons of Fort Warren”)—that arbitrary (but in our opinion perfectly justifiable,) act on the part of the Federal Government would demonstrate to the Northern people “the fearful extent of absolute rule over them.” The Northern people need no such demonstration that they are living under an irresponsible despotism. Mr. Collier concludes by a resolution that whilst these peace propositions are being made the military exertions of the Confederacy are not to be relaxed “to advance and establish the course to which we are pledged in our fortunes and by our victories, to the utmost of our talents, to use them in support of the separate independence of these States.” Now, if these harmless, though ridiculous, resolutions had been passed by the Assembly, it would not have implied any want of firmness on the part of the South. All along, the Confederates have been seeking peace, not dominion, at first by negotiation and then by the sword. The blunder that Mr. Collier makes is to suppose that what would have prevented the war will stop it. In 1861 the Northern States might, and would, had they been far-sighted, have refused to plunge into hostilities to please the dominant faction; but now their power has passed away, and can only be recovered by a revolution. But if the acceptance of these foolish resolutions would have been no proof of faintheartedness, the refusal to discuss them, by a vote of 38 to 1, is a demonstration of the determination of the South not to sheathe the sword which the North compelled her to draw, until her enemy acknowledges that her independence is unconquerable.

Remembering the romance of “The Richmond Bread Riots,” which an ingenious Yankee composed to make Europe believe that the South was being starved out, we do not attach much credit to the report of the bread riots in Mobile, particularly in view of the late superabundant harvest. Likely enough there may be a little fire to account for the prodigious puff of smoke that is directed from Memphis to blind our eyes. However this may be, the clumsy Northern version of the affair informs us that the Confederate soldiers, unlike the Federal soldiers, refuse to make war on women and children. And further, the Northern despatch tells us incidentally, and doubtless accidentally, that the civil, not the military, force was protecting the public peace. A merchant, we are told, who struck a woman, was arrested by the police and punished. The peaceful citizens of the North have good cause to envy the mild and considerate treatment of evil-disposed citizens in the South.

The telegraph has this week brought us what boys call stale news. It has given us a summary of Mr. Seward's circular, which was discussed in the English papers about a month since; and it has announced that there is no truth in the reported death of General Pemberton—an item of intelligence which we communicated to the public in our issue of last Thursday.

The Mobile Register says that General Lee has proceeded southward, and that in his absence the command of the Army of Virginia has devolved on General Joseph Johnston.

Mr. Sumner's speech was fairly summarised by the telegraph. It is a tissue of virulent, vulgar abuse, against England, France and the Confederate States. Earl Russell is right in assuming that the object of it is to stir up a foreign war, and Mr. Sumner is right in thinking that the domination of his party depends upon a continuation of hostilities. It will be sufficient criticism of this speech to record that even our contemporary the Daily News denounces it as “a disclosure which will be lamented by good patriots in America for a long time to come,” and says that Mr. Sumner has employed an opportunity of promoting peace between the two countries “to lash the irritation of his fellow-citizens into rage, and to obscure and pervert the facts of history in the making, by looking at and handling them under the distortion of his own prejudice and passion”—that part of his speech is “sadly childish”—and that he has applied all his powers “to raise and kindle the passions of his countrymen” against England. There is, however, a still more decided condemnation of Mr. Sumner. The Morning Star, the organ of Mr. John Bright and of Mr. Abraham Lincoln, is frantic in its praises of the villifier and abuser of England. It applies to the speech such terms as “prodigious eloquence,” “periods of classic beauty,” “fervid strength,” and avows that, so far as the British Cabinet is concerned, the recognition of the Confederate States as a belligerent Power “was purposely premature. It was intentionally offensive to the one party and pleasing to the other.” The Star, however, deserves credit for so frankly confessing the intensity of its anti-English sentiment.

Mr. Stanton has ordered that if any civil power attempts to arrest a military officer for disregarding a writ of habeas corpus it is to be resisted by any and all means at command; which is an intimation to State authorities that no interference will be permitted with Mr. Lincoln's decrees, and an encouragement to the soldiery not to be sparing in the use of ball and bayonet. Judge Betts, who in the Prize Courts has already proved himself a pliant tool of despotism, has decided that Mr. Lincoln's proclamation not only prevents the further issue of writs of habeas corpus, but puts an end to all pending cases for which writs have been issued. This is a curious illustration of the truth of Earl Russell's declaration, that “in the courts of justice in America the common law of England is constantly studied—the same spirit of liberty animates us both.”

The Charleston Mercury says the Confederate casualties in the struggle for Morris Island have been 700 killed, wounded, and missing.

We elsewhere publish the proclamation of Governor Vance, of North Carolina, in reference to meetings that have been held to oppose certain acts of the Confederate Congress. Such opposition is no doubt untimely, but it is a different affair from what the Northern press has represented it to be. Even the unimportant minority that is opposed to the Confederate Administration does not betray the slightest desire to return to the Union.

The clamour for war with England and France is growing louder and louder, and is not confined to the press or the mob. The municipality of New York has offered a public reception to the officers of a Russian frigate visiting New York as a mark of appreciation of Russian fidelity, as distinguished from the conduct of other European Powers.

The Hon. D. W. Voorhees, member of Congress from Indiana, was lately travelling in the same train with a party of soldiers from his own State. The soldiers attempted to hang him because he is a Democrat. He was rescued by the officers, but obliged to leave the train. An incident like this shows what terrible and bloody discord Mr. Lincoln and his faction are sowing in the North.

Some soldiers have mobbed the office of the Raleigh (North Carolina) Standard; and some citizens have paid the like compliment to the State Journal office. In both cases quiet was restored by the presence and entreaties of Governor Vance. These newspaper riots in Raleigh are very suggestive of the difference between the political positions of the North and South. In the United States papers are suppressed by military authority in spite of the wishes of the people; in the Confederate States the free expression of opinion is strictly upheld, and journals, whether for or against the Administration, are protected from outrage, although, as in the case of the Raleigh Standard, treasonable articles have made them unpopular. Another difference is, that in the North angry recriminations are settled by bullets, and in the South by words.

There has been a considerable advance in the price of gold in New York. The latest quotation was 35 per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

On Saturday, September 26th, Earl Russell was entertained at dinner in the new Town-hall of Blairgowrie by the tenantry on the Meikleour estate and their friends in honour of his Lordship's visit to the district. At the cross of the town an address was presented by the Chief Magistrate, and at the new Town-hall, after the company had assembled, another address was presented by the United Presbyterian minister of Coupar-Angus. After dinner the Earl of Airlie gave “the health of Earl Russell,” and his Lordship replied in a speech of considerable length. At the commencement of his oration his Lordship naively remarked that the people of this country no longer indulged in much excitement about Reform, and cared only for foreign affairs. With regard to these his Lordship first enjoyed a little self-gratulation on the freedom of Italy, to the consummation of which he clearly supposed that he had contributed in an equal degree with Count Cavour or the Emperor of the French. As to Poland, his Lordship said that neither the obligations, the honour, nor the interest of England required that we should go to war for that country. Earl Russell spoke at length on the subject of America. We elsewhere give that portion of his speech.

Alfred Styles, formerly a lieutenant in the Garibaldian army, surrendered to take his trial last week before the Recorder of London to answer the charge of having induced one John Gregory to enlist as a soldier for a foreign Power, to wit, Poland, without the leave and license of Her Majesty the Queen. Not many weeks since this individual appeared before a Metropolitan Magistrate on the same charge, and on that occasion a full account of the method of enlistment employed, the success obtained, and the discovery of the system by the Russian Government, appeared in these columns. In answer to the advertisements published by Mr. Styles 1,100 persons had applied for the imaginary situations, and 250 had been selected as worthy to fight beside the Poles. The prisoner on being arraigned pleaded guilty, and thereupon Mr. Poland, who appeared for the prosecution, stated that on behalf of the Russian Government he proposed that no penalty should be inflicted on Mr. Styles, but that he should merely be required to enter into his own recognisance to appear when called on. The Recorder assented to this course, and the prisoner entered into his own recognisance of £100 to appear. Of course this is a mere safeguard against future activity on the part of Mr. Styles, and should he desist from such attempts he will undoubtedly hear no more about the matter.

The Bishop of Oxford on Thursday last distributed the diplomas of honorary certificates awarded by the University of Oxford to the successful candidates at the Brighton examination held in July. In his address his lordship pointed out with admirable ingenuity how completely the ancient University had adapted herself to the advanced wants of the age by extending her influence among the middle classes and testing the education bestowed upon them. There can be no doubt that the bulk of the middle classes of England is consigned to the care of masters of small schools; that the difficulty of testing the excellence of the respective institutions is too great for parents to solve; and that the Universities, by offering the test of examination to all the private schools of England, have done much to remedy this evil.

The vacant seat in the Court of Exchequer, consequent on the appointment of Baron Wilde as Judge Ordinary, has been filled up by the nomination of Mr. Serjeant Pigott, M.P. for Reading, to the judicial office. Mr. G. Shaw Lefevre, nephew of Viscount Eversley, the late Speaker of the House of Commons, is a candidate for the borough of Reading, and has issued an address declaring his adhesion to Lord Palmerston. At Tamworth two candidates are in the field, namely, the Hon. Mr. Cowper, the son of Lady Palmerston, and Mr. Peel. The former is backed by the influence of Sir Robert Peel, the senior member for the borough. The general impression of Mr. Peel's supporters seems to be that Sir Robert has exercised coercion over his tenants in favour of Mr. Cowper, and many of the electors seem also to consider Sir Robert a mere satellite of Lord Palmerston. Sir Robert has, upon his honour, denied that any coercion has ever been sanctioned by him.

Before the Channel Fleet left the Mersey the leading men connected with the commercial enterprise of Liverpool displayed their liberality and good sense by giving an entertainment to 1000 of the petty officers and sailors marines, and marine artillery of the fleet. Of all the banquets, balls, and scenes of mutual hospitality exercised by the fleet and the people of Liverpool, this dinner must carry off the palm, as indicating the mos real kindness of heart and the soundest patriotism. The dinner was given in St. George's Hall, and about 200 gentlemen of the Royal Mersey Yacht Club sat down with the 1,000 sailors to a dinner of roast beef and mutton, Allsopp's ale, and grog. The shouts of the men at the loyal toasts, and the stentorian voices joined in the chorus of the popular naval songs, produced a marvellous and unprecedented effect. The toast of "The petty officers and seamen of the fleet" was responded to by a sailor, in one of the most characteristic and eloquent speeches imaginable, and the entertainment was brought to a close with the song of "Rule Britannia." A thousand of the sailors were also invited to the Theatre Royal and the Royal Amphitheatre by the lessee. The fleet has left Liverpool, and is now lying in Kingstown Harbour. In anticipation of its arrival the corporation of Dublin held a meeting, at which Alderman Hudson moved the adoption of an address to the Admiral and officers. The motion having been seconded, Mr. A. M. Sullivan, proprietor and editor of the Nation, moved an amendment in a speech of considerable length. Mr. Sullivan, having denounced the report of the committee as one of the meanest instances of evasion he had ever met, and the address as nauseous and flatulent, denied that the visit of the fleet was calculated to awaken recollections of the glories of the past. What glories? When did a British fleet come to Dublin Bay except for invasion? When the address spoke of the British fleet aiding every tyrant-trampled country, such language could not be held by Irishmen. In the time of famine the British Government refused to lend two ships out of its great navy to carry food for Ireland. But there was a Government who heard the wail of Ireland and came to help. That was the Government of free America, who stripped its war ships of their armament, and sent to these shores the produce of American soil. He could understand the Irish people welcoming to their shores such a fleet, but the people of Dublin had no right to use this language to the Channel Fleet. Mr. Martin in reply told Mr. Sullivan that his own speech proved that Ireland was the freest country in the world, for in no other country would a man be permitted to utter such sentiments. On a division the address was carried by an overwhelming majority, only four members having voted against it. The Fleet arrived in Kingstown Harbour on Saturday morning, September 26, and at ten o'clock a.m. the Admiral received deputations from the Royal Irish Yacht Club and the members of the Ballast Board. At noon the Lord Mayor of Dublin, accompanied by large numbers of the Corporation, presented the address to the Admiral, and invited him and the officers to a banquet at the Mansion House. The Liverpool remains in the Mersey to watch Mr. Laird's iron-clads.

The parish of Sible Hedingham, in the county of Essex, has produced and destroyed a wizard. Many a village in England selects the poorest, most retired, and most miserable of its inhabitants to fill that character, but few are eager to destroy their solitary specimen of a race now well-nigh extinct. Curiosity and awe are invariably excited by him, but malice rarely; and his principal value is, that his dread name is an unailing remedy for the correction of intractable children. However, this is, we suppose, a point of civilisation to which Sible Hedingham has not yet attained; and so, just as if the 16th century were still in existence, superstition has succeeded in ducking an unlucky old man to death. It seems that in that village there dwelt a Frenchman more than four-score years of age, deaf and dumb, and poverty-stricken. His dwelling was a miserable hut, and his means of livelihood were the fruits of charity and of his art. No one knew his name or his origin, whence he came and when was matter of obscurity, but at least he was not without cunning, and eager enough to take advantage of the character for witchcraft attributed to him. By silent and savage mutterings and curious signs he gained power over his neighbours, and extorted money from them. Among his victims, imaginary or real, was one Mrs. Smith, of whom the old Frenchman had written that she should sicken in ten days' time. She had so sickened, and remained ill ever since. One evening she met the old man at a public-house and besought him to remove the curse from her, promising him lodging and gold. He obstinately refused to do so, and thereupon the men present proceeded to jostle him about, to drag him to an adjacent brook, from the brook to the deep water of a mill-head, and there to test his powers by the ancient and approved method of "swimming" him. After a complete ducking he was dragged out, and some charitable persons helped him home, but the shock to his system was great, and he died after a few days' illness. The woman Smith and a man named Samuel Stammers, the ringleaders in the affair, were subsequently brought before the magistrates, and were committed for trial on a charge of manslaughter. It is not a little remarkable that nearly all of the sixty or seventy people concerned in the outrage were of the small tradesman class, and that no agricultural labourers were mixed up in the affair. But, whoever the ringleaders or participants might be, it was, as the magistrates said, a fearful and disgraceful fact, that at the present day an old man should meet with such a fate, and that no one of all the crowd of men and women present should have interfered to save him, or even have told the police of what was going forward. During the trial immense difficulty was found in inducing the witnesses to speak to the facts, and the woman Smith was obviously in the utmost terror. The people of Sible Hedingham were afraid of their wizard even after they had killed him.

In various parts of England Agricultural Associations have been holding their annual meetings. Shows of horses, cattle, sheep, and swine, root crops and machinery, flowers and vegetables, draining and ploughing matches occupy the morning; and the evening is enlivened with a dinner, at which the agriculturists of the neighbourhood attend to converse over the state of the corn-market and the agricultural interest, and to hear addresses from the members for the county and the local magnates. At Walton, in Norfolk, Mr. G. W. P. Bentinck pointed out to his audience the want of representation on the part of the rural districts of this country in the House of Commons, and urged that, in the event of a Reform Bill being introduced, the agriculturists should unite as one man and claim their own rights. At Hitchin Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton presided at the meeting of the Hertfordshire Association, and discoursed on the cattle disease, on drainage, and on the utilisation of sewage, with the art of a philosopher and the experience of a practical farmer. He dwelt forcibly on the advantages of peace to all classes of the community, and the importance of maintaining the British fleet in the highest state of efficiency. Of the American war he said, that "it was unprecedented for the merciless waste of treasure and of kindred blood, and was animated by passions which appear to us at a distance so void of reason, that at this moment the newspapers of the Northern States of America are actually wishing Canada to exchange the disorders and oppressions of British dominion for the mild blessings of American peace and brotherhood."

THE CONTINENT.

THE King of Prussia has replied to the sovereigns and the burgomasters of the Free Towns who wrote to him communicating the Austrian project of Federal Reform. He cannot recognise in the project the expression of that real situation and those real needs a respect for which can alone give life and duration to a work of this kind. He cannot, therefore, hesitate to declare, although he does so with regret, that his duty as King of Prussia and German Prince will not permit him to accept the project as the basis of a new Federal Constitution. The preliminary condition of his assent to a radical reform of the existing treaties must be an agreement on these three points: 1. A veto of Prussia and Austria, at least against every Federal war not undertaken to repel an attack upon the Federal territory. 2. Full equality of Prussia with Austria in the presidency of the Bund and the direction of its affairs. 3. A representation of the people, issuing, not from the delegation of assemblies, but from direct elections, according to the population of the several States, and whose attributions in its deliberative concurrence in Federal affairs should form the object of negotiation, but must in any case be more extended than the Austrian project proposes. He has charged his Minister of Foreign Affairs to enter into negotiation with the Austrian Government on the subject.

This letter, which is countersigned by Herr Von Bismarck—King William has a constitutional fit upon him—is only the expression of the conclusions of an elaborate report from the Ministry to the King upon this question. The report commences by claiming for Prussia the initiative of the movement for a development of the Federal Constitution corresponding to the national requirements. It complains that the Austrian Government has not been careful enough, in times like the present, in which the value of the outer and inner security which the Bund assures to every member is so especially evident, to preserve the existing unity and confidence in the guarantees of the existing Federal treaties. On the contrary, the alteration of the Federal Constitution has been asked upon grounds the exposition of which materially shakes confidence in the value and stability of these treaties. The report then criticises the manner in which the Austrian proposals were made, the neglect to consult Prussia in the first instance, the abruptness with which the invitations were issued.

"We cannot," the Ministry say, "resist the impression that the object of the Austrian Cabinet was, not the participation of Prussia in the common work, but the realisation of the separate league, which already, in the first communication to your Majesty of the 3rd August was held in prospect for the case that Prussia should not agree to the propositions of Austria." Coming to the project itself, the Ministry recommend his Majesty to refuse his consent to it, and proceed to subject it to a critical examination. "The relative weakness of the Bund in comparison with the innate strength of the German nation lies in the difficulty so to establish the Central Power, and to provide it with such attributions, that it shall be strong and effective, but at the same time shall spare and maintain the independence of the separate States and the importance of the separate members of the Bund, according to the measure of their own independent power relations." The difficulties of the problem which is stated by Herr Von Bismarck, in the words we have quoted, very clearly, are then referred to. Amongst others, neither Prussia nor Austria can renounce the freedom to regulate their positions to questions of European politics according to the interests of the whole of their monarchies. The Austrian solution of a decision by a majority of votes, is dangerous and unacceptable. "It seems to us indispensable that the Bund should interfere in the relations of European politics only with the concurrence of the two great Powers, and that to each of those Powers should be given a veto at least against a declaration of war, so long as the Federal territory is not attacked." The report proceeds to assign reasons for the requirement of this veto—reasons of considerable weight, but which our space will not allow us to give—and then claims the formal equality of Prussia with Austria in the Bund;—a claim which it founds upon the fact that Prussia has a larger population in the Bund than Austria; and finally declares, that "the element called to reconcile the separate interests of the single States with the interest of the whole of Germany, is only to be found in a representation of the German people;" a representation which must be endowed with larger attributes than those proposed by the Frankfort project; and instead of being composed of delegates from the different Chambers, must proceed from the direct election of the people, according to the measure of population. Herr Von Bismarck then proceeds to dilate in a most edifying manner upon the virtues of popular representation, the only security that the interests of Prussia will be guarded in the new Bund, and reserving all criticism upon the details of the project, recommends his Majesty to refuse his assent to it, and enter into negotiations with Austria for the preparation of a new reform plan on these bases. The report concludes with two most remarkable paragraphs. It says "that the approaching meeting of the Landtag will give the King's Government the opportunity of learning the opinions of the Prussian representation upon the reform project and the principles maintained by the Government in opposition to it; and it does not doubt that the representation of the country will let it be decidedly known that only such alterations of the existing Federal treaties can reckon upon its constitutional assent in which the dignity and the position as a great Power of Prussia, and the interests of the whole German nation, find an equal measure of regard." "The Prussian people forms so important a constituent part of the German and is in its wants and interests, as in its wishes and sentiments, so closely identified with the whole of the German nation, that the vote of the Prussian Landtag will also supply the hitherto wanting bases for estimating the acceptance of the proposed institutions on the part of the German people."

The Prussian Landtag, therefore, does speak the opinions of the Prussian people. Herr Von Bismarck, who has treated it with derision, denied its rights, and threatened it by his organs with suppression, now seeks its support. That he will obtain it so far as the endorsement of the memorandum goes, we have very little doubt. It panders to the Prussian prejudice against, we might say hatred of, Austria, and it adopts, although, of course, without the slightest sincerity, the nostrum of a German parliament, controlling everything. That the Prussian deputies will allow their approval of the German policy of the Government, to beguile them into an assent to its violation of liberty in Prussia, is hardly probable. So the Reform question enters upon a new stage. Austria will hardly consent to enter into negotiations upon the basis of Herr Von Bismarck's memorandum—the most valuable document however, which, has yet appeared upon the subject, because it proves, without intending it, that German Unity, as dreamed by Germans, is impossible.

The publication in the Moniteur of the despatch of the Polish National Government to Prince Czartoryski has revived the hopes of the war party in France. It is regarded as a reply to the last Russian despatch and an intimation that the Emperor does not mean to rest content with the failure of the diplomatic intervention. Rumours of changes in the Ministry have been current. The retirement of M. Drouyn de L'Huys has been spoken of, but apparently without any foundation. A more probable rumour points to the speedy retirement of Baron Gros from the London Embassy, and his replacement by Count Walewski, who, it will be remembered, has before occupied the post. This appointment would be construed by the Poles as a favourable sign. In reply to some attacks upon M. Drouyn de L'Huys in the Presse, attacks which proceeded upon the principle of Ministerial responsibility, which the existing constitution repudiates, the Moniteur has published a note to the effect, that "in comprising in the same blame the general direction of affairs and the manner of treating them, the journal in question misunderstands the spirit of our institutions. Under the present régime, it is from the Sovereign that the idea which directs affairs emanates. The Minister is only responsible for their execution."

The waters in the Rhone and its tributaries have risen to a height which they have not reached since 1849, and most devastating inundations have been the result. The French journals contain accounts of a great destruction as well of life as property. By the last reports the water had fallen.

There is no war intelligence of importance from Poland. The attempt to assassinate General Berg has led to severe measures on the part of the police, by which all persons witnessing any such attack, or residing in a house from which it is made, are held particeps criminis, if they do not exert themselves to arrest the offender, and cannot prove that they had no part in his act. According to some accounts the palace of Count Zamoyiski, opposite to which the attempt on General Berg was made, has been handed over to the fury of the soldiers. All accounts speak of the feeling between the soldiers and the population of the city as extremely excited, and presage some dreadful collision in which Warsaw may be reduced to a heap of ashes and corpses.

The speech in which the Emperor of Russia opened the Diet of Finland—assembling now, after fifty years desuetude—is very liberal in its tone. He promises that projects of law for the introduction of necessary reforms shall be laid before it, and gives it what it theoretically possessed before, but did not practically enjoy—the power of the purse.

The Rigsgaad, or Parliament for Denmark proper, has, upon the proposition of the Minister of the Interior, passed a bill empowering the Government to prorogue it, the only mode in which it could be legally made, until January. The reason for this measure was the convocation of the Rigsgaad, or Parliament for Denmark and Schleswig, originally for Holstein and Lauenburg; and the Government and the Rigsgaad did not think that they could profitably legislate, whilst the important business to be submitted to the Rigsgaad was pending. The session of the Rigsgaad was opened on Monday. The Royal speech, read by the President of the Council, promised bills for a new constitution for Denmark and Schleswig. These bills have been already presented, and a telegram speaks of them as "showing great progress in the development of liberal ideas in Denmark." The speech further states that the dispute between Denmark and the Federal Diet appears to be approaching a decision. "The Government" says the King, "had declared its readiness to carry out the resolutions of the Diet in Holstein, if they were found compatible with my sovereignty over the federal provinces, and did not impede independent legislation in the other parts of the kingdom." "In case our hopes should not be realised, it is obvious that it would no longer be a question of the federal rights over Holstein, but of the independence of Denmark, who is firmly determined to protect herself against any attack."

The Swedish Government has addressed a note to the Cabinets of Paris and London, drawing their attention to the threatened execution in Holstein, and the danger of a war, which must break out if they do not protect Denmark. In such a war Sweden might be compelled to take an active part, inasmuch as the subjugation of Denmark would endanger her interests.

The King of Holland opened the Dutch Chambers on the 21st ult., in a speech of a very satisfactory character. The relations of the country with other Powers are most amicable; the harvest has been abundant; the produce of the fisheries satisfactory; the situation of the finances of the State is favourable. Projects of law for the revision of the inquest system, for a new code of criminal instruction, for a new organisation of the National Guard, for colonial reform—the great battle-ground of parties in Holland—for the augmentation of the number of members of the second Chamber in accordance with the increase of population, are to be presented to the Chambers.

The last relations of the Italian Government with the Papacy are now broken. Although the two Powers have long ceased to be represented at their respective courts by Ministers, both have maintained consular agents. A decree, published in the Turin Gazette of Saturday, withdraws the exequatur of all the Pontifical consuls in the kingdom of Italy. The quarrel is a very pretty one. The Junta of Naples, a body instituted under the new and Draconian laws against brigandage, thought fit to order the Pontifical consul-general at Naples to leave the kingdom immediately, on the ground that he was privy to the brigandage. The Papal Government retorted by withdrawing the exequatur of the Italian consul-general in Rome and sending him his passports; and the Italian Government, in its turn, makes a clean sweep of the whole Papal consular service. No doubt these acts of vigour give popularity to the Government, but it is very questionable whether the solution of the Roman question is advanced by them.

The child Queen, Maria Pia—she is not yet sixteen—gave birth to a boy, heir to the throne of Portugal and the Algarves, on Monday.

ST. DOMINGO.

THE Spaniards found the reconquest of St. Domingo easy enough. Its retention is not so light a task. It will be seen by the following extract from a private letter that the new colony is in a very disturbed condition:—

3rd September, 1863.

The political cauldron is again in a state of ebullition, and the Lord only knows what serious incidents may bubble up before it settles again. An insurrection, to all appearances of a very grave character, has broken out in the Cibao. The head men are not mentioned; it is supposed that they got arms from abroad. The Spanish troops that marched from Santiago against them were beaten with considerable casualties, including the loss of two pieces of artillery. Buceta had a narrow escape; they were obliged to concentrate themselves in Santiago to await the arrival of troops. Porto Plata was attacked on the 27th by the rebels, but the timely arrival of two battalions from Cuba prevented the place from being taken. There was fighting in the streets. The commandante in chief of the Cuba battalions was killed. The number of slain and wounded was considerable. Moca, Macoris, and Vega are in arms in favour of the rebellion. The Comandante da Armas, Don Esteban Roca, the Administrador, Alcalde, Mayor, &c., all have got here to-day. They were obliged to leave rather in a hurry. Moya and Pape Pontes are also here, running away from the danger. The villages to the east, as well as to the west, are thus far quiet. Here we are under martial law, but everything tranquil. Santana is here, a little indisposed. As yet no troops have arrived here, but it is said that several battalions are awaited from Cuba and Porto Rico. Spanish blood has flowed this time abundantly. The Lord have mercy on us!

A steamer has just arrived, bringing nineteen wounded from Porto Plata. It is said that families are quitting Porto Plata for Turk's Island. Shops and stores are abandoned.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, September 29.

THERE has been a passage of arms between M. de Girardin and the Direction of the Press, which has furnished the subject of much remark in these dull times, when the vacation still drags its, to journalists, weary length. M. de Girardin has not ceased from the commencement of the diplomatic correspondence with Russia to predict its failure, while he is equally averse to an appeal to arms, his solution for the difficulty being a free Poland in a free Russia. The result having answered his prediction he has sung Io Pean rather too loudly, and incurred the indignation of the Foreign-office for his strictures on the Minister. The first idea was to inflict a warning on the Presse, but M. de Girardin's pen is so keen a weapon, so skillfully handled, that even the most courageous may be excused for shrinking from such an encounter. The warning was converted into a communiqué, a form of censure which carries with it no penalties, and, being only an ex-officio contradiction of the article blamed, is no answer. This also was abandoned, and in its place a note was inserted in the Moniteur to the effect, that whereas "the Presse has thrown the responsibility of the foreign policy of France on the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and has blamed the general direction of these affairs as well as the manner of treating them, it has thus misrepresented the spirit of our institutions. Under the present régime the initiation in all affairs (la pensée qui dirige) emanates from the sovereign: the minister is only responsible for their execution." This oracle, so far from closing the discussion, has only given rise to a new one. Where does the pensée end, and where does the execution begin? For the next few days, unless a new utterance impose silence on the disputants, we are likely to be entertained with a logomachy, such as only French ingenuity could devise.

The Mémorial Diplomatique may be considered the official organ of the new empire of Mexico. It announces positively the Archduke's acceptance of the crown. It gives a positive denial that any guarantee has been required from France or any other country for the loan about to be contracted, the resources of Mexico itself being fully equal to meeting all its engagements. With nearly eight millions of inhabitants and a debt in 1858 of about twenty-nine millions sterling, the revenue was only between eight and nine millions of dollars, or less than two millions sterling, the taxation, direct and indirect, being thus little more than five shillings a head. The value of the imports and exports was seven millions sterling. But under the Spanish Government the mines of gold and silver gave an annual return of six millions sterling, and even now, notwithstanding the abandonment of the greater part of the mines, the produce of those worked exceeds four millions and a-half. Coffee, vanilla, sarsaparilla, and cochineal, with many other valuable productions, are among its exports even now, and only await the application of European capital and energy to yield almost unlimited returns. England is at present in possession of the largest share in the commerce of Mexico. Next comes France, which absorbs one-third of the produce, excepting of the precious metals, and has one-fifth of the whole commercial movement, while that of the United States is only one-tenth. The Mémorial contributes also a letter from the Bishop of Puebla, now Archbishop of Mexico and member of the Provisional Government, in which he gives his first impressions of a visit to the Archduke Maximilian at Miramar in 1862. The whole letter is a capital specimen of Spanish phraseology. It would be too long to ask for a place for it in extenso, but I cannot resist treating you to the first paragraph:—

My first souvenirs are for you. I arrived here last night at ten o'clock, and at eleven was presented to the most amiable prince, the sight of whom enchants, whose conversation attaches and instructs, the sweetness and gravity of whose manners have such a charm that one forgets the fatigues of the journey, the lateness of the hour, and the want of refreshment, and that to prolong such an interview one would with pleasure give up even the repose of the night. For in this countenance there is ever the profound expression of unparalleled modesty and of the self-denial which sacrifices everything to the happiness of a people whom this prince does not yet know, but whom he nevertheless loves already.

It takes one's breath away to write so long a paragraph, but Spaniards, and this Mexican bishop seems to be true to his origin, have always been famous for the orientalism of their hyperboles. An old French writer of the time of Henri IV. hits off this peculiarity in a capital sketch of a visit to Spain. His half-a-dozen short sentences, hardly taking so much space as the bishop's one, may perhaps find grace with your readers.

Methods that Spain is derived from Sparing by a slight transposition and omission of letters, such as the doctors in philology teach us to look for when we study the origin of words. We visited many of the grandees, and by all were grandly feasted—at least with fine words. Never saw I such banquets of paraphrases. The words were dressed in all sorts of fashions. There were venison pasties, fulsome words encased in a crust of dignity, and there were dry words to be eaten with fresh bread. The entries were composed of those little words, syllables, and letters which are current in prose and verse. Assuredly with these they made us great cheer, but it all passed in apostrophes through our ears. For sweetmeats and dessert we had bowing and scraping, and the stirrup cup was a jest and the password.

I have no wish to lead your readers into error regarding the probability of a speedy recognition of the Confederate Government by France; but, as my last letter was intended to show you, such a step would be highly popular with almost all classes. That it is feared by the revolutionary press, may be judged by articles which have appeared in the Opinion Nationale on the Confederate navy and on the present desperate condition of the South. With regard to the navy, after long maintaining that the Florida and Alabama were privateers, in spite of all that had been written proving the contrary, the Opinion now concludes, that "it is beyond question that these vessels belong to the military navy of an irregular State, which for two years has gone begging for admission into the family of nations." But the Opinion thinks no better of them for this, on the contrary it finds in the quality it at length concedes to them an aggravation of the offences of which it complains. "If they were corsairs their conduct would be most blameworthy, but as ordinary men-of-war it is perfectly odious." The bitterness of such language proves that this party grows daily more apprehensive of the near approach of a decision which they know can only be delayed, but it by no means follows that the step is immediately contemplated. The Emperor has too often shown his wish to act in concert with England on all great questions for it to be safe to calculate that he will again, as in the one case of Italy, act separately. His wishes on this score have been made sufficiently public, and it has been said of him that what he wishes he wishes long and well, but it has been seen that the more steadily his eye is fixed upon an object the slower are his movements.

Captain Maffitt of the Florida is now in Paris, suffering from an old disease which imperatively requires repose. The highest confidence is expressed by those who know his successor in his talents and daring, and we may hope that the Florida has still a long career of success before her. Her new commander's best praise will be that he diminish our regrets for the temporary loss of the old one's services.

The rumours of the recall of Baron Gros from London, with the nomination of M. de Walewski as his successor, are neither confirmed nor altogether contradicted. M. de Walewski's nomination would be considered here as a first move in favour of Poland, to which country he in some sort belongs. It is, however, not probable that for the present at least there will be any change, still the rumours are so persistent that there is reason to suppose they must have had some grounds.

I forgot to mention that the Constitutionnel has reproduced the letter in which General Cluseret, of the Northern army, brands the brigand-like organisation of the corps he has served in. Coming from such a quarter, it is the strongest evidence of the barbarous character the North has given to the struggle, and its appearance in a semi-official journal sufficiently indicates the impression it has made here. The Government Mr. Dayton represents has hardly received a severer blow from the French press, in which the Constitutionnel may be considered the highest authority.

EARL RUSSELL ON AMERICA.

The following is the portion of Earl Russell's speech at Blairgowrie relating to American affairs. :—

Well, gentlemen, I come now to another question, a question interesting to us all, a question on which I must beg for your attention, because I wish to explain some circumstances in which the character of this country I think has been maligned. I am speaking of what has occurred in what a few years ago were the United States of America. A few years ago we were exulting in the prosperity of that country; we were happy to see a people derived from the same ancestors as ourselves enjoying free institutions, enjoying apparent harmony among one another, and with whom we had, at least just before the civil war broke out, hardly a difference—a difference only with regard to the small island called St. Juan, and which we had proposed to refer to the arbitration of the Swiss Republic. This was the state of affairs when that which we certainly had no part in broke out; when, if I remember rightly, nine of the Southern States of America declared that they would form an independent Republic. Our course on the subject has been attacked and blamed in the bitterest terms—blamed sometimes by the Federals and sometimes by the Confederates. The first offence was felt by the Federals. They said we had no right to grant—so far as we were concerned—to the Confederates the rights of belligerents. Well, now, gentlemen, that question of the rights of belligerents is a question of fact. I put it to you whether, with 5,000,000 people, 5,000,000 I mean of free men declaring themselves in their several States collectively an independent State, we could pass over that as a petty rebellion. Our admirals asked whether the ships they met bearing the Confederate flag should be treated as pirates or no. If we had treated them as pirates we should have been taking part in the contest. (Cheers.) It was impossible to look on the uprising of a community of 5,000,000 people as a mere petty insurrection (hear, hear), or as not having the rights which at all times are given to those who, by their numbers and importance, or by the extent of the territory they possess, are entitled to these rights. (Cheers.) Well, it was said we ought not to have done that because they were a community of slaveholders. Gentlemen, I trust that our abhorrence of slavery is not in the least abated or diminished. (Loud cheers.) For my own part, I consider it one of the most horrible crimes that yet disgraces humanity. (Cheers.) But then, when we are treating of the relations which we bear to a community of men, I doubt whether it would be expedient or useful for humanity that we should introduce that new element of declaring that we will have no relations with a people who permit slavery to exist among them. We have never adopted it yet, we have not adopted it in the case of Spain or Brazil, and I do not believe that the cause of humanity would be served by our adoption of it. (Hear, hear.) Well, then, it was said that these Confederate States were rebels—rebels against the Union. Perhaps, gentlemen, I am not so nice as I ought to be on the subject. But I recollect that we rebelled against Charles I. (a laugh), we rebelled against James II., and the people of New England, not content with these two rebellions, rebelled against George III. (Hear, and laughter.) I am not saying now whether all these rebellions were justifiable or whether they were wrong—I am not saying whether the present rebellion in the Southern States is a justifiable insurrection, or is a great fault or a great crime. But I say that the mere fact of rebellion is not in my eyes a crime of so deep a dye that we must renounce all fellowship and communion and all relationship with those who have been guilty of rebellion. (Loud cheering.) But, certainly, if I look to the declarations of those New England orators—and I have been reading lately, if not the whole, yet a very great part, of the very long speech by Mr. Sumner on the subject, delivered at New York—I own I cannot but wonder to see these men, the offspring, as it were, of three rebellions, as we are the offspring of two rebellions, really speaking, like the Czar of Russia, the Sultan of Turkey, or Louis XIV. himself, of the dreadful crime and guilt of rebellion. (Loud laughter and cheers.) Well, gentlemen, there came another complaint, and the complaint came this time from those so-called Confederate States, who said that we had, contrary to the Declaration of Paris, contrary to the general international law, permitted a blockade of 3,000 miles of the Southern coast of America. It is quite true we did so. It is quite true—and here perhaps there seemed at least a plausible reason for complaint—that though this blockade was kept up by a sufficient number of ships, yet these ships—many of them adopted into the United States navy and sent to sea in a hurry, and ill-fitted for the purpose—did not keep up that blockade so effectively and so thoroughly as it must have been held an effective blockade required. But still, looking to the law of nations, it was a blockade; it was a blockade which we as a great belligerent Power in former times should have acknowledged. We ourselves had had a blockade of upwards of 2,000 miles, and it did seem to me that we were bound in justice to the Federal States of America to acknowledge the blockade. But there was another reason, I confess, that weighed with me—our people were suffering, and suffering very greatly, for the want of the material which was the great support of their industry. It was a question of self-interest whether we should not break that blockade, but, in my opinion, the name of England would have been for ever infamous if for the sake of interest of any kind we had violated the general laws of nations, and made war with those slaveholding States of America against the Federal States. (Hear, hear.) And, gentlemen, I am not speaking the sentiments which are peculiar to myself, or to those who have no immediate interest in the question, but these are, I am convinced, the sentiments of that noble-hearted people of Lancashire, who have lived and flourished by their industry, but who would not, I am sure, allow a single spot on the escutcheon of their nation in order to maintain that industry (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Well, there came new complaints—a complaint on the part of the Federals that we allowed a ship to leave the port of Liverpool, which afterwards committed depredations on their commerce. Gentleman, it would lead me far if I were to go over all the particulars of the question, but you must know that in order to prove an offence you require such evidence as can be sifted in a court of justice; and it was not till the very day the Alabama left Liverpool that in the opinion of lawyers we had evidence sufficient to keep the vessel and crew; then I doubt whether if we had brought the evidence before a court of law it would have been found that we had sufficient evidence to condemn her, because, by an evasion of the law, the ship was fitted up without the arms necessary for her equipment, and these arms were conveyed to her in the waters of a foreign country, very far from the jurisdiction of England. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, these questions must be weighed, and I think they will be weighed, as they frequently have been weighed by the Government of the United States of America, in the balance of equity. We know that the Foreign Enlistment Act and the whole law respecting the subject is very difficult of application. The principle is clear enough. If you are asked to sell muskets you may sell muskets to one party or to the other, and so with regard to gunpowder, shells or cannon; and you may sell a ship in the same manner. But, if you, on the one hand, train and drill a regiment with arms in their hands, or allow a regiment to go out with arms in their hands to take part with one of two belligerents, you violate your neutrality and commit an offence against the other belligerents. So in the same way, in regard to ships, if you allow a ship to be armed and go at once to make an attack on a foreign belligerent, you are yourself, according to your own law, taking part in the war, and it is an offence which is punished by the law. But these questions lead, as you will see, to most difficult problems—as to whether, for instance, a thousand persons here may go out as labourers to the Federal States, and in the next place a thousand muskets may go out in another ship, and when they arrive in America these thousand labourers, having had an understanding before, may make a formal engagement and be armed with these thousand muskets; though if that had been done in the territory of the Queen, and on the soil of this country, it would have been an offence. There are other questions with regard to ships that have lately been prepared in this country, because these ships are not like ships which receive the usual equipment known in wars in times past; but they are themselves, without any further armament, formed for acts of offence and war. They are steam-rams, which might be used for the purposes of war without ever touching the shores of the Confederate ports. Well, gentlemen, to permit ships of this kind knowingly to depart from this country—not to enter into any Confederate port, not to enter into the port of a belligerent—would, as you see, expose our good faith to great suspicion; and I feel certain that if, during our war with France, the Americans had sent line-of-battle ships to break our blockade at Brest, whatever reasons they might have urged in support of that, we should have considered it a violation of neutrality. Such is the spirit in which I am prepared to act. Everything that the law of nations requires, everything that our law, that the Foreign Enlistment Act requires, I am prepared to do, and even, if it should be proved to be necessary for the preservation of our neutrality, that the sanction of Parliament should be asked to further measures. In short, to sum up, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to do everything that the duty of neutrality requires—everything that is just to a friendly nation, taking as a principle that we should do to others as we should wish to be done to ourselves. (Loud cheers.) But this we will not do—we will not adopt any measure that we think to be wrong. We will not yield a jot of British law or British right in consequence of the menaces of any foreign Power. (Loud and prolonged cheers.) And now, reverting again to the complaints that have been made, it is singular to observe how jaundiced the minds of some of those who speak in the New England States are on this subject of our conduct. There were some persons, members of the House of Lords, who thought fit to complain on an apparent case of grievance—and not one case, but many cases—of ships of ours that had been seized; ships in some cases passing from neutral ports, in other cases on the sea, but apparently on a legitimate voyage; and it was urged that we ought not to submit to have our vessels thus seized and our commerce thus interrupted. I had to deal with that case, and my answer was that, according to the law of nations, if a ship had an ostensible voyage to a destination which was not her real destination—if she was bound, in fact, to an enemy's port with munitions of war, the belligerent had a right to stop that vessel on the high seas. I said the law had been laid down by Lord Stowell and other great English authorities, and that now we were neutrals I did not think it fit we should depart from a law we had laid down as belligerents. (Cheers.) I said that in America, although there were some of the local courts which had not the authority of such men as Lord Stowell and Sir William Grant, yet there was a Court of Appeal, there was a Supreme Court in the United States which contained, and had for many years contained, men as learned and of as high reputation in the law, and of as unsullied reputation for integrity, as any that have sat in our English courts of justice, and that we ought to wait patiently for the decisions of those tribunals. Now, what is my surprise to find, and what would be your surprise to find, that Mr. Sumner is so prejudiced that he brings these declarations of mine against me, saying that I have diminished the reputation of the American Courts, and that I showed myself biased against the Federal States by the declaration I then made in Parliament? (A gentleman from the Southern States here ejaculated, "He is not to be believed.") I will not detain you further on these subjects; but one remark I must make on the general tendency of these speeches and writings in America. The Government of America discusses these matters very fairly with the English Government. Sometimes we think them quite in the wrong; sometimes they say we are quite in the wrong; but we discuss them fairly, and with regard to the Secretary of State I see no complaint to make. I think he weighs the disadvantages and difficulties of our situation in a very fair and equal balance. But there are others, and Mr. Sumner is one of them, his speech being an epitome almost of all that has been contained in the American press, by whom our conduct is very differently judged. With regard to all these matters there are difficult questions; we may have reason to complain in some instances, and the Federal Republic of America may have reason to complain also. But let us recollect that we are, as I have said, descended from the same ancestors, that in the courts of justice in America the common law of England is constantly studied, and the decisions of our great judges constantly referred to as decisions to be there respected; that our Shakespeare and our Milton are to them classical books as they are to us; that we have the same inheritance of freedom; that many of our institutions, as you may see by reading that excellent book of M. de Tocqueville on America, are identical; that the same spirit of liberty animates us both; that we, after our revolutions chose a constitutional monarchy as the best form of Government, and they after their revolutions chose a republic; but that thus united, having the same spirit of law, having the same spirit of literature, having the same spirit of freedom, we ought, when this unhappy contest is over, to embrace one another as friends, and that we in the Old World and they in the New ought to be the lights to promote the civilisation of mankind. (Loud cheers.) Now, gentlemen, with these feelings I own I almost lose my patience when I see men, in what is called an oration, heaping up accusation after accusation, and misrepresentation after misrepresentation, all tending to the bloody end of war between these two nations. I cannot but say, are they not satisfied with the blood that has been shed in the last two years?—with that field of Gettysburg where 10,000 corpses of men, most of them in the prime of manhood, were left lying stretched on the ground? Are they not satisfied with that bloodshed, but would they seek to extend to the nations of Europe a new contest in which fresh sacrifices are to be made of human life, of human interest, and of human happiness? (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I trust that that will not be the case. I know, at least, that my efforts, such as they are—weak they may be, ineffectual I hope they will not be—will be directed to keep peace between these two nations, and to do everything which I think is just and right towards this people; and, ready to meet attack if we are unjustly attacked, ready to bear our part in the contest, if contest there must be; but yet believing that we ought to make every effort that all these various conflicts may end in peace, in union, and in friendship, I shall at all events have the consciousness that I have done my best to preserve peace between these mighty nations. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, it is a great subject; it affects the people of this part of the world and of America; it affects the future stage of civilisation; it affects the well-being of the black race, whom it was the crime of our ancestors to introduce to America, and who, if these matters end well, will be, as I believe they are fitted to be, peaceable and intelligent members of a free country (cheers), on behalf of whose welfare we have been ready to make great efforts and to sacrifice much. But we will not sacrifice any of those views of ours to mere pretence. We have as strong feelings for the good of mankind as any people can have; we must maintain our own position; and my belief is that the people of what were the United States, whether they are called Federals or Confederates, will finally do us justice, and that they will observe—as, indeed, they cannot help observing—that in this free country, where there is so much discussion and so much difference of opinion, there are parties, very considerable in number, who sympathise with the Confederates, and other large masses—I believe superior in numbers—who sympathise with the Federals; but whether sympathising with the one or the other we have all embraced in our hearts that sentiment of justice—justice we will do to others, justice we expect for ourselves, and I hope I am interpreting the feelings of your minds when I say that justice ought to prevail.

SUPPRESSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS IN THE UNITED STATES.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN has issued the following proclamation :—

"By the President of the United States.—A Proclamation.

"Whereas the Constitution of the United States has ordained that privileges of writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it; and whereas a rebellion was existing on the 3rd day of March, 1863, which rebellion is still existing; and whereas, by a statute which was approved on that day, it was enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled that during the present insurrection the President of the United States, whenever in his judgment the public safety may require, is authorised to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in any case throughout the United States or any part thereof; and whereas, in the judgment of the President, the public safety does require that the privilege of the said writ shall now be suspended throughout the United States in cases where, by the authority of the President of the United States, military, naval, and civil officers of the United States, or any of them, hold persons under their command, or in their custody, either as prisoners of war, spies, or aiders or abettors of the enemy, or officers, or soldiers, or seamen enrolled, draughted, or mustered or enlisted in or belonging to the land or naval forces of the United States, or as deserters therefrom, or otherwise amenable to military law or the rules and articles of war, or to the rules and regulations prescribed for the military or naval service, by authority of the President of the United States, or for resisting a draft, or for any other offence against the military or naval service :

"Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim and make known to all whom it may concern, that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is suspended throughout the United States in the several cases before-mentioned, and that this suspension will continue throughout the duration of said rebellion, or until this proclamation shall, by a subsequent one, to be issued by the President of the United States, be modified and revoked. And I do hereby require all magistrates, attorneys, and other civil officers within the United States, and all officers and others in the military and naval service of the United States, to take distinct notice of this suspension and give it full effect, and all citizens of the United States to conduct and govern themselves accordingly, and in conformity with the Constitution and the laws of Congress in such cases made and provided.

"In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed this 15th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1863, and of the Independence of the United States of America the 88th.

"By the President, ABRAHAM LINCOLN.
"WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State."

THE Richmond papers appear to have anticipated the evacuation of Morris Island and the batteries which have held General Gilmore at bay so long. They also concede that Sumter will be abandoned, as it is no longer tenable; but they contend that the safety of the city is in no wise involved in the loss of these outworks—the universal belief at Charleston being that the city would not be taken. It may, and doubtless will be, partially, if not wholly, destroyed by shells thrown from batteries soon to be constructed at Cummings' Point; but its destruction does not include possession of its site or of any portion of the mainland. The Richmond Dispatch states, on the authority of a gentleman who left Charleston on Friday of last week, that the troubles of the attacking forces "have not yet commenced, nor will commence, until they get into the harbour"—the opinion of the informant being that the iron-clads "would never get out of the harbour if they once got in."—Baltimore Gazette.

THE HON. EDWARD ELLICE ON AMERICA.

(From the Times, of September 21.)

Not half-a-dozen living Europeans so early travelled and traded on the Northern American continent, or had personally seen so much of the growth and progress of Transatlantic population, trade, and commerce. Mr. Ellice at that time formed the acquaintance of many of the families of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and, we need scarcely say, of the principal merchants and capitalists of the States. He made several voyages to the New World, and, lastly, in 1859, he again visited the Northern continent, purely from the interest of a traveller desiring to see with his own eyes the social progress since his preceding visit—an interval of some years; and if he had not been restrained by his friends he would have recrossed the Atlantic last year from interest in the causes and probable consequences of the deplorable civil war now raging in the States. He had for years said that he had outlived the American race of statesmen—that Calhoun, Webster, and Clay were the last of that class. He said the old Anglo-Saxon material was still left in sufficient abundance for a fresh supply; but that the intelligent, instructed, and wealthy classes had thrown away the staff from their hands by the concession of universal suffrage, and an equal vote to every foreigner who had landed twelve months on the shores of America. This fatal political mistake he said was aggravated by the weakness of the Executive in a Federal Union with separate States' Rights. For years past he had openly said in society, and written to every correspondent at home and abroad, that a political crisis was impending, which could only involve an internecine civil war—that a contest between Protection and Free Trade, between Slave and Free Labour, and between the gentry of the South and the men of the North, must ensue, terminating in a mortal civil war. He was at Nice when the first blood was shed, and he wrote his opinion home that the contest would be of considerable duration; that it was one practically for boundaries between the two classes of States; that in its earlier courses it would necessitate an inevitable paper currency ending eventually in national bankruptcy and grievous suffering; and that the war must be fought out until it ended in the ultimate independence of the Southerners, or in their temporary conquest and social ruin. The latter result, through good and evil report, he disbelieved; but he held that if the North succeeded by their naval supremacy in subjugating or destroying the South, it would have eventually the worst results for the Confederation. Indeed, he viewed the civil war, as a fact, as proof positive that such a vast extent of territory and increasing population never could many years longer hold together in one nationality; that conflicting interests had and would early rend the States in twain, and that certainly their Federal form of Government was the least calculated to keep together such dissimilar interests; and that the "Rebellion" was a precedent of revolution, which would probably end in three or four distinct governments. Mr. Ellice, in uttering these far-sighted views, declared that for a quarter of a century past some of the most able public men of the South had expressed to him their conviction that the growing and boundless extension of the States had altogether revolutionised the representative system and would render it unmanageable. Ex-Presidents confessed to him that they had not in truth been successors of Washington, Jefferson, and Madison. Mr. Ellice was therefore of opinion that the success of the North against the South would be the most fatal consequence of the civil war, and would only hasten the ultimate dissolution of the original Federal Union. We have dwelt thus long on this great Transatlantic subject of the day because the words and correspondence of such a political seer as Mr. Ellice are of much interest and moment. His private correspondence with the States we know has been received with great interest and respect. He never kept exclusive American society. Last year he received Mr. Mason at Glenquoich. The past month he was the host of the Federal Ambassador, Mr. Adams. Mr. Ellice's mind was not contracted; he opened it to men of all opinions, and he used the telescope, not the microscope, in viewing his fellow men and their several governments. Time and another Transatlantic generation will test the truth or fallacy of Mr. Ellice's strong apprehensions.

SOUTHERN CONFIDENCE.—The Baltimore Gazette, in its news summary, thus discourses on the state of feeling in the South at the latest advices. "There is a fearful amount of incredulity prevalent among the Southern people in regard to their powers of resistance and the eventual result of their struggle for what they are pleased to call 'independence of Northern domination.' Judging by the tone of their papers and by the reasoning—foolish as it may be—of such men as William C. Rives, of Senator Toombs and others, they labour under the lamentable delusion that the cause which Northern journals and Northern politicians declare to be lost is not lost at all. They are even beginning to accept their recent reverses—deeply depressing as they were at first—with a degree of fortitude which is really astonishing in a people that, as we are taught to believe, are on the verge of subjugation. They talk about their armies in the field; the fine spirits, the increasing numbers and abiding confidence of the men composing those armies; and they actually look forward to future victories and final triumph with a placid assurance that is absolutely astonishing to contemplate. It is nothing but sheer hallucination of course; but it seems to have taken the chronic form, and will be correspondingly difficult to eradicate. The loss of Morris Island and its batteries does not appear to seriously distress them; the loss of Knoxville and Chattanooga they regard as only a temporary deprivation of a strip of territory, which Rosecrans and Burnside will be greatly troubled to hold; and they even have the audacity to speculate upon the probability of both these Federal generals being defeated by the numerically weaker forces of Bragg and Buckner.

"Their reliance, too, on the skill of General Lee and the valour of his troops continues to be unbounded, and whilst they deplore his failure to capture the greater portion of the Army of the Potomac at Gettysburg, they have still the presumption to imagine he will yet retrieve that disaster by a signal victory at some point not very remote from Washington.

"It is a matter for deep pity that such delusions as these should prevail so extensively throughout the whole of the States south of the Potomac; but candour compels us to say that, so far as we can learn from the articles in their newspapers and the letters of their public men, they are—with here and there an exception—all pervading; and that whilst Northern journals and Northern politicians are discussing how they shall be ruled when they are brought back into the Union, these fanatical Confederates are busying themselves for a continuation of the struggle with the avowed determination to control their own destinies."

THE UKASE—SUSPENSION OF HABEAS CORPUS.

(From the New York Daily News of Sept. 16.)

The writ of habeas corpus is suspended throughout the land. The entire North has been outlawed, and our judicial structure, by one sweep of the Presidential pen, has been demolished. We live hereafter under martial law. Anyone wearing the Federal uniform can arrest a citizen "for any offence against the military," and the Courts of law shall have no power to intervene. The once free and independent States now form one vast military camp, and all that remains of a Republican Government is a memory and a name.

The Tribune, announcing upon its bulletin this intention of despotism, says: "God bless him!"—Abraham Lincoln, Suwarrow, proclaiming the fall of Ismael, wrote "Glory to God and the Empress." The imperial prostitute whose name he thus linked with Divinity was the reproach of the age she lived in, and the curse of her country. The Tribune's exploration goes for nothing, if not for sacrilege, when associated with this violation of the most sacred right of American citizenship. We too say, God bless Abraham Lincoln! Bless him with more wisdom, patriotism, and humanity than his proclamation evinces as his attributes. Bless him with a conception of the misfortune he has wrought and the wrong that he is contemplating. Bless him with endowment of reverence for the institutions of his country, and with appreciation of his duty and the obligations of his official oath. But, assuredly, unless repentance and atonement interpose between him and retribution in lieu of blessing, his portion will be the imprecations of his countrymen to the last generation.

What means a suspension of habeas corpus upon the eve of momentous State elections? The Federal arms are everywhere in the ascendant. The Administration has passed scatheless, except of moral injury, the ordeal of conscription; the most odious, thus far, of its measures. The North is inoffensive in the face of provocation; sullen, perhaps, but submissive; passive and deprecatory of further injustice and insult. The people are willing and anxious to submit their cause to the ballot-box, and neither turbulence nor violence menace the general repose. Why, then, suspension of habeas corpus? Is it to provoke the collision that the people would avoid? Is it because the masses are too obedient and humble, and by their calm propriety thwart the intentions of tyranny and leave no pretext for oppression? Does the despot chafe at the good nature and forbearance of his subjects? If not intended as a goad to popular resentment, the proclamation seems strangely inopportune.

Perhaps, like Gessler's cap, it conveys but a challenge to startle the Tells of the Republic from their apathy, that they may be marked and dealt with. If it means anything it means danger to the Elective Franchise. "Bend, slaves, to Gessler's cap!" if you will, but cling to your Elective Franchise. New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio are more difficult than Maine to be moulded by fanaticism. Therefore the proclamation.

What will Governor Seymour do to ward off this last blow at State sovereignty and judicial independence? He has promised much, what will he do? His words are excellent; they flow like the gentle streams and please the ear like the melody of harps. But they will not satisfy the demands of the public common sense and love of liberty. What will he do, and when will it be done?

THE OFFICERS OF NEGRO REGIMENTS.—A Washington letter dated the 8th of September, published in the New York Times, has the following important information relative to an important question which has been interposed by the Confederates in providing for a general exchange of prisoners: "A gentleman from New York, the father of an officer in one of our coloured regiments who is now a prisoner in the hands of the rebels, called on the President to learn what policy would be pursued by the Government in regard to exchanging prisoners, and urged upon the President to consent to no exchanges being made unless the rebels exchange white officers of coloured regiments as other prisoners of war. The President said he would do all in his power to effect the release of these officers and all others who are now prisoners in the South, but he was not prepared, nor would he consent to make the release of officers of coloured regiments an indispensable condition to the renewal of exchanges. This Government was prepared to exchange man for man with the rebels, even should they refuse to release officers of coloured regiments in their hands. This would be done because this Government considered it unfair to make the cases of a few officers a test question, when a much larger number would be benefited by the resumption of exchanges, and the question of exchanging these officers was left open for future consideration. He wished sincerely that they could be released speedily, but Jeff Davis was a party to be consulted, and they could not be exchanged unless by agreement with rebel authorities. The question raised in regard to these officers was not covered by cartel, and officers of these regiments knew, when they entered the service, the peculiar risks incidental to their position, and for the present must endure the disagreeable consequences. The President, however, assured the gentleman that any unusual or barbarous treatment of such officers or the coloured soldiers, would cause retaliation on our part upon the rebel prisoners in our hands."—National Intelligencer.

The editor of the Savannah News, who was in Charleston the night Gilmore commenced shelling the city, thus describes the scene:—"The scene, as the Yankee incendiary shells came hurling through the air, crushing through the chambers of sleeping women and children, or bursting in the streets, scattering their fragments in every direction, and lighting up the darkness with a sudden glare, was shocking in the extreme. Shell after shell followed at intervals of some ten minutes, each preceded by the sullen roar of the far off battery. Soon the streets in the vicinity where they struck were filled with men, women and children; the former as firemen or soldiers repairing to their alarm posts for duty, the latter hastening—they knew not where—somewhere for safety. While the streets were thus filled with terrified families the rain poured down, adding to the horrors of the scene. The shelling continued for about an hour and a quarter, when it ceased. At two o'clock, when we retired to our chamber in the Mill House, Meeting street was comparatively quiet. From the door of our hotel every shell could be distinctly heard and the point at which it struck pretty nearly determined. We heard of several houses and one church in different parts of the city which were more or less damaged by the shells; but no instance of injury to persons was reported when we left the city yesterday morning. We heard of one very narrow escape, a shell having passed through a chamber in which two young girls were sleeping. The bed was struck and a part of the mosquito bar torn away; but, providentially, neither of the sleepers were hurt."

THE OUTRAGES OF THE NORTHERN ARMY.

To the Right Hon. Earl Russell, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The memorial of the executive committee of the Manchester Southern Club humbly sheweth,—That your memorialists desire to call your lordship's attention to a subject of serious and urgent importance. Your memorialists have watched with anxiety the progress of the war in America, by which the Government of the United States designs to subjugate the people of certain seceded states, commonly called the Confederate States, and to deny to them those principles of constitutional liberty, progress, and self-government which have long been regarded as the basis of union between the North American States. Lamentable as the consequences of this war have been, your memorialists, adhering to her Majesty's proclamation of neutrality, have hitherto borne with patience the serious evils inflicted upon them by the derangement of commercial relations between this country and the United States, in the hope that the enlightened people of that country would adopt a reasonable view of their political differences, and agree to a cessation of hostilities. Your memorialists, however, see with grief and alarm that no mitigation of bitterness between the contending parties has yet appeared, but, on the contrary, the warfare has assumed an unrelenting and an exterminating character, so much so, indeed, that notice must be taken thereof by the governments of Europe. Your memorialists believe that, whilst her Majesty's government maintains a strict neutrality, it is not contrary to the usages of nations, much less to the claims of humanity, civilisation, and Christianity, to protest solemnly against the outrages that have disgraced the Federal arms, and rendered all hopes of political reunion utterly impossible. Of these outrages your memorialists especially complain:—Wherever the Northern armies have gone their progress has been marked by a meanness and barbarism which have no parallel in the history of civilised warfare; their robbery of private property; their wanton pillage; destruction of towns and villages, of manufactories and workshops; their revengeful demolition of unprotected farmsteads, agricultural implements and produce; and their massacre of peaceful citizens, and outrages on helpless women and children. If it were necessary to cite special cases for your lordship's examination, we might refer you to the destruction of Pensacola by fire, by the 28th Maine Regiment, on being ordered to New Orleans. For three days and nights the place was enveloped in smoke and flames, the infuriated soldiery pillaging the stores and seizing the property of citizens who had offered no indignity to the Federal troops. Your lordship will remember the wanton destruction of the city of Jacksonville, the particulars of which were given in the New York Tribune. The writer says the city with its splendid mansions, warehouses, trees, and orange groves, was committed to the flames by the 6th Connecticut Regiment; and he asks, as if pointing to the vandalism of the fifth century, 'Is not this vindictive, unrelenting war? Have we not attained the European standard? The town of Darien, in Georgia, was burnt by negro troops under command of Colonel Montgomery and officers from Massachusetts and Pennsylvania. The churches and building had turpentine sprinkled on the floor, and were then set on fire; cattle were shot in the streets, and their carcasses left to rot; all the negroes were forced to accompany the Federal troops at the point of the bayonet, and any attempting to escape were shot through the head. The conduct of too many of the Northern officers has been after the examples of Generals Butler, Turchin, and McNeil; and even General Meade, by a recent order, declares that for any damage to the roads under his command the people residing within ten miles shall be held responsible, and if this be not enough, the entire population shall be forcibly removed beyond his lines, and their property seized for Government use. A London correspondent, speaking of the use of Greek fire in the present siege of Charleston, says:—'Although as an agent of destruction it has no equal, civilisation until now, by that tacit, understanding among Christian nations which respects the use of unnatural weapons, has refrained from its employment, even in the most bloody and desperate campaigns. It has been left for this administration to conjure up this liquid demon, as a fit ally to their purposes of extermination.' Another demoralising proceeding is the exaction of an oath of allegiance from private citizens under conflicting military pressure. This refined degradation has even been exulted in by certain officers of the Northern army. Your memorialists believe such acts to be arbitrary, inhuman, and unjustifiable, even in a military point of view, and calculated to produce only embitterment, retaliation, hatred, and savageness. Your memorialists, therefore, pray your lordship to take these matters into your serious consideration, and to instruct Her Majesty's Ambassador at Washington to present a friendly but firm remonstrance to the proper authorities, that if, unhappily, the war must be continued, it may at least be divested of unnecessary cruelty towards unoffending and helpless people. And your petitioners will ever pray.

(Signed)

R. G. BEESLEY, Chairman.
M. N. ELLIOT, Vice-Chairman.
JAMES ARMSTRONG, Treasurer.
MATTHEW CHADWICK and T. M.
WALKER, Hon. Secs.

The following is the reply of the Foreign Office:—

Foreign Office, September 25, 1863.

SIR,—I am directed by Earl Russell to acknowledge receipt of the memorial, dated the 15th instant, of the Executive Committee of the Manchester Southern Club, in which they urge the propriety of Her Majesty's Minister at Washington being instructed to present a remonstrance to the United States Government respecting the unrelenting and exterminating character which the war in North America has assumed.

I am to state to you, in reply, that Lord Russell fears that no representation of Her Majesty's Government will do good, but that his Lordship will instruct Her Majesty's Minister at Washington to report on the statements made in your memorial.—I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant.

E. HAMMOND.

Richard G. Beesley, Esq., Manchester Southern Club.

THE JACKSON STATUE FUND.—The total of the contributions for the memorial in honour of Stonewall Jackson, which have at different times been acknowledged in our columns, exceeds £900, and the amount contributed, but not yet paid in, or not yet reported to the treasurer by the collector, are estimated to swell the amount to within a few hundred pounds of the sum required for the projected statue and pedestal. The successful execution of the plan is therefore assured.

ORDER FOR FURLONGHS IN THE ARMY OF NORTHERN VIRGINIA.

General Lee has issued the following order relative to furloughs to his command:—In order to allow as many of our brave soldiers to visit their families and friends as can be done consistently with the good of the service, and at the same time give some reward for meritorious conduct, a system of furloughs is hereby instituted in this army. These furloughs will be granted, in the first instance, at the rate of two for every one hundred men present for duty; subsequently, at the rate of one for every one hundred men present for duty. This system will be continued as long as the exigencies of the service will permit. Should the effect not be found prejudicial, commanders of regiments and battalions will forward on each occasion the most urgent and meritorious cases from those recommended by the company officers, for the approval of their superior commander. The time will be regulated according to the following table: Virginia, 15 days; North Carolina, 18 days; South Carolina, 20 days; Georgia and Tennessee, 24 days; Florida, Alabama, Mississippi and East Louisiana, 30 days. Furloughs will be granted equally to soldiers from States and districts with which communication is cut off, but in no case will these furloughs carry permission to go within the enemy's lines or pass through them. The time for such cases will be regulated by the number of days allowed for the State in the above list which they intend to visit. The men furloughed will be authorised to bring back stragglers and recruits who may come in their way.

By command of R. E. LEE.

A. J. M. LITTERT,
Controller of Customs and N. Laws.

In connection with the above, the following "APPEAL TO THE BRITISH PUBLIC," published in the Charleston Courier, deserves attention:—

CHARLESTON, August 1, 1863.

In July, 1861, the British (Mr. Bunch) and French (M. Belligny) Consuls here received instructions from their Governments to ask the Confederate Government to adopt the principles of the Treaty of Paris of 16th April, 1856, so far as the same referred to the maritime rights of neutrals and to the establishment of blockades.

This was agreed to by the Confederate Government, and an Act in accordance passed by their Congress and approved by President Davis, 13th August, 1861: their assent to the first Article, in relation to privateering, not being asked.

The stipulations of the Treaty of Paris are as follows:—

"Article No. 1.—Privateering is, and remains, abolished.

"Article No. 2.—The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war.

"Article No. 3.—Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under enemy's flag.

"Article No. 4.—Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective; that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy."

The parties then remained mutually bound to observe and enforce the second, third and fourth Articles of the Treaty.

The word "really," used in the fourth Article, must mean that the condition thus explained should be interpreted in the strictest manner, both as to the letter and to the spirit; or else the word means nothing at all.

Appended herewith are lists of the arrivals of steamers with cargoes from foreign ports, at Charleston (43) and Wilmington (49), from commencement of the present year, that is, for seven months; there were also numerous arrivals of small sail vessels, of which we have no memorandum. The arrivals at the other ports in the Confederacy we have not here the means of furnishing.

Now, how can England acknowledge the blockade of these two ports of Charleston and Wilmington to be effective, with the fourth clause of the treaty before them in one hand, and these long lists of "access to the coast of the enemy" in the other?

The Confederates say that England, in acknowledging this blockade to be effective, dishonours her signature—treacherously; inasmuch as she disclaims the obligation entailed on her by her signature, after she had asked and obtained the Confederate Government to adopt the treaty, thereby securing to herself the advantages accorded to neutrals under the second and third clauses; whilst she treacherously declines carrying out the fourth clause, the honest enforcement of which was the inducement to the Confederacy for granting the concessions asked for, and contained in the second and third clauses. (See Consul Bunch's despatch to Lord Lyons, dated Charleston, August 16, 1861.)

And the Confederates further say, that the conduct of England in the matter is most unjust, inasmuch as by her thus shirking fulfilment of her written obligation a serious advantage is secured to the Northern Government.

In hope of calling the attention of the British public to this particular point this statement is laid before them; from which they can clearly understand the responsibility of England in the matter, and see how that responsibility is evaded by her present Government.

PROCLAMATION BY GOVERNOR VANCE.

The Governor (Vance) of North Carolina had issued the following proclamation:—

Whereas, a number of public meetings have recently been held in various portions of the State, in some of which threats have been made of combined resistance to the execution of the laws of Congress in regard to conscription and the collection of taxes, thereby endangering the public peace and tranquility, as well as the common cause of Independence which we have so solemnly engaged to defend; and whereas it is my sworn duty to see all the laws of the land faithfully executed, and quiet and order maintained within our borders:

Now, therefore, I, Zebulon B. Vance, Governor of the State of North Carolina, do issue this my proclamation, commanding all such persons to renounce such evil intentions, and warning them to beware of the criminal and fatal consequences of carrying such threats into execution.

The inalienable and invaluable right of the people to assemble together and consult for the common good, together with its necessary concomitants—the freedom of speech and the press—are secured to you, my countrymen, by the most sacred compact. They shall never find a disturber in me. Yet you will remember that the same instruments which guarantee these great rights also limit you to the exercise of them within the bounds of law, and impose upon me the solemn duty of seeing that these bounds be not transgressed. The Constitution of the Confederate States, and all laws passed in pursuance thereof, are the supreme law of the land. Resistance to them by combination is treason, and without combination is a high crime against the laws of your country. Let no one be deceived. So long as these laws remain upon the statute book they shall be executed. Surely, my countrymen, you would not seek to cure the evils of one revolution by plunging the country into another. You will not, knowingly, to the present desolating war with the common enemy, add the horrors of internal strife and entire subversion of law and civil authority! You must not forget the enviable character which you have always maintained as a sober, conservative, and law abiding people; nor would I have you to forget the plain, easy, and constitutional method of redressing your grievances. Meet and denounce any existing laws, if you think proper; you have that right, and instruct your representatives in Congress or the State Legislature, as the case may be, to repeal them. Your own chosen servants made those obnoxious laws: they can repeal them, if such are your instructions. If you regard them as unconstitutional, our Supreme Court sits ready to decide upon all cases properly brought before it. Its decisions are final in the State of North Carolina, and shall be executed while the power remains in your Executive to enforce any law. There is no grievance to redress and no proposition to be made but can be most beneficially effected in the way our fathers marked out by the ballot-box and the other constitutionally appointed means. In times of great public sensibility like the present any departure from this legal channel is revolutionary and dangerous, and tends to the division and distraction of our people.

It is my great desire, and I hope that of all good citizens, that our people should remain united, befall us what may. Should we triumph in the great struggle for Independence, let no feelings of revenge, no bitterness, mar the rejoicing of that glorious day. Should we fail, and come short of that great object for which we have struggled so long and bled so freely, let not our strifes and domestic feuds add to the bitterness of defeat.

Attempts suddenly to change the existing order of things would only result in bloodshed and ruin. I therefore implore you, my countrymen, of all shades of political opinion, to abstain from assembling together for the purpose of denouncing each other, whether at home or in the army, and to avoid seeking any remedy for the evils of the times by other than legal means and through the proper constituted authorities. We are embarked in the holiest of all causes which can stir the hearts of patriots—the cause of liberty and independence. We are committed to it by every tie that can bind an honourable people. Multitudes of our bravest and best have already sealed it with their blood, while others, giving up all earthly possessions, are either languishing in dungeons or are homeless wanderers through the land, and all have felt, in a greater or less degree, the iron hand of war. A great and glorious nation is struggling to be born, and wondering kingdoms and distant empires are stilled with listening hope and admiration, watching this greatest of human events. Let them not, I pray you, be shocked with the spectacle of domestic strife and petty malignant feuds. Let not our enemy be rejoiced to behold our strong arms and stronger devotion, which have often made him tremble, turned against ourselves. Let us rather show that the God of Liberty is in His holy temple—the hearts of freemen—and bid all the petty bickerings of earth keep silence before Him.

Instead of engaging in this unholy and unpatriotic strife, and threatening to resist the laws of the land and endangering the peace of society, let us prepare diligently and with hopeful hearts for the hardships and sufferings of the coming winter. Heaven has blessed us with abundant crops, but thousands of the poor are unable to purchase. Let us begin in time and use every effort to provide for them and secure them against suffering. And let us exert ourselves to the utmost to return to duty the many brave but misguided men who have left their country's flag in the hour of danger, and God will bless us and our children, and our children's children will thank us for not despairing of the Republic in its darkest hours of disaster, and still more for adhering to and preserving, amid the fiery trials of war, conservative sentiments, and the rights and civil liberties of the young Confederacy.

In witness whereof Zebulon B. Vance, your Governor, Captain-General, and Commander-in-chief, hath signed these presents and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed.

Done at the city of Raleigh, this 7th day of September, A.D. 1863, and in the year of American Independence the 88th.

Z. B. VANCE.

CHARLES SUMNER.—In reference to the recent philippic of this notorious personage against England and France, we find the following just appreciation of the man himself, and of the political significance of his words, in the Standard of 23rd ult.—"Individually he is entitled to no sort of credit. He, in some part, gained his fame and political position by being severely caned, and by parading, after the fashion of Mr. James Gordon Bennett, the marks of his stripes before Europe and America. The harangue which provoked the chastisement, the meek forbearance with which it was received, and the pitiable appeal with which the sufferer proclaimed his misfortune and begged the compassion of the world, sufficiently inform all those who have cared to learn the real history of the affair what manner of man this senator from Massachusetts is. But in his political character he is a personage of some consequence. He is chairman of the Senatorial Committee on Foreign Affairs, and in that position, as a supporter of the present Administration, is acquainted with its views, and holds an office almost equal in dignity and importance to that of Mr. Seward himself. In this capacity he has just been haranguing an audience of women and clergymen—the most bellicose and ferocious elements of Northern society—upon the state of the foreign relations of the Union. His speech seems to have been one long tissue of abuse of England and France, and particularly of the former. We need not be surprised that such a man should accuse us of unfriendly conduct in recognising the belligerent position of the South; for though the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee is well aware that, in the first place, we could not do otherwise, and that, in the second place, but for that recognition, we must have disallowed the blockade, his auditors are ignorant of this, as of many other simple but important facts. But when we find a man in his position openly declaring that England shall be held accountable for the damage done by Confederate cruisers which happen to have been built by English shipwrights, we can hardly avoid the conclusion that the Federal Government is not far from a declaration of war. We may not be entitled to demand from Mr. Seward an explanation of this language, for Mr. Sumner is not officially a member of the Cabinet. But it is our duty to take note of it, as virtually proceeding from the Federal Government; nor can we doubt that the wild menace that the empire of Mexico shall be swept away by the rising tide of the American people will be accepted by Napoleon III. as a warning to hasten the measure that shall finally deprive the 'American people' of all means of aggression in that quarter. A Southern Confederacy, relieved from the blockade by the French navy, and secured by French aid in possession of the Border States, will be a bulwark against which the Northern 'tide' will break and recoil harmlessly, with as much chance of overwhelming Mexico as of submerging Paris."

ANOTHER MASSACRE BY NEGRO SOLDIERS.—We have unquestionable authority for the truth of the statement below, horrible as it may seem to those who call ours the age of Christianity and civilisation. We give it in the words of the writer:—"On Tuesday night, the 25th ultimo, a party of thirty-eight negro soldiers murdered nine peaceable citizens in cold blood. The facts are as follows, and were related to me by Mr. A. M. Gwin, a planter residing at Brunswick Point, Mississippi.—The party of negroes got to the Hill place about 11 o'clock at night and arrested Mr. Sims and Mr. Hill. They took them with them and proceeded to Mr. Fore's, arriving there at sun-up; arrested him, and started up Deer creek. When a short distance above Mr. Fore's place the prisoners were ordered to stand on the side of the road. When Mr. Fore saw they were to be shot he sprang into the cane; at the same instant the prisoners were fired upon. Mr. Sims and Mr. Hill fell dead. Mr. Fore was shot through the shoulder. They proceeded up the creek to Mr. Clark's place and killed him at his house. They next went to Mr. Johnson's and killed him in the presence of his wife. They next shot Mr. Chaney. They then returned down the creek. The negro in charge of the squad ordered that nothing should be taken from any of the places. Mr. Fore made his way, in great suffering, to the river. A negro man from the Hunt plantation gave the information of what occurred after Mr. Fore made his escape. The wives of the murdered men are at their homes unprotected. Four more were murdered by the same party before they arrived at Hill's plantation, on their way up. Their names I did not learn. All the negroes were in full uniform and armed with muskets, and pistols in their belts. Deer creek is in Issaquena county, Mississippi, and empties into Yazoo river at Haines' Bluff."—St. Louis (Missouri) Republican.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Boulevard-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

The Impending Battles.

THE great armies of the North and South have by this time, in all probability, closed once more in deadly conflict. After months of desultory fighting—the ordinary prelude to those terrific engagements on which in Europe the fate of nations would depend—the opposing hosts have slowly approached each other's lines, with concentrated and recruited strength, and by the next mail we may learn that a fresh blow has been struck at the Confederacy, or that the advancing Federals have again been hurled back, bleeding, shattered, and panic-stricken, by the soldiers of Independence. It would be idle to attempt to shadow forth the grave issue which four-and-twenty hours may reveal. We shall content ourselves with tracing out the movements of the different armies to their battle-field, and leaving our readers to form their own conclusions as to the chances of a struggle in which so many circumstances, that we can take no account of in this country, may powerfully affect the result; observing only that the tone of Southern correspondence, the reports of the condition and numbers of the Southern armies, enable us to look forward with confidence to their present efforts.

It would appear that general actions, at the date of the last despatch from New York, were imminent in Virginia and Eastern Tennessee. In both States the advanced troops of the armies had been in collision, and their lines were almost within rifle-shot. In one or the other a great battle is certain, in both it is probable; but it is difficult to say whether the first blow will be struck on the banks of the Rapidan or in the hilly district of Tennessee. For the moment, however, Rosecrans's advance takes precedence in interest, and the defence of Eastern Tennessee claims to be the turning-point of the conflict. Hitherto, a strange mystery has surrounded the doings of the Confederate armies in this region. Since the battle of Murfreesboro' Bragg's forces have been comparatively idle. From time to time their cavalry under Forrest dashed into the Federal lines, capturing here and there a detachment, and on one occasion a whole brigade; and more than once the correspondents of the New York papers announced a forward movement of the whole army. But the lines of Murfreesboro' were too strong for attack. It was only when Rosecrans issued his order, announcing that the time had come for active operations, and moved forward upon Tullahoma, that the real fighting began. The earliest movements of the Federal army met with little resistance. The Confederates fell rapidly back, contesting now and then a strong position, but giving way before any serious attack; and Rosecrans made cautious but steady way into Eastern Tennessee. It was rumoured and generally believed that the Confederates would make a stand at Chattanooga, a place of remarkable natural strength on the Tennessee. Chattanooga was reported to be strongly fortified, and capable of six months' resistance to 100,000 men; when it was surrendered without a blow the exultation of the Federals was intense. Bragg's army was declared to be broken up, the General superseded, his soldiers demoralised, in open mutiny, and deserting by thousands, and the backbone of the Confederacy broken. It is not likely that so wary a commander as Rosecrans was deceived; but the faint opposition he met with at Chattanooga led to a further advance of a portion of his army into Georgia. On the road to Lafayette he finds the enemy in considerable force, his numbers increasing daily, and evidently prepared for a great battle. The truth is, that Chattanooga, though easily defensible, was easily turned. Rosecrans' army was numerous enough of itself to mask Chattanooga and make a flank movement, which would have cut off its defenders from Georgia and the Cotton States; and General Bragg drew off the garrison almost without the loss of a man. Simultaneously, however, with Beauregard's advance, Burnside's army of Kentucky moved upon Knoxville, about 100 miles north-west of Chattanooga, and occupied that town, the Confederates retiring before him, but so slowly as to inflict upon his advance a severe blow and capture 300 prisoners. At the latest date Burnside's army was in communication with Rosecrans, and according to Northern accounts their united forces would reach 100,000 men. But these figures are far above the numbers either of them could bring into line of battle. At the latest date Rosecrans had been compelled to take up a defensive position a few miles south-east of Chattanooga. His advance had pushed within a short distance of Lafayette, and had there met with a serious check from a superior force of Confederates, of which the Yankees say very little. It would seem that Bragg's army was slowly closing up for a general action. Of the strength of the Confederate force we cannot attempt to give anything like an exact estimate. The Yankees say that it exceeds the numbers with which Bragg fought at Murfreesboro', and they are doubtless correct. Since that battle the Confederate army of Tennessee has not remained intact, it is true. It is supposed to have given reinforcements to Generals Lee in Virginia and Johnston in Mississippi. But Johnston's army, relieved of any immediate fears about Mississippi and Alabama, has hastened north to Lafayette; troops have been poured in from North and South Carolina; Buckner is in the neighbourhood with a formidable division. Finally, it is stated that three veteran divisions of the army of Virginia, under Longstreet, have been conveyed by railway to East Tennessee. If this be the case, Rosecrans is in a position of considerable peril. His line of communications extends over 250 miles of country, the greater part of it through an intensely hostile population. The Confederates have a superior force of cavalry with which they may seriously impede his transport, and, in the event of his defeat, almost annihilate his army. The locality in which he now finds himself brought to a standstill has been occupied by Bragg's troops for months, and is at all times ill-calculated to sustain an army. He can, therefore, hardly sit down for any length of time and await attack, but he will probably be compelled to remain the assailant. If the Confederates have anything like the strength imputed to them, he will not fare so well as at Murfreesboro'. The fact is, the contraction of the defensive lines of the Confederacy is beginning to tell in their favour. Complete railroad communication between Virginia and the South enables their commander-in-chief to throw superior forces at any given point along the line of railway. General Lee can send 20,000 troops to Lafayette in a quarter of the time that would be necessary to march 5,000 men from Louisville to Chattanooga; and on the day of battle this advantage will tell.

The question is, whether General Lee can spare reinforcements for Tennessee. General Meade appears determined to try. The latest news from the Rapidan is to the effect that the whole Federal army was moving forward, and that a great battle was expected. It remains to be seen whether Lee has seriously reduced his forces, or whether the rumour of his despatch of troops southward is not a trap. The activity of the Confederates on the Rapidan does not mean much. That might either be dictated by the desire to inspire the belief in an offensive move, or be in itself the commencement of such a movement; it is impossible with our present information to decide which. But there is certainly no reason why General Lee should not have despatched 20,000 men to Bragg, and yet be in a condition to repulse Meade. There are twenty positions between the Rapidan and Richmond where battle might safely be given by an army of 50,000 men against twice the number of assailants; and if these were forced there are the lines of Richmond to fall back upon, a Torres Vedras on a small scale, which remove all anxiety about Richmond. If Meade should persist in an attack, we have little doubt that the result will be, as it has always been upon Virginian soil, a Confederate victory. For the time, the two Confederate armies of Virginia and Tennessee may be regarded as the two wings of one great line of battle; and Lee's tactics would seem to be, according to Northern accounts, a change of front by means of his railway communication, and the massing of a large force to overpower the enemy upon his extreme left. In a few hours we shall know something more precise about his movements, if indeed we do not hear that a great battle has been fought at each extremity of his line.

With these issues pending in Virginia and Tennessee the siege of Charleston has materially lost its interest. What news we have from thence is favourable to the besieged, and promises a very tedious task to the Federals. Fort Sumter still held out, so did Forts Moultrie and Bee. The repulse of the assault upon Sumter was a most brilliant and well-managed affair, and one that for some time will cripple the Federal naval force at Charleston. There was nothing left to General Gilmore but to carry out Mr. Lincoln's instructions and burn Charleston. The destruction of the city and the stone blockade will be lasting records of Mr. Lincoln's administration. At Sabine Pass the Federal army has met with another reverse, two of their gunboats having been captured with their crews in the attempt to force a passage, and the whole expedition having returned re infecta to New Orleans. It is in Virginia and Tennessee, however, not at Charleston nor in Texas, that the great battles of the Confederacy are to be fought, and any day may bring us the news that they have been fought and won.

The Press on Mr. Mason's Withdrawal.

NEARLY every paper, great and small, in the country has had its say about the recall of the Confederate Commissioner. It would be interesting to the people of the Confederate States, as well as to our readers, had we the space at our command for reproducing and placing into juxtaposition the various comments of the exponents of British public opinion sitting in judgment on this Southern vindication of national self-respect. As it is, we can only briefly glance at a few of the opinions which, either intrinsically or from the character of those expressing them, best deserve attention. Among these we should place first on the list the Morning Herald, as the earliest and most consistent, though by no means blind, friend of the cause of Southern Independence. The Herald more than questions the policy of the step taken by the Confederate Government, and indirectly censures President Davis for having been "too sensitive and too precipitate in resenting an affront," and for "having been urged on by popular clamour to an act which his better judgment must disapprove." Our contemporary seems to think that the importance of having the Confederacy represented by a man whose age, antecedents, and personal distinction entitled him to meet Earl Russell as an equal, and who would be in a position to take advantage of any changes in the disposition of Her Majesty's Government, should have overruled at Richmond all other considerations. At the same time it frankly admits that "when the circumstances of the young Republic are considered, and the provocation which it has received taken into account, President Davis cannot fairly be blamed for it." "The Government of the Confederate States could less afford to overlook a premeditated affront than the Government of a more powerful or more settled kingdom. It is more dependent on self-assertion; it must be more tenacious of its dignity and its rights because some are prepared to outrage them. The nation is young, undeveloped, and struggling with adversity. It had the right to expect more sympathy than it has received in Europe." The Herald is, however, severe in its strictures upon Earl Russell, whom it charges not only with an undignified truckling to the threats of the Federal Minister, but with a lamentable want of tact in withholding from the representative of so important a Power those courtesies which would not have committed the Government to political recognition.

It would have been interesting to contrast with this the opinion of the Morning Post, which, representing very different political views, has yet been scarcely second to the Herald in friendly sympathy for a people who sacrifice so much and fight so gallantly for the sacred right of national independence. The Post, however, for some unaccountable reason, has not thought proper to give its comment, and it is the only prominent journal in England or on the Continent which has not even alluded to Mr. Mason's withdrawal. The Globe, another Ministerial organ, takes the withdrawal in extremely ill part, and as its tone on this occasion differs from that which it usually adopts towards the South, it is, perhaps, fair to assume that it speaks the sentiments of one less friendly disposed than the Editor. "It is not the practice," says the Globe, "to enter into official relations with any State whose independence it does not publicly acknowledge, and all underhand relations, not official, necessarily partake more or less of the nature of intrigue." We cannot see the logic of this reasoning, or its applicability to the case before us. Her Majesty's Minister receives and replies to the memorials of Liverpool shipbuilders, Emancipation Committees, and Anti-slavery Societies, without its being inferred that he commits himself to the peculiar views of such memorialists. It is deemed his duty to inform himself accurately, through all the channels open to him, whether official or unofficial, of all that it imports the State to know, and to take cognizance of whatever interests the public service, in whatever manner it is brought to his notice. But it is not deemed essential to the official dignity of a Minister, or to his independence of action, that he should treat with studied incivility those who from their public or private position have a right to approach him, even though they should be the representatives of an unrecognised Government. Earl Russell's political virtue must be of a very susceptible character if he could not be civil to Mr. Mason without falling under the suspicion of "intrigue." Or does the Foreign Office live so in dread of Mr. Seward and his representative here that it is prudent to guard even against their unjust suspicions? "Mr. Mason," the Globe continues, "has lived among us and has used his opportunities to serve the cause he so fitly represents. It passes our comprehension to understand how he, a statesman, bred up under a constitutional Government, or his employers, also men accustomed all their lives to constitutional practices, could have anticipated that we should set aside those practices in order that he might occupy an anomalous position, the advantages of which would be with him, the disadvantages with us. It was no doubt politic to make the attempt, but we cannot believe the originators of the design ever expected that it would succeed." Again we fail to discover any contradistinction between constitutional practices and good manners, unless it is intended to be inferred that statesmen bred up under a constitutional Government should appear to be ill-bred in their intercourse with foreigners—which is a view that we had supposed confined exclusively to the City of Washington. The Globe assures us that "it is not courtesy, but policy, which opens the doors of the French offices and reception-rooms to Mr. Slidell; there is no courtesy or discourtesy about the matter." But we should have preferred its being a trifle more explicit when it adds, "For reasons which he alone knows, the Emperor of the French confers with Mr. Slidell; for reasons which we all know, Earl Russell has not conferred with Mr. Mason." However, we are thankful to the Globe, especially in the face of Earl Russell's recent startling declaration, for saying that "the sympathy of the British people is with the Slave State Confederacy," and will not question too closely into its description of the policy of the British Government. The "Confederate agents" will no doubt also take in good part the Globe's disinterested hint, "that they are not serving their cause when they attempt to create a hostile feeling against Lord Palmerston's Government."

The Times, as usual, sees deeper into the millstone than any one else, and it has discovered a solution of the riddle which has certainly the merit of being plausible and ingenious. It argues that the recall of Mr. Mason cannot proceed from any pique at the cool treatment of Earl Russell, nor from disappointment at the non-success of his mission.

"Such a supposition," it says, "is entirely at variance with the past policy of the Confederate leaders. Whatever their faults may be, hastiness and want of self-restraint are not among them. No men have borne bitter disappointment with more outward calm and impassiveness than they. When the stroke of calamity was sharpest they did not wince, and when baffled hopes and falsified predictions must have tried their courage and their temper they preserved a cheerfulness which must have cost them a strong effort. Similarly the attitude of England has never drawn from them any expression of impatience. . . . If, then, President Davis and his advisers have had their prudence overborne by anger, it is strange that their indignation should not have exploded sooner. If they bore with patience the coldness of Lord Russell and the unfriendly obstinacy of his Government at a time when the star of the Confederacy was in the ascendant, how is it that now, when grievous reverses have been undergone, they should be unable to control themselves? The most trying times to their self-restraint have been when the battles on the Chickahominy or the Rappahannock, the expulsion of the Federals from Texas, and their defeat at Charleston, were unable to move the British Cabinet, though they commanded such admiration and confidence in the French Emperor's mind that he revealed even to casual guests his desire for recognition. We must, then, give up the idea that the withdrawal of Mr. Mason is to be accounted for by any pique or mere angry feeling on the part of the Confederate leaders. These politicians are not the men to show their vexation; if they were, they would undoubtedly have shown it sooner.

Equally untenable is the notion that they think there is so small a chance of their successfully resisting the Federal invasion that it is useless for Mr. Mason to remain. Certainly the Confederate Government is not likely thus to blazon its despondency to the world even if it felt any, which, in spite of the late reverses, is contradicted by its acts and by the testimony of foreign observers in the South."

Hence it concludes:—

The true reason is, we think, to be found in the hopes which the Confederates have conceived of the French Emperor owing to the establishment of a monarchy under French protection in Mexico. The idea that an alliance with France may be formed on terms of mutual advantage—namely, the recognition of the Confederacy by France and Mexico, with, perhaps, some more substantial assistance hereafter, and, on the other hand, the guarantee of the Mexican territory by the Confederacy, and the acceptance of the Austrian monarchy as a neighbour—has, no doubt, prompted the Confederate statesmen to address themselves at last wholly and exclusively to France. They probably think, and it may be with truth, that in sending a pair of Commissioners, and thus taking for granted the united action of France and England, they committed a mistake—unavoidable at the time, but to be remedied as soon as its reality and importance are discovered. Slidell and Mason were always associated in men's minds, and so also were the Cabinets of Paris and London, as regarded American affairs. The South appealed to the two Powers, and it could not be a matter of surprise that one of them should hesitate to decide the case without the other. Now things have changed. One of those Powers has taken a position on the American continent which actually enables this poor, harassed, unrecognised Confederacy to confer a favour. The South has a new neighbour; the distant neutral State to which Mr. Slidell was sent two years ago is now a sort of natural ally, with a common antagonism to the Federal Power. Can it be wondered at, then, that the Confederate politicians desire to free the French Emperor from any shackle that may repress his liberty of action? The presence of Mr. Mason in London, typifying the unsuccessful appeal to the Anglo-French alliance, has no doubt been considered by the Confederates as such a shackle. "As long as we ask both Governments to recognise us," they think, "England will restrain France, and we shall effect nothing." Another policy is now in action, and the appeal is to France alone, as the protector of Mexican monarchy and the bold challenger of Federal supremacy on the Continent.

Among the cheap daily press, the two rivals for popular favour and "largest circulation" take very opposite views. The Standard regrets the withdrawal of Mr. Mason, thinks that it tends to alienation between two countries which have both the highest interests in being mutually friends, and throws the burden of the blame upon Earl Russell. The Telegraph, on the other hand, has a theory of its own, and one in which it stands alone in the Press. It intimates that the withdrawal is altogether Mr. Mason's act, and caused solely by his individual disappointment. It says:—

Distinctions have been drawn between the reception accorded to Mr. Slidell in France and that of which his colleague has complained here; but all such comparisons are fallacious, and calculated to mislead even those who make them. There may be differences between the two which would account for the difference in the works they exhibit; but we have nothing before us by which we could judge. It would, indeed, be a very idle affectation to ignore the well-known character of any public man; and it was at an early date assumed that the Commissioner selected to go to France had special qualifications for the more difficult duty; while a sort of antiquated—and, shall we say, obsolete—idea suggested that a gentleman of reserved and dignified manners, distinctly belonging to what is called "the old school," would be peculiarly suitable to aristocratic England. Now we are divulging what is no secret when we say that even in society, in the drawing-room of statesmanship, our departing visitor "made no way." He used no reserves as to the disagreeable circumstance of his having nothing to do, though compatriots of his, as well as of Cavour and of Canning, have declared that they could visit no place without learning something useful to their country, or finding out some way to serve it. However that may be, Mr. Mason seems to have reported home that he was of little use, and could not support "the dignity of his Government" so well as friends and connections had anticipated.

We quote this passage because we are in a position to assert that, however indignantly Mr. Mason has protested against the treatment he received from the Foreign Office (as was shown in the intercepted Confederate despatches), he never spoke except in the most grateful terms of his social reception in this country. On the only occasion he had for publicly expressing his thanks, he used it for this purpose and this alone. Unless the writer in the Telegraph was utterly unacquainted with those circles, with which he pretends to be so familiar in the above passage, he must have known that no American minister, and very few ministers of any foreign country, have to a greater extent enjoyed the boundless hospitality and social courtesy for which these islands are famous. It is well known, also, that Mr. Mason is deeply impressed with the kindness shown him by all classes, and is warm and sincere in his acknowledgment of it.

We have space for but few more quotations. One, however, we cannot pass by, because it is from pre-eminently "a people's paper," a penny weekly which has probably few rivals in circulation among the weekly press, and which, moreover, though not generally unfair, is not specially partial to the cause of the South. We quote from the Sunday Times:—

We can well believe that Mr. Mason has had to writhe under the supercilious behaviour of Her Majesty's Foreign Secretary. Earl Russell is not a courtier, by nature or by habit. He is simply a cold-hearted egotist; and he would treat Mr. Mason with an appearance of disdain, offensive no doubt to the feelings of a sensitive gentleman. Moreover, we have come to believe that Earl Russell either lives in dread of Yankee ferocity, or else sympathises strongly with the cause of the North. Certainly he has yielded everything of late to the demands of the Administration at Washington, and seems more and more inclined every day to let them have their own way with this country. In these matters we most cordially detest and despise his policy. And so do the great majority of thinking Englishmen.

Another quotation we make on account of the singularly eccentric view which it embodies. The London Review concludes an otherwise well-reasoned article:—

Much as we admire the gallantry the Southern States have displayed throughout this war, the sacrifices they have endured for a just cause, the magnificent stand they have made against an enemy having the command of the sea, and superior to them in numbers, equipments, and resources of all kinds, we cannot regret the conduct of our Government, which has decided President Davis to put an end to Mr. Mason's mission. With the Emperor of the French the case is different. It has suited his purpose to conciliate the Confederate States in the person of their Commissioner. Whenever he has appeared to depart from a position of neutrality it has been to take a step in the interests of the South; and for obvious reasons. We have not that interest in the establishment of the Mexican Empire which he has. If the hope of alliances in the New World were to influence our policy we should rather lean to the North.

But for the fact that the same idea obviously underlies the whole of Earl Russell's last manifesto in Scotland, it would scarcely be worth while to treat seriously an eccentricity to which even the Anglo-Federal press would hesitate to plead guilty. That the North, with all its interests in rivalry and antagonism to those of Great Britain, with eyes of eager cupidity fixed upon Canada, should be the natural ally of this country, while the South, which in its wildest dream of territorial aggrandisement could never trespass on an inch of British soil, which sells everything that this country needs to purchase, and buys all it has to sell, should by implication be regarded as a rival or a possible enemy, is a hallucination with which we did not expect to meet in the columns of the London Review. If, as there is only too much reason to fear, this idea guides the present foreign policy of England, God preserve the ship of State with a blind pilot!

Lord Russell at Blairgowrie.

THOUGH delivered on a trivial occasion, and to an audience not very numerous or very important, Lord Russell's speech at Blairgowrie is an exposition of policy fuller and more explicit than he has yet thought proper to afford to the House of Lords, or to make public in his despatches. As such it has been treated both by his opponents and his admirers in the Press; as such it seems to deserve from us a notice of some of its most important passages. For now at last we know, from his own mouth, what is the American policy of our Foreign Secretary, what are the principles on which he professes to deal with the two belligerents, and how he considers it right to apply those principles in reference to some of the most important questions raised by the events of the war.

He speaks throughout in a tone of self-vindication; and it is worthy of remark that the charges against which he thinks it is his duty to make a defence are almost uniformly of one kind—charges of a lack of friendliness towards the United States. He scarcely takes notice of the Confederate States; he seems to put them out of court altogether, as if they either had no reason to complain of him, or as if their complaints were altogether beneath his attention. As the Commissioner of those States had but a day or two before notified to the Foreign Secretary the order of recall received from his Government, we can hardly suppose Lord Russell ignorant of the fact that that Government conceives itself to have just cause of dissatisfaction with the policy pursued by England. We must therefore suppose that its dissatisfaction is a matter of such profound indifference to the Foreign Minister of Great Britain that he thinks it unnecessary to allude, in vindicating his American policy before his country, to a matter so insignificant. To his exalted vision, the Confederate States are of no more consequence than Brazil, and the withdrawal of Mr. Mason, on account of the want of courtesy displayed by Lord Russell towards him and his Government—a withdrawal which any statesman of a less lofty spirit would have felt either as a severe rebuke or an exasperating affront, according as he felt it to have been deserved or not—is of no more moment in the eyes of the Foreign Secretary than the absence of M. Moreira in consequence of the affronts offered to his country by the representative of Great Britain. We do not complain of this contempt; we say nothing of the feelings which it is likely to awaken; we express no opinion as to the danger of breeding ill-will between two nations more closely bound to one another by political and religious sympathies, by the ties of blood, and by mutual dependence, than any others in the world. We simply note the fact that, in defending his own American policy, Lord Russell speaks of the Confederate States almost as if they were not a political entity, certainly as if they were of no account in reckoning up the advantages and disadvantages, the justice or the injustice, of the course he has pursued. It is only of the Federal States that he thinks; them only he desires to conciliate; towards them only does he care that his countrymen should believe that he has acted fairly and in a friendly spirit. It is not that the Confederacy permits the existence of slavery; that ground is distinctly disclaimed. It must be, then, that Lord Russell ranks it with Brazil and Denmark and Greece, as a Power too weak to be reckoned with, too insignificant to have any rights which may interfere with the interests of the strong.

At the same time, we do not believe that this is the general opinion in England of the power or of the rights of the Confederate States; and it certainly is not our own. We shall take the liberty, therefore, in reviewing Lord Russell's speech, to supply its marked and evidently intentional omissions.

Lord Russell's American policy is founded on the principle that we should do as we would have others do by us. This is his avowed purpose; and with this view he recognises an invalid blockade; he allows the export of arms to New York and the enlistment in Ireland of recruits for the Federal army, while he allows supplies destined to find their way to the South to be intercepted on a legitimate voyage to a neutral port, and forbids the sailing of ships thought likely to find their way into the Confederate service. No doubt this is dealing by the Federal Government as we should like it to deal by us. If we were at war with France or Russia we should be very glad if the Federal Government would virtually render itself our ally. But there is another side to the question. If we were at war with a League sufficiently powerful to exclude us from the sea, how should we feel towards a Power which gave to our enemies all they asked and withheld from us all we required? Should we think that Power friendly, or neutral? If not, are we dealing by the Confederates as we would be dealt by? The golden rule is an excellent maxim for a neutral Power; but it is a rule of impartial application. True, we are more likely to stand in the position of the Federals than in that of the Confederates; but to say that we should deal by others as we are likely to have need that they should deal by us is a version of the Christian precept with which Lord Russell would hardly have ventured to scandalise a Scottish audience.

It was hardly necessary to vindicate the recognition of the Southern States as a belligerent Power; for Mr. Lincoln's own faction in the Supreme Court has decided, in the case of the Hiawatha, that such recognition was practically accorded by the President before our declaration was issued; the proclamation of blockade virtually acknowledging a state of war, and therefore the existence of two belligerents. But we should like to ask Lord Russell, why this recognition was not followed up in a more consistent spirit? Why was the concession of belligerent privileges in neutral waters so regulated as to give every possible advantage to the Power possessing the stronger navy? Why have the complaints of the Federal Government against the very limited belligerent rights accorded to the South been entertained so respectfully and allowed to prevail so largely? Why, above all, has the representative of a belligerent Power, able to send nearly half a million of men into the field, and twice to invade the enemy's territory, been treated with less attention and courtesy than is usually accorded to every distinguished foreign politician who may have matters of importance to communicate to the British Government? It is easy to show that the recognition accorded was no wrong to the Federal Government; is it so easy to prove that the courtesies refused and the restrictions imposed afford no ground of complaint to the Confederate States? Wisely, on this point, has his Lordship judged assumption easier than proof.

We have elsewhere pointed out the wrong done to the Confederates by the recognition of a blockade which, independently of all other considerations, is certainly invalid by the Articles of the Treaty of Paris accepted by the belligerents at the request of the British Government. Lord Russell omits this consideration entirely; he confesses the inefficiency of the blockade, even while he declares it "valid by the law of nations," and alludes to precedents set by ourselves in the days when, in revenge for the utterly illegal and outrageous proceedings of Napoleon, we ventured on measures not sanctioned by the law of nations, justifiable only by way of reprisals, and which immediately involved us in war with America. We do not think it necessary to say more on this head; but we must notice the very curious reason which Lord Russell gives for respecting the blockade, whether valid or not. We had so strong an interest in breaking it that it was incumbent on us not to do so! No doubt it would have been "infamous" for interest's sake to break the law of nations; though no nation has ever yet deemed itself bound to tolerate belligerent operations which made neutrality less advantageous than war. But what was required was, not to break, but to enforce the law. Lord Russell seems to be aware that his case here is weak; for he drags in a sneer at "those slaveholding States" entirely at variance with his previous declarations. With very little pretence to Quixotism, England has always been a chivalrous nation, in a dull and practical way; but this notion of honour, which forbids us to redress wrong and enforce law because we should make our own advantage by so doing, far exceeds the wildest flights of knight-errantry, and is so far outside the bounds of practical statesmanship that we can hardly suppose Lord Russell to have propounded it for any more serious purpose than that of escaping from a difficulty or eliciting a cheer.

It is true, again, that it would have been wrong to protect blockade-runners against the manifest right of the Federal cruisers to seize ships which, with a destination ostensibly neutral, were really carrying munitions of war to a Southern port. But no one proposed that such protection should be afforded. Lord Russell can scarcely have forgotten that the real complaint preferred was that the bond fide trade to Nassau and Matamoros was intercepted by Federal cruisers, not now and then by mistake, but deliberately and systematically; and that, while Mr. Seward pleaded that the vessels seized had really for their destination a Confederate port, the captors and their Prize Courts seized and condemned them simply as carrying contraband of war to ports whence it might find its way into the hands of the Confederates. The demand of British merchants was, not to be protected against the application of international law, but to be secured in the rights which that law allowed them; not to be permitted with impunity to break the blockade of Charleston, but to be defended by their Government against the blockade established at Nassau. Nor can Lord Russell have forgotten the answer he gave to those complaints and demands: that the trade to Nassau justly excited the suspicion and jealousy of the Federal Government, and if British merchants wished to escape annoyance they had better abstain from a trade which was displeasing to the United States. Many are the despatches which have been written, and written in vain, to undo the effect of that reply; which has been caught up and reiterated by the Federal Secretary of State as a rejoinder to every complaint which Lord Russell may make of vexatious seizures and illegal condemnations.

But this matter concerns only our interests; we turn to another in which our national honour is involved. Anxious to "do all that the duty of neutrality requires," Lord Russell has striven to comply with the demands of the Federal Government in regard to purchases of ships made by the Confederates in English ports. If he did not seize the Alabama, that was not his fault. He knew that the law was against him, and that she would not be condemned; but he would gladly have seized her in despite of the law, and he has seized and will seize all ships that may in future be reported to be intended for the same purchasers, and if need be will alter the law for that purpose. As the alteration of the law will require the consent of Parliament; as Parliament will probably think that to alter the law for the advantage of one of two belligerents is inconsistent with neutrality; and as, moreover, it may probably question the consistency of such a measure with Lord Russell's lofty promise "never to yield a jot of British law or British right in consequence of the menaces of a foreign Power"—we need not discuss that question now. But we must express our doubts whether "the duty of neutrality" is a thing so wholly onesided as Lord Russell seems to suppose. We believe that there are two parties to this war; that the duty of neutrality is not to do for one of those parties everything we should like him to do for us in like case, and against the other everything that the first probably would do against us, but to hold the balance even between them; not to relax one part of the Enlistment Act to allow the Federal agents to recruit in Ireland, and strain another clause to prevent the Confederates from buying ships in Liverpool; but to allow to each the privileges which are consistent with neutrality, and no more; full freedom of purchase and export, but no liberty to usurp the rights of sovereignty, to enlist soldiers on our shores, or fit out warlike expeditions in our ports. We believe that it is the duty of neutrality to allow the Federals to export cannon and the Confederates to export ships; both trades being equally lawful and equally "contraband of war," but not to allow the Federals to cajole Irishmen into their army, nor the Confederates to despatch an armed expedition from the Mersey. We believe, moreover, that it forms no part of the duty of neutrality to inquire minutely either what are the ultimate intentions of Irish emigrants, or what may ultimately become of ships which have been built in Liverpool for the account of a private speculator who happens to be a citizen of a neutral country. If Lord Russell's views of neutral obligations materially differ from ours, it is probably because he looks at the question only on one side. To him the disproportion of size and strength between the belligerents seems so vast—the United States so big and the Confederate States so small—that he drops the latter altogether out of consideration. The natural consequence is, that his idea of neutrality, succinctly stated, is, to do nothing disagreeable to the Federal Government: an idea which hardly harmonizes with the views generally entertained by his countrymen.

We regret to learn that he is very ill satisfied with the return he has received for the "warm and friendly neutrality" he has shown to the United States. The ingratitude of the North to England is base; but her ingratitude to Lord Russell is simply silly. He is so easily satisfied, that it is hard not to give him all he requires. He is perfectly content with Mr. Seward, who, in civil phrase, and with the appearance of being convinced now and then by the cogent logic of Downing Street, admits every principle laid down by his correspondent, accepts without reserve his interpretation of international law, and takes his own course or allows his colleagues, to take theirs, as if neither Lord Russell, nor international law, nor the displeasure of England, had anything to do with the practical business of politics. Why cannot Mr. Sumner and the Northern press be equally civil? Lord Russell does not care what they do, so long as they say nothing disagreeable. They are welcome to seize English ships, send English residents to gaol without trial, fire on English shores, confiscate English property, and stop the shipbuilding trade of England, if only they will not abuse the Foreign Secretary of England, nor wound his sensibilities by threatening to go to war with us. Nay, so unconquerable is his patience, so long-suffering his attachment to the Federal cause, that even the probability of war does not drive him to think of the necessity of taking precautions against it; and he would shrink with horror from the suggestion that, as he has tried for two years with no sort of success to conciliate the North, he would do wisely to turn to those whose goodwill has not been effectually alienated from their mother country by all the discourtesy and all the unfriendly acts of her Government, and of whose assistance he may ere long stand sorely in need. Surely so staunch a partisan deserves better treatment than the angry denunciation of Mr. Sumner and the fierce railings of the New York Herald.

The Price of Gold in the South.

A LETTER from the Confederate Secretary of the Treasury to Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, published in our last impression, gives certain important explanations concerning the amount of the Treasury notes in circulation, and suggests considerations in regard to their depreciation which seem to require from us some words of comment.

It appears that the whole debt of the Confederate States, of all kinds, is about seven hundred and seventy millions of dollars, or about a hundred and eighty millions sterling; and of this amount some ninety-five millions sterling, or less, is represented by Treasury notes in the hands of the people; the remainder consisting in moneys, chiefly of the same sort, funded or about to be funded in interest-bearing securities.

Mr. Memminger conceives that the amount of circulation which the country "can bear" is about a hundred and fifty millions of dollars, or above thirty-one millions sterling; and he admits that three times this amount is in circulation. One passage in his letter would appear to convey the idea that this ought to be taken as the measure of the actual depreciation of the currency; i.e., that an issue of three times as much money as the country "can bear" can only, independently of other causes, reduce its value to one-third of its nominal amount—i.e., depreciate it by 66⅔ per cent. But this can hardly be his real meaning. The effect of an increase in supply on the value of any commodity is not necessarily, and in practice rarely is, exactly proportioned to the additional amount thrown upon the market. Take corn, for instance; a diminution of one-third in the supply might so quicken competition as to treble the price; or it might so happen that an increase of 50 per cent. in the supply should so reduce the price that 150 quarters should fetch less than 100 formerly did. Money, though its value probably approximates more closely to that which would be given by a comparison of the amounts in circulation at different times, is still liable to fluctuate in this respect, like other commodities, to an extent far exceeding that of the addition or diminution suffered by the general stock; and Mr. Memminger can hardly have meant to say that, by trebling the quantity in circulation, it is certain that the value will be exactly divided by three.

But what he does say, and what it is necessary to bear carefully in mind, is, that there may be circumstances under which the depreciation of paper money is not fairly measured by the difference between its value and that of gold.

In one sense, we grant, this difference is an exact measure of depreciation. Where gold is the standard, paper-money represents, or professes to represent, the right to receive so much gold; and even where silver is the standard its value in regard to gold is so nearly uniform that we may take the difference between gold and paper as, for all practical purposes, equivalent to the difference between silver and paper. In either case, a note professes to represent so much metallic money; generally it is in form a promise to pay the bearer a certain sum of metallic money. And if, by reason of its non-fulfilment, or of a postponement in its fulfilment, or of a doubt whether or when it will be fulfilled, this promise is of less value than the money promised, the note is said to be depreciated; and it is depreciated to the exact amount of the difference between itself and the metal it represents; that is to say, as we have just seen, to the exact amount of the difference in value between gold and paper money.

But the word "depreciation" is never used of the currency of any country without a certain implied reproach towards its Government. In the first place, as we know, the existence of even nominal depreciation implies that the paper money is not immediately exchangeable for gold. Now it is held, and justly held, not only by political economists but by all practical men of business—we need not trouble ourselves with the various forms of insanity manifested by currency crotcheteers—that this immediate convertibility of the note is essential to commercial security, and is the best and surest guarantee of the good faith and solvency of the issuers. Therefore no Government which wishes to preserve its credit issues an inconvertible paper when it can avoid so doing; and the issue of inconvertible paper is held to indicate—as in the case of a private firm the issue of bills at an unusually long date would be held to indicate—either bad faith or embarrassment on the part of the issuers. But embarrassment is a fate which may befall almost any Government in the world. Even England has seen a suspension of cash payments; but, having ultimately paid in full, and having meantime done little wrong to any one, she is conceived to have maintained intact her financial honour—the more so that the authority which suspended the convertibility of the note had not the power of issue. Mere inconvertibility, therefore, though it implies that a Government is hard pressed, implies no more; and the Confederate Government need not be ashamed to own that, in the hour of its sorest need, it has been forced to do that which England did after but a few years of war with the French Republic.

Secondly, depreciation is a word of reproach because it involves wrongs, legal or equitable; and in order exactly to understand the value of such reproach, and its applicability in the present case, it is necessary that we should consider the paper money in two different lights: first in regard to its representative, and secondly to its monetary character.

First, then, if paper be of less value than gold, it is depreciated in regard to gold; and the result of this is always a certain amount of legal wrong. A bargained with B, in 1861, to receive in 1862 a certain sum—say 1,000 dollars; that is, as both parties meant, about 830 ounces of silver. Meantime paper takes the place of silver as legal tender; and A receives 1,000 dollars in paper, worth only 500 ounces of silver. It is clear that in this way a legal wrong is done to all creditors on money contracts; to all annuitants, mortgagees, commercial creditors, fundholders, rent-owners, and other persons entitled to receive fixed sums in money.

Secondly, if the purchasing power of paper be less than the purchasing power of gold used to be it is clear that there has been a depreciation of paper in regard to commodities in general; and by this a substantial wrong is done to all persons falling under any of the classes just specified. As, if A be a recipient of 1,000 dollars yearly, which in 1860 would buy him 300 quarters of corn, or 4,000 yards of cloth, or 2,000 pounds of coffee, or 10,000 pounds of meat, and if his 1,000 dollars in paper will now only purchase half of any of those quantities of goods, it is clear that A has sustained a very serious practical injury by the low value of money now as compared with its value in 1860. Fortunately this class of persons is rare in the Confederate States, and therefore comparatively little mischief has been done by the fall which has undoubtedly taken place in the purchasing power of money.

It is clear that the first kind of depreciation, that which inflicts legal wrong, is measured exactly by the difference in value at the present moment between paper and gold. It is clear, that the second kind of depreciation is measurable by the difference between the value of paper now and of gold before its supersession by paper. It is clear, too, that it is this last sort of depreciation only which entails serious practical evil and injustice. And this may or may not be equal in amount to the first, which may be called the nominal or visible depreciation. Whether it will be equal, or greater, or less, and what the relation between them may be, will depend on the changes that may have taken place in the value of gold since it ceased to be effectively the basis and standard of the currency.

Suppose that a people, inhabiting a land in which iron is not indigenous, used an iron currency. Suppose that in process of time this currency became too cumbrous, and that notes were issued representing, and convertible on demand for, hundred-weights of wrought iron. A war breaks out, a strict blockade is instituted, no more iron can be had; a Government, wanting all that there is for artillery, suspends the payments of its notes during the war. It is supposed that no increased issue takes place; and we know that, as the notes were formerly convertible, there was no excess before the war. What phenomena shall we see? Undoubtedly a vast discrepancy between the values of iron and paper—a vast depreciation of our first kind; but no diminution in the general purchasing power of paper; that is, no depreciation of the second kind. So long as this continues no harm has been done. Legal wrong is compensated by substantial equity. Here is a depreciation reflecting no discredit on the issuers; a depreciation arising simply from a sudden and enormous rise in the value of the represented metal, caused by a sudden and enormous increase of demand, coupled with a suspension by war of the ordinary relations between demand and supply. But the war goes on, the Government wants money, and it is forced to over-issue. Another depreciation takes place, inflicting real and substantial wrong, no doubt, but such wrong as is inseparable from many measures that are habitually adopted by a belligerent fighting on the defensive. What is the measure of this depreciation—the depreciation for which the Government is really responsible, which alone is operative and real? Not, as we have seen, the mere amount of over-issue. Certainly not the difference between the present values of iron and paper: for that difference was great before yet the real depreciation had begun. Clearly, then, the difference between the present value of paper and the original value of iron; or, if that be not ascertainable, the difference between the present and past purchasing power of the currency.

This is the distinction of which Mr. Memminger claims the benefit for the Confederate States: that is to say, he argues that gold has risen, as well as paper fallen in value. Gold in the Confederate States is in the position of iron in the case supposed. By the suspension of specie payments on the one hand it has ceased to be anything more than a commodity purchasable in the market; by the action of the blockade on the other hand it has lost its quality of a commodity of determined and invariable value, arising from the universal and equable demand for it in all countries. Under these circumstances it has become liable to unlimited enhancement in local value; and a great enhancement has taken place for the following reason. The exportable commodities of the Confederate States are generally bulky; it is difficult to carry them away through the blockade; also, though there has been an enhancement in the value of gold, there has been a much greater enhancement in the value of other foreign commodities. Therefore, it does not pay to any body to import gold into the South in order to purchase cotton and other goods difficult of export; while it does pay admirably to import arms, clothing, medicines, luxuries. Hence the supply of gold is cut off. At the same time, when a blockade-runner wishes to realise his profits, he does not like to buy cotton, or tobacco, or other bulky commodities; indeed, he could not in this way obtain a return cargo nearly equal in value to that which he has sold. He therefore buys gold, as containing enormous value in little bulk, and his profits are so great that he can afford to pay a high premium. Hence a great demand for gold, coinciding with the absence of all supplies from without to produce a great enhancement of value. Gold, therefore, has risen in value while paper has fallen; and the difference between them no longer truly measures the real depreciation of the latter. If, as Mr. Memmingers's letter seems to imply, paper will purchase one-sixth only of the amount of gold it professedly represents, there is a nominal depreciation of above 83 per cent.; but if, as he also implies, gold will purchase twice as much as before of all commodities, or of all not affected by the blockade, then the purchasing power of paper is one-third, and not one-sixth, of what it was, and the real depreciation is 66½ per cent. This is about double the lowest depreciation reached by the Northern currency; a difference which, considering the vastly superior wealth of the North, and the far greater room for an expansion of currency there, leaves the Confederacy no cause of shame.

Of course this depreciation will be reduced to nothing whenever the convertibility of the note is restored; and the expense of doing that—the cost of paying off the superfluous currency—added to the debt actually funded, represents the amount to which the Confederate Government has drawn upon future generations for the purchase of national independence, for which the present generation has freely given its blood. We do not think that posterity will complain of the burden. The bitterest grumblers against the national debt are silenced by the answer that it is the price which, in fulfilment of our ancestors' contracts, we pay for not being a province of France; and the people of the South are never likely to grudge the cost incurred to save them from becoming the bondsmen and dependants of the Yankees.

POSTAL COMMUNICATION WITH THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

SIR,—The closing of the Confederate Legation in London makes it very desirable that persons in the Confederate States wishing to communicate with friends in Europe about whose address they are uncertain, should have some place to which to direct their letters. I would therefore suggest to you that you will receive all letters from the Confederacy directed to your care, and where you cannot find the owners for them advertise them periodically. I will be responsible for your outlays of postage, as well as the charge for advertising.

In return, any letters for the Confederacy, directed to you, I will undertake to forward, of course without guaranteeing their arrival, but only my best care for their safety and despatch. In this case I shall require a shilling postage-stamp, or its equivalent in foreign postage-stamps, to be enclosed, per single letter of half-ounce, to pay the British postage to the most convenient colonial port to which I may find it expedient to send such letters. The remaining postage to any place within the Confederacy must be paid there on receipt, as there is no arrangement by which it can be prepaid here.

Yours, &c.,

HENRY HOTZE,

17, SAVILE ROW, W., C. S. Commercial Agent.
LONDON, September 30.

[We need hardly add that we shall be happy to carry out Mr. Hotze's suggestion.—ED. INDEX.]

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

NEW YORK, September 15.

THERE has been quite an excitement in town since yesterday, created by the accounts from New Orleans of the actual departure of a large expedition from that port, bound for the mouth of the Rio Grande. Seventeen regiments are said to have been already sent forward, and more are to follow. Imagination has already connected the movement with a design to meet the French intervention in Mexico at once, by the counter assertion of the Monroe Doctrine, supported by a competent force. There is wild talk of the speedy occupation of Matamoros by an American army in concert with Juarez, as the constitutional chief of Mexico, and a determination to defeat the Napoleonic project of an Empire, and to establish and maintain a Republic there, as the only form of government to be tolerated on this continent by the Master Republic of the North. Gold went up—or, more properly speaking, the value of the Government currency fell—several per cent. in the anticipation of immediate difficulties with France and the prospect of an indefinite prolongation of the war on the Southern States by a French recognition of their independence, to be supported by an alliance, offensive and defensive.

It is possible that these consequences may follow this military advance upon the Rio Grande frontier, and also possible that the French Emperor, from motives of his own, may not be indisposed to accept such an issue. But there is nothing in the state of the question or in the course of the Administration towards it, as developed to the public, to justify the opinion that they seek a conflict with France at this time on the vague abstraction called the Monroe Doctrine, or any question arising out of affairs in Mexico, or that it will not carefully abstain from any course of action which would bring on war with France.

Indeed, although it is now forty years since Mr. Monroe enunciated in his annual message to Congress what is popularly talked of as the Monroe Doctrine, the Government has never officially defined what was then meant by it, or is understood as the fixed public policy of the country in respect to it; and public men of the highest authority have disagreed widely as to the extent and objects of the declaration. Mr. Calhoun, who was Secretary of War in Mr. Monroe's cabinet at the time, took great pains to explain in the Senate of the United States, during the debates on the Oregon difficulty with England, his understanding that it was not meant to declare a permanent purpose to resist European interposition in the affairs of American States, or to resist European forms of Government, except to prevent the subversion of American republics by absolute external force, where such interposition might be treated as immediately affecting the stability of our own system. The declaration against colonization denied only the right of seizing on any part of the Continent simply as unoccupied. Mr. Monroe himself did not apply his own declarations to the case of a monarchical government in Mexico, for the Empire of Iturbide was established there during his term, without the expression of any dissent by him. The language of his message was exceedingly guarded, so as to present no distinct assertion of purpose which would bring on discussions with foreign Powers; and it has been repeatedly shown, by diplomatic revelations since made, that he had a special purpose, which he had concerted with the English ministry, of which Mr. Canning was the chief, to deter Spain and her European allies from prosecuting a joint plan then under discussion among them, for recovering by force of arms the revolted provinces of South America, which had been for a long time practically independent. The popular interpretation of it, as a perpetual national pledge to drive out European influences and exclude monarchical forms from America, has figured extensively in party journalism and congressional declamation, and been hinted at in diplomatic communications vaguely, and in conferences which were especially and strictly defined to be altogether unofficial; but it has not, in my belief, ever been placed in a formal and authentic form before any foreign Government, so as to demand an acknowledgement or require their assent. There is an apparent exception to this in the circular which was sent in December, 1860, to the diplomatic body in the City of Mexico, on the occasion of the apprehended interference by the Governments of Great Britain, France, and Spain, for mediation between the two internal parties who then disputed for the Government of Mexico. It was in the form of a letter from "the Legation of the United States in Mexico to the representatives of the European Powers," by Mr. Henry La Reintree, as special agent acting under the instructions of Mr. Robert McLane, then United States Minister to Mexico. After treating on the state of parties in Mexico, and the several projects for foreign intervention, the circular goes on to say:—

I am therefore instructed to inform you that all these matters have been fully and duly considered by the Government of the United States, and that the policy heretofore adopted by the Liberals in their intercourse with European Powers in relation to these negotiations for peace, has been approved and adopted by it, and that it has determined to resist any forcible attempt to impose a particular adjustment of the existing conflict against the will and sanction of the people of Mexico, and also any forcible intervention by any Power which looks to the control of the political destiny thereof.

This determination on the part of the Government of the United States has already been explicitly though respectfully declared to all the Powers of Europe.

The Government of the United States does not deny to the European Powers the right to wage honourable warfare, for a sufficient cause, anywhere or against any nation; nor does it deny their right to demand redress for injuries inflicted on their respective subjects, and, if need be, to enforce such demand; but it does deny them the right to interfere, directly or indirectly, with the political independence of the Republic of Mexico, and it will, to the extent of its power, defend the nationality and independence of said Republic.

This settled policy of the Government of the United States I believe is well understood by all the representatives of European Powers in Mexico. It is also fully understood and appreciated by the constitutional Government at Vera Cruz; and, under my instructions, it becomes my duty to cause it to be well understood by all those who, from their public character and the circumstances that characterise the political condition of the Republic, are charged with the responsibilities of political authority, in order that said policy may neither be misunderstood nor misrepresented, to the prejudice of either Mexico or of the United States.

I am further instructed to state in the most explicit manner, that the Government of the United States earnestly desires the pacification of Mexico, and that it will recognise and support any Government that is adopted and accepted by the free choice of the people thereof, and that it will always encourage the friendly efforts of any foreign Power that have for object such a result, notwithstanding its resolution to abstain from all direct participation in any such mediation, and its adherence to the relations already established between it and the constitutional Government of the Republic.

The phrases here are carefully worded, so as to exclude any idea of the right to interfere, or the intention to interfere, except to secure to the Mexicans, against foreign force, the right to choose between their own parties, and the right to select their own form of government. There is not a word to sustain the interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine of excluding monarchical forms from States which might select them for themselves.

This was under the Administration of Mr. Buchanan. Mr. Lincoln was already chosen; and his Cabinet, with Mr. Seward as Secretary of State, came into power in March, 1861. Mr. Corwin was sent immediately to Mexico, and on arriving there he found this among his official papers. He forwarded a copy at once to the Department of State, with the following request for the instructions of the Government upon it anew. It is found in his despatch dated July 29, 1861.

I beg to call your attention to a paper addressed by Mr. La Reintree, acting as special agent of this Legation, under instructions from Mr. McLane, to all the foreign ministers at this place, under date of December 20th last. It must or should be in the State Department, as well as the instructions of Mr. McLane, on which it is based. I wish to know if the Government concurs fully in the views and principles therein set forth.

Mr. Seward did not fail to respond to this immediately in the following terms, under date of August 24. It will be seen that the American secretary took exceptions to some parts of this despatch, and decided that the time was altogether inopportune for the Government of the United States to renew its action in favour of those parts of the declaration to which he yet gave general and vague approval.

To answer this question broadly in the affirmative would be to commit it (the United States Government) to the opinions expressed by the writer of that paper concerning the merits of domestic political parties in Mexico, in transactions which, since that paper was written, have been fully completed and ended.

Again, I am very sure that this Government cherishes the actual independence of Mexico as a cardinal object, to the exclusion of all foreign political intervention, and is willing to take decided measures favouring that independence, as is seen in another despatch to you of this date; yet the present moment does not seem to me an opportune one for formal reassurance of the policy of the Government to foreign nations. Prudence requires that in order to surmount the evils of faction at home we should not unnecessarily provoke debates with foreign countries, but rather seek to repair, as speedily as possible, the prestige which those evils have impaired.

Perhaps it will be sufficient for me to say that it is our wish and our purpose, so far as our action can bear upon the question, that the people of Mexico shall, in every case, be exclusive arbiters of their own political fortunes, and remain free and independent of all foreign intervention and control whatever. I hardly know how it can be necessary for the Government of the United States to say this, in view of the policy and principles set forth in the instructions under which your mission to Mexico began.

The purport of this letter was, that Mr. Corwin should abstain from agitating these questions at all during the continuance of the Southern war in this country. This is more noticeable, because at that very time Mr. Corwin was instructing the Administration on the coming intervention by France, Spain, and Great Britain, and the urgency of immediate interposition by the United States to save Mexico from the consequences. The despatch to Mr. Corwin, referred to by Mr. Seward as of even date with this letter, is not published with the other papers. There is a hiatus in Mr. Seward's letters from No. 16 to No. 21. What the suppressed papers contain is only to be guessed at; but it is inferable that they refer to the only form of relief to Mexico which occurred to Mr. Corwin and Mr. Seward—that of lending her the means to satisfy her foreign creditors, and thus take away the plea for interposition. We know that this failed in both quarters it was proposed. The three Powers declined it as insufficient; and secondly, the Senate of the United States refused to give its assent to the attempt. The intervention came, and has ended in the Empire. Mr. Seward and Mr. Lincoln did nothing and are pledged to nothing.

I infer, therefore, that Mr. Seward at least does not intend, by the movement on the Rio Grande, to open war with France if he can help it; and I doubt whether the Administration has primarily any design except to seize Western Texas, stop the current of supplies into the Confederacy by the way of Matamoros, and help on its own political schemes at home by subjecting Texas to the military process, by which representatives and senators in Congress are manufactured to support the Administration party against the threatened change of popular sentiment in the loyal States. Texas, under the Resolutions of Annexation, may be divided into four States, and the opportunity will be seized to make this division by some coup d'état, and bring in eight Republican senators, and the corresponding representatives, in the other House at once.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER, September 30.

LEST another and a better opportunity should not soon occur, it seems right now to point the moral of a speech recently delivered by Mr. W. E. Forster at Leeds, and just reprinted and circulated for our special behoof at Manchester. The better to do this, it is not at all superfluous to observe that Mr. Forster, as a member of Parliament, is looked up to by his friends in the north of England with an amount of respect which, perhaps, has more than a provincial value. In spite of his strong American tendencies, he is believed to have some genuine love left for the institutions of his own country. With all his intellectually cultivated radicalism of the Daily News and Manchester Examiner complexion, we still credit him with rather more political fairness than purely party men, committed to advanced doctrines, are supposed to be capable of. In short, though he is "views" as to republic, we remind ourselves he is at least a Briton; while, in that honourable character, his patriotism has not yet been blown upon like "John Bright's." This much being kept in sight, it is a significant fact that the Union and Extermination Society have resorted to the expedient of enlisting a man like Mr. Forster actively in their service just now. Evidently John Bright was too "howling a monster" to be safely entrusted to tell their present ticklish story. Besides, was not Mr. Bright engaged in soliciting Scottish trout-streams? And did not his gentle craftsmanship furnish materials for Court circular paragraphs in English republican journals? Who, then, during the distinguished angler's pensive retirement—who so happy as a chief speaker as the hon. member for Bradford? Or who, on personal rather than vicarious merits, could be so advantageously put forth as the eloquent Federal Mercury to the temporarily sequestered Federal Dove?

Of course we in Manchester have no right of quarrel with Mr. Forster for holding a brief from the professional Unionists of this city. But we have every right to exclaim against him for lending his voice and credit in circulating to our prejudice what we will temperately call the orientalisms promulgated by that body. The notorious "public shindy" in our Free Trade Hall—the true character of which I was at the pains to place beyond doubt in previous letters—is once more flourished in our faces, and by Mr. Forster too, as a unanimous expression of Federal feeling in Manchester. Applying himself to that rough-and-tumble demonstration, Mr. Forster is reported to have argued thus:—

For every nobleman, for every man who has a title before his name, who has taken the side of the South, there have been ten, twenty, and even a hundred hard-working men who have taken the side of the North and freedom. (Cheers.) And they have done so with every temptation and every inducement brought to bear upon them to take the other side. They have been told by ingenious men—I will not say sent for the purpose—that their sufferings—and many of them have been suffering deeply—have been caused by this war, and that the war has been caused by the action of the Federals; and yet such has been their instinctive feeling—they know what liberty is, and ill will it be for England when the working-men forget what liberty is—such was their instinctive feeling that they have refused to be misled, and I do say it will be ungenerous of America to remember anything against England when we can point to that large meeting of the half-starving working men of Manchester in the Free-trade Hall—(cheers)—when they took the lead in saying, "No matter what the sufferings we may endure, no matter what the sacrifices we may have to undergo, we will not allow our Government to depart from the strict principle of neutrality on behalf of the slave-holding Confederacy."

Yankee generosity (for by "America" Mr. Forster obviously means Yankeeedom) may be one of the handsome virtues, if, like Mr. Forster, we could only understand the terms. But, however doubtful that may be, there is one thing very certain, that, if "America" has nothing better to be generous to us for than the great Free Trade Hall meeting about which we hear so much, then indeed we must look to it, or it will infallibly go hard with us. But perhaps, after all, the hon. gentleman was only indulging in a little irony when he pointed to that physical-force row as an argument why Mr. Seward, in his moments of gratitude, should refuse to "remember anything against England." If, on the other hand, Mr. Forster was not joking, then let him be assured that the Union and Emancipation Society have made him the victim of the funniest hoax. To say that no such meeting took place as that described would be to say something very tame and vapid upon a lively theme. Unanimity was strenuously struggled for, but certainly not achieved. On the contrary, it was almost a police matter to separate large numbers of Northerners and Southerners engaged in actual and violent conflict. The uproar that prevailed throughout the hated proceedings was quite unequalled in these latter days of our city, except perhaps on a certain Sunday, a few weeks afterwards, when, in the same world-famous building, Mr. Moncreux Conway had to pause for ten minutes in his proselytising sermon to allow some several sets of political Horatii and Curiatii practically "to have it out" on the floor, the fine Free Trade Hall organ (in the words of the Guardian next morning) accompanying the mêlée it could not drown in a "vigorous tune."

Mr. Forster's friends are loth to believe that he could have made such a speech against his own better knowledge. The Union and Emancipation Society most certainly got at him. Everything he said betrayed its source of inspiration, and nothing more so than the mode in which he deprecated America's wrath by laying the Manchester "demonstration" as a sham peace-offering or a worthless bribe on the altar of his idolatry. But over and above Mr. Forster's constitutionally violent propensity to humble himself before the free and united Republic, there was an especial motive for the hon. gentleman's worship on the occasion in question. The nephew of the famous Dr. Channing was then and there on the same platform. To suppose that this bodily presence had some effect in warming the political devotions of the member for Bradford, is not to make too much allowance for the infirmities of human nature. Moreover, we have the hon. gentleman's own word for it, that the face-to-face contemplation of the rev. gentleman from Washington had all the impressiveness of novelty as well as of fact. "I have now," said Mr. Forster, "what I scarcely ever had before, the opportunity of speaking to an American [clergyman], and Mr. Channing must allow me to say a word or two to him, and, through him, to some of his fellow-countrymen." And Mr. Forster did say a few more words accordingly; but inasmuch as his sayings did not misrepresent Lancashire more than any other English county, we have no particular concern with them, only to remark that they bear a singular family likeness to the calumny he was instrumental in propagating to the discredit of Manchester. Perhaps, therefore, I may fitly dissent the subject with an extract from his l'été-à-l'été with Mr. Channing, in the course of which, by the way, the fate of the famous Rochuck motion was amusingly made to do duty in quite a foreign service.

I don't mean to tell Mr. Channing that there are not men in England who have taken the side of the South; but all we ought to be judged by is the action of the country. Mr. Channing and his friends must recollect that although there may have been expressions—talk in favour of the South—there has been no action. There has been talk in the House of Commons in its favour. I have felt when, in advocating a neutral policy, I stated what I considered to be the just claims of the North, that I had not got the feeling of the House on my side; but, on the other hand, if anyone tried to get the House of Commons to press upon the Government to depart from the principles of neutrality and adopted the side of the South, the common sense of the House was proved to be against him. (Hear, hear.) I say, therefore, to the Americans, as wise men you must pay little attention to mere talk or mere writing; you must go by actions; and judged by them we, as a nation, have done nothing against you.

Earl Russell has sent a reply to the memorial recently submitted to his lordship by the executive of the Southern Association here, urging him to instruct her Majesty's Minister at Washington to present to the Federal Cabinet a remonstrance upon the unrelenting and exterminating character of the war they are waging against the Confederate States. The tone of his lordship's reply at least speaks well for the status of the Manchester Southern Club; nor indeed, all things considered, would it have been possible for the Foreign Minister to have turned a deaf ear to representations so modestly yet tellingly set forth as in the memorial emanating from that influential body. At the same time, however, his lordship, though acceding to their request, holds out but faint hopes that any such representations will be attended with appreciable effect. But, whether the remonstrance fail or succeed, the delegates from the Southern Societies throughout the distressed districts have done but their duty in requesting Earl Russell's good offices in the affair; and it is matter for congratulation to find that their efforts have been met by his lordship with something of the generous sympathy which prompted them in the first instance.

Earl Russell's recent review of his own foreign policy is the chief topic of the day. It is remarked that the tone of that portion of his speech which relates to the Confederacy is not quite so comfortable as we had well-nigh grown accustomed to expect from him. After all, the Star may be right when it came out yesterday with the pacifying reassurance (to the Yankees) that "Earl Russell really has principles." But, lest it should be thought that the Foreign Minister is quite right in his division of public feeling in regard to Federals and Confederates, I cannot do better than let the Guardian speak, at least for Lancashire, upon that very important subject:—

It is not easy to conceal traces of the offence which such truculent and dishonest speeches as that recently delivered by Mr. Sumner must give to statesmen of honourable and delicate character, on whose notice such productions are thrust by the prominent position of their authors. The asperity with which Lord Russell refutes the misrepresentation to which he has been personally exposed may be readily excused, but we fear he will have to bear more of it from the same source, unless its power of annoying him be more carefully concealed. As a nation, it has been our lot throughout the whole struggle to be occasionally found fault with by both sides, but by far the more persistently and virulently, of course, by that party which has most abused our generosity and profited by our indulgence. We can only pursue our course, as the Foreign Secretary shows that we have done with impartiality and justice. It is not a theory usually sanctioned by our practice that rebellion is a crime depriving those who are guilty of it of the rights pertaining by law and usage to compact and self-sustaining communities of free men. Having never given countenance to that doctrine in our history, or in our dealings with the subjects of established monarchies, we cannot choose as the most fitting occasion for changing our policy, a case in which the so-called rebels are sovereign States, and the power with which they are contending is a Federal republic, itself the offspring of a comparatively recent revolution. To go even a step out of our way in order to facilitate the ruthless suppression of such a "rebellion" as this would be a course that could not be palliated or excused by any amount of antipathy to slavery; and, if Lord Russell had been rightly supposed to convey that the opinion of a majority of Englishmen could ever wait upon such a course with favour, we should take the liberty of thinking that he was entirely mistaken.

EVENING.

The astonishing announcement has just been made public that we are threatened with another disgraceful riot in the Free Trade Hall. The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher is to venture, it seems, upon the perilous enterprise, some evening next week, of attempting to lecture Manchester men into Unionism. It may be imagined with what glee the "unsettled humours" of the city are hailing the prospect of another tussle to prove to Mr. Seward, how much they are of one mind. It is possible, however, that the mayor, profiting by past experience, will very properly spare us so severe a test of our unanimity by forbidding the meeting. Failing this, his worship will probably have the satisfaction, after it is all over, of learning that a good many of his fellow-citizens were of Hotspur's thinking as to the free currency of "crack'd crowns," and that, too, on an occasion which, in the interests of the public peace and of good repute, the chief magistrate might have discreetly prevented.

THE Yankees have escaped destruction at Gettysburg, and they have taken Vicksburg, and this they call crushing the Southern Confederacy. What would they have said if they had gained as many triumphs as the Army of the Potomac? Do they imagine that we have less constancy, courage, and endurance than themselves? If they can persevere in a bad cause after a score of defeats, do they suppose that we shall give up home, country, and independence after one or two reverses? If the men of the Revolution could fight on through seven years, with all their cities and a great part of the country in the possession of the British, the Tories, and the Indians, are we going to give up because some of our seaboard towns fall into the hands of the enemy?—Richmond Dispatch.

BELLIGERENT RIGHTS ON THE SEAS.

(From the Boston Courier.)

Notwithstanding the discouragement which would assail us at the outset, in any attempt to read through Mr. Sumner's voluminous speech, there may be a point or two, as we glance at it, worthy of some attention. For example, the celebrated Captain Kidd's case, cited by Mr. Sumner in his late speech, involved no question of the law of nations, as applicable to our relations with Great Britain. Had not the legal studies of his youth been obscured in his recent career as a rascal, the doctrine of "necessity," which knows no law, Mr. Sumner would have seen that his citation proves nothing. Captain Kidd sailed under a commission from the King of England, in command of an English cruiser, and after some years was arrested and charged by the king's prosecutor with piracy on the high seas, and with the murder of one of his crew. Kidd pleaded his commission in defence to the charge of piracy, and it was replied to him that the commission directed him to have the vessels and goods which he captured condemned, and that as he had not followed it, it could not protect him.

This principle, that an agent must follow the authority under which he derives his appointment, is as universally recognized now as then. If the acts of the Alabama were disowned by the Confederate authorities, then, as in Kidd's case, the commission of the captain would not protect him against the charge of piracy; but we cannot see what bearing this case has on the proposition it is cited in the speech to sustain.

Mr. Sumner again becomes very obscure from confounding public armed vessels and privateers, and talking about home ports. A public armed ship, or man-of-war, has no commission whatever. Her character is determined by the commissions of the officers of the Government whose flag she bears. The real question is the legitimacy of the commissions of her officers. As to the home port, what authority or usage is there, under the law of nations, which requires a man-of-war to be fitted in or to sail from a home port? We have never seen any. The Bonhomme Richard, in command of John Paul Jones, which captured the Serapis in the American Revolution, never was in a home port of the flag she wore. The Essex, Jr., so efficient under Commodore Porter, in the war of 1812 against the British, never was in a home port of the flag she wore.

It is the commission and orders of the commander, and not the place of building, nor the mode of acquisition of a man-of-war, which determines her legal character. The law of nations does not require that captures on the high seas should be brought in specie into a home port, for condemnation. Prize proceedings in the practice of England and of the United States frequently occur, where the property is not in custody of the Prize Court. Indeed, we would ask whether any prize proceedings are necessary, except in cases where it is desired to transfer the title of property captured?

If hostile expeditions are fraudulently fitted out in a neutral port, there is just ground for reclamation; but as this is not a proceeding against individuals, but between nations, the material point is, what constitutes a hostile expedition? and what proof exists of one? Mr. Sumner does not meet Lord Palmerston's argument at all. He does not claim that selling contraband of war to a belligerent is a violation of neutrality. Our Government have been as open purchasers of contraband as the Confederates, in English markets. Where then is the line between the legal (?) right to sell contraband of war to a belligerent, and the illegal fitting out of a hostile expedition in a neutral port?

This is the only vital point for public discussion, where the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations might enlighten the public and confound the subtle orators of the English Cabinet. Mr. Sumner is not up on the point, and, evading the issue where the picked men of England stand to guard the gap, he runs off in trashy sentimentalities and wordy vituperations. Mr. Sumner, will necessarily have to lead his committee for the next two years on this subject. The honour of our country for diplomatic ability, and possibly our peace abroad are to a great degree in his hands. His budget of facts and metaphors is before the public. But he is short of ammunition. Could he cut the umbilical cord that binds him to the negro, and devote the few weeks between now and the meeting of Congress to the pruning of his speech, and give it the addition of some solid and clearly stated responses to the English positions, he might thus contrive to serve his country better than he has ever heretofore done.

DEPARTURE OF MR. MASON.—Mr. Mason, the envoy from the Southern States of America, left London last evening by the mail train for Paris. Mr. Macfarlane remains for a few days to wind up some unimportant matters of a financial nature. Previous to the departure of Mr. Mason, several members of the personnel quitted London for the French capital.—The Morning Post.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, September 30.

The press upon the Bank and the brokers in Lombard-street for money throughout the week, shows that there is no immediate expectation of a reduction in the official rate. Three causes have promoted the scarcity.—First, the revenue payments for the quarter just terminating; second, the withdrawal of large sums by the India Council, preparatory to the settlement of the claims of dissentients who would not accept the late conversion; and, third, the amount of capital temporarily required to arrange the differences, completed this evening, through the late account in foreign stocks. It is quite evident that the money market will remain in a disturbed condition until about the 8th October, when we shall see what will be the influence of the circulation of the dividends, and the release of the funds to be paid by Sir Charles Wood. Many seem to think that it will be questionable after all if we shall experience any great extent of ease, such as was predicted would probably be the case three weeks or a month ago; and if an influx of capital should be witnessed it is believed that increasing trade, notwithstanding the consequences of the American difficulty, will absorb it. Nothing can be stronger evidence of the improvement in this respect than the Board of Trade returns, published yesterday; and the results speak eloquently in favour of the steady recovery from prostration which existed at the end of last year. To-day such was the call for accommodation, both at the Bank and in the discount market, that the rate was quite up to 4 per cent. for first-class paper; second class was charged  $4\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; and the joint stock banks, for their advances, obtained  $3\frac{1}{2}$  to 4 per cent. The jobbers at the Stock Exchange secured fabulous quotations for any surplus capital they possessed, terms in many instances, being a matter of arrangement.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The amount of gold sent into the Bank this week has been larger than for some time past; including £68,000 sent in this afternoon, it reaches £330,000. On the other hand there has been withdrawn £106,000, for transmission to the East. The arrivals of specie have also been large, viz., £799,437, in addition to which £22,051 is announced as having arrived at Lisbon en route to this country from the Brazils. Of the above arrivals the greater portion—about £700,000—is from the West Indies, and about £90,000 from New York. The steamer which sailed for the East on Monday took out £567,600. Bar silver has been in good demand at 5s. 1½d. per oz., but since the sailing of the steamer the inquiry has not been so urgent. Mexican dollars are quiet, though there has been a small sale to-day at 5s. 3½d., but the general quotation is 5s. 3½d. The only gold ships at present known to be on their way from Australia are the Wave of Life, with £162,000; and the Wellesley, with £131,000.

THE JOINT-STOCK DISCOUNT COMPANY.

The Joint-Stock Discount Company (Limited) have just announced that, in consequence of largely increasing business the capital is to be augmented by the issue of 40,000 additional shares of £25 each at £1 per share premium, to be distributed pro rata to the proprietors, subject to the payment of £2 per share on or before the 13th October, £2 on or before the 19th November, and £2 on or before the 23rd December. It is thought that the £40,000 thus obtained in premiums will be carried forthwith to the reserve fund.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The news received at the end of last week from the States had a good effect on this Stock; from 31 to 29 dis. an advance was obtained to 28 to 26 dis. There was since a partial relapse, but to-day (Wednesday) there is again a strong market, the quotation this afternoon being 27½ to 26½ dis., and large orders in the market.

THE COLUMBIAN LOAN.

It is officially announced with regard to the Columbian Loan, that Earl Russell has sanctioned the appointment of Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Bogota (if agreeable to all parties) to act as agent for the receipt and transmission of the revenues to be held at the disposal of the bondholders. This announcement has given general satisfaction to the subscribers, and at the same time shows the good feeling existing between Her Majesty's Government and the United States of Columbia.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The market for English Stocks has been particularly quiet throughout the week, nothing having occurred either of a political or commercial character to cause the slightest excitement or speculative movement; in fact the dealers at present appear to be directing their attention entirely to foreign undertakings. Consols closed this evening at 93½ to 94 for money, and 93½ to 94 for the account, which is precisely the same as on this day week. Exchequer Bills are steady at par to 3s. prem. A very large and speculative business has again been transacted in some of the leading foreign securities, but without anything particular having occurred to give a stimulus to prices, though for all descriptions quotations are firmly sustained. Greek Stock has been moderately dealt in, but the variation in prices has been but trifling. Mexican and Spanish have been more extensively sought after, but the highest quotations of the week were not maintained at the close. Turkish leave off slightly better. The closing quotations were, Greek Stock, 37½ to 38; Mexican, 46½ to 46½; Spanish Passives, 36½ to 36½; do. Certificates, 14½ to 14½; Turkish Six per Cents (1854), 95½ to 95½; and, do. (1862), 70½ to 71.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

There has been rather less business than usual doing in American Government and Railway Securities, but prices on the whole show an improvement. The dealings have been confined to United States Five per Cents., at 69 and 68. Virginia State Six per Cents., 41½ and 40½. Atlantic and Great Western (New York Section) 78 and 77½. Do. do. (Pennsylvania Section), 77, 77½, 79, 78, 79, and 81. Erie shares, $100, all paid, 74, 73½ and 74½. Do. Seven per Cents., Preference, 70. Do. Fourth Mortgage, 71. Illinois Central Seven per Cents., 77½, 77, and 77½. Do. $100 shares, $90 paid, 14, 13½ and 13½ dis. Do. do. all paid, 76, 77½. New York Central, $100 Shares, 88, 89, and 88½, and 89. Panama Railway, Second Mortgage, 102, and 102½.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

A rather extensive business has been transacted in English Railway Securities, at, in many instances, an advance in prices, particularly as regards the leading descriptions. The majority of the purchases have been for investments, there being but little doing at present of a speculative character. The most important variation has been a rise of about 3 per cent. in Metropolitan, which is attributed to the completion of the junction with the Great Northern, London and North-Western, Sheffield, Great Northern and South-Eastern, are 1 per cent. better; Midland ½ per cent.; Great Eastern, Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, and North British ½ per cent., and North Eastern (Berwick), ditto York, about ½ per cent. In Foreign Railway Shares about an average business has been transacted, at very steady prices, the tendency being good. For the shares in British possessions there has been rather less demand than usual; the transactions have been below the average; but nevertheless, quotations are well sustained.

THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY OF CANADA.

The following circular, signed by the Secretary of the Great Western Railway Company of Canada, has been issued this afternoon:—"I am desired to inform you that from the accounts of the half-year, ended July 31, 1863, the net earnings of the line (including the balance brought from last half-year) amounted to £7,954 15s. 3d., which the directors recommend should be carried to the credit of the current half-year.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the half-yearly meeting of the Panonia Leather Cloth Company, a satisfactory statement was presented, showing that, including the purchase of the 70 years' lease of the premises at Clapham, the Company was fairly started at an outlay not exceeding £8,500. Of the first issue of shares 2,000 have been taken up, and on those a call of £1 per share will be made in October. With the present appliances the Company is able to turn out and finish from 10,000 to 12,000 yards of leather cloth weekly. It was stated that the material meets with general approval in the various branches of trade to which it is applicable, viz.: as an artificial leather for boots and shoes, for leggings, travelling bags, and waterproof purposes generally. The Chairman having congratulated the shareholders on the favourable prospects before them, the report was unanimously accepted.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In these departments business progresses slowly, but, as a general rule, steadily. Purchases are for the most part confined to the requirements of the moment; and the aspect of the markets is therefore dull, but sufficient is passing even in this way to prevent any undue accumulation of stocks; and as holders do not force sales, prices are free from any depression worth naming. A pause has at last taken place in the advance in cotton, but there are no indications of a reaction. The grain trade is still heavy, but no further reduction has occurred in prices. Lined cake has been in better demand, and New York barrels have made £10 ex ship; best bags are scarce at £9 10s. to £9 12s. 6d.; and Westerns have sold at £9 2s. 6d. to £9 5s. per ton. Cured provisions continue in only limited demand. American bacon is, however, firmly held, owing to some extensive operations in Liverpool. Boneless and short middles are also taken to a fair extent from our market at full late rates. Choice qualities of India and prime mess beef are scarce. American butters have found their way to this market via Liverpool, and fine have realised 94s. per cwt. Fine American lard sells steadily at 40s. to 40s. 3d. per cwt. Petroleum, after remaining dull for some days, has receded 20s. per ton for crude, and 1d. to 2d. per gallon for refined, the closing price for the latter being 2s. 5d. per gallon on the spot. The reduction has led to only a trifling extension of business. French spirits of turpentine have further given way 5s. per cwt., bringing the present quotation to 73s. per cwt. In the nominal rates for American there is no change. Spermin oil continues to find a moderate sale at £80 for American fishing. The tallow market, whilst still unsettled, has not fluctuated so widely this week; and as speculative operations have been chiefly for a rise, quotations have for the time moved in that direction. From Russia there has not been any news, political or commercial, to exercise any important influence. Business in all growths of American tobacco is upon a very moderate scale, holders showing no inclination to relax their terms. For substitutes of required qualities the demand is very active. In drugs and chemicals the variations have been slight. Aloes maintained the late advance. Bichromate and hydriodate of potash quoted easier. American oil peppermint, hotchkiss brand is also rather lower. In dyes, Bengal turmeric has given way 3s. to 4s. per cwt., from some forced sales of speculators' parcels. Safflower, on the contrary, has risen 5s. per cwt. and Cochineal 1d. to 2d. per lb. Gums of all kinds move off in moderate quantity at the previous currency. The Scotch pig iron market has been stimulated by the decision of the Staffordshire masters to raise their prices £1 per ton, making £2 from the lowest point. On the first announcement the price of Scotch pig went up to 60s. 6d., but has since graduated down to 59s. 9d., showing still an advance of 1s. 3d. on the quotations in our last report.

The following are the current prices of the principal articles of American commerce with this country, compared with the rates current at this time last year:—

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

Hotel Companies appear just now to be the chief objects of attraction, with regard to Joint Stock undertakings, two having been announced during the week. The first is to be called the Prince of Wales Hotel Company, and is to be located at Upper Norwood, where it is intended to erect a first-class hotel for the accommodation of the increasing visitors to that locality. The Company have obtained for £16,500 the possession of ten acres of the best land in Upper Norwood and a spacious mansion where the temporary business of the hotel will be at once proceeded with. The capital is to be £100,000, in 10,000 shares of £10 each, and of which £30,000 was at once bespoken. The other undertaking is the London Tavern Company, the object being the purchase and working of the well-known London Tavern in Bishopsgate-street. The undertaking is brought forward under very favourable auspices, the directors being composed of practical men of business, including among them Mr. J. W. Chater, the present proprietor, and the management is to be entrusted to Mr. J. Funge, who has been connected with the establishment for many years. An arrangement has been made by which Mr. Chater gives the directors the option of purchasing the freehold within three years, or leasing the property at a fair rental. The stock-in-trade, goodwill, wines, plate, furniture, &c., are estimated at £30,000, and the proprietor guarantees a minimum dividend of 10 per cent. on that amount for three years. The Company are to take possession to-morrow, and the profits will accrue forthwith. The proposed capital is £120,000, in 12,000 shares of £10 each, the first issue being confined to 6,000 shares. The prospectus has also been issued of the East London Bank (Limited), with a capital of £600,000, in 12,000 shares of £50 each, with power to increase by new shares; but it is not intended in the first instance to call up more than £150,000, or £12 10s. per share. The object of the undertaking is to afford increased banking accommodation to the large commercial establishments in the eastern districts of London, where, eastward of a line drawn north and south across Fenchurch-street, there is not, with the exception of three branches, one private or public bank, notwithstanding that in extent it comprises nearly one-half of the metropolis.

THE TRADE OF THE COUNTRY.
The Board of Trade returns for the month and eight months ended the 31st August have just been issued, and contrast very favourably, as compared with previous returns. That the general commerce of the country is in a satisfactory condition is beyond dispute, almost the only drawback being with regard to the continued falling off in the exportation of cotton and cotton manufactures consequent upon the war in America, but even in this respect the present returns show a considerable improvement. The total declared value of the exports for the month last past was £14,088,814 against £12,829,627 in 1862, and £12,337,441 in 1861, which is an increase of £1,259,187 as compared with the former period, and of £1,751,373 as contrasted with the latter. For the eight months of the present year the total is £89,751,851, against £82,276,107 in 1862, and £82,575,126 in 1861; being an increase of £7,475,744 over 1862, and of £7,176,725 over 1861. With regard to imports there is no special feature to notice, but on the whole the balance is favourable.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, September 30.

The cotton market during the past week has been more quiet than for some time past, but the continued good inquiry for both yarn and cloths at Manchester has caused a further advance of from 1d. to 1½d. per lb. There has been far less speculation going forward, though a moderate quantity has been taken for export. The sales this week have been only 46,000 bales, of which 21,000 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have now reached 1,866,970 bales against 2,228,039 bales to the corresponding period in 1862. The imports this year have been 1,147,051 bales; and to the same period in 1862, 728,894 bales. This year there have been exported 339,417 bales, to the same period last year 333,734 bales. Taken on speculation this year 450,950 bales; same in 1862, 890,710 bales. For consumption there have been taken this year 995,500 bales, to the same period in 1862, 949,100 bales. At present the computed stocks are 201,450 bales, and at the same period in 1862, 85,030 bales. The chief demand this week has been for American descriptions, and for which the inquiries still continue good. The latest official quotations were; Middling Orleans 27½d. to 27¾d; do. Mobile 27½d. to 27¾d; do. Uplands 27d. to 27½d; Surat 21½d. to 21¾d; Dhollerahs 21d.; Egyptian 25 to 25½d; and Smyrna 21d. to 21½.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, September 29.

The total amount of business transacted in the market during the past week is only small as compared with that of two or three weeks ago, yet trade is going on satisfactorily and whenever a manufacturer is open to take orders to deliver in a moderate time, it is easy for him to secure contracts at the highest prices obtained up to the present period. Home trade yarns continue in steady request at the extreme prices of last Thursday.

In export yarns we have to report, if anything, a slight advance in India nules and water twist for China. The continental demand continues steady at the full prices paid last week.

APPEAL "TO THE PEOPLE OF GALLANT OLD ENGLAND."
—A paper with this heading, avowedly coming from English sympathisers with the South who style themselves the "London Confederate States Commercial League," and bearing the signature of a highly respectable city merchant as Honorary Secretary, has been extensively placarded in the streets of London. We have no doubt of the earnestness and genuineness of the motives which dictated this appeal, and are grateful to the authors of it for their active sympathy with the Confederate cause, but we cannot otherwise than regret the vehemence of style into which they have been betrayed. The fact that the Daily News, the bitterest enemy of the South, has conspicuously reproduced the Address, should warn those who appeal to the British public, that the language of passion is not the best calculated to effect their objects.

TO THE PEOPLE OF GALLANT

OLD ENGLAND. Awake! awake! Arise from your lethargy, and shake off the dew-drops that glitter on your garments, and look well to the signs of the times. Events fraught with the most momentous questions involving no less a consideration than our liberties, are threatening to overwhelm us at this moment. For two years and a half a most wicked and fiendish war has been waged against the Confederate States of America, which war has received its chief support from this country, in violation of every law, human and Divine, the Queen's Proclamation, and against the dearest interests of this country, and the peace of the comprehensible as it may seem, the Federal States, our old arch-enemy, without the slightest hindrance or objection from the English Government, has received every appliance of war, even to Greek fire, from us. During this very period a neutralizing neutrality has been practised with impunity, our friends, natural allies, and kinsmen, have been slandered, abused, and labelled beyond any civilised people on earth, insult added to injury, and the foulest duplicity and partiality, shielded and armour-plated with the cry of neutrality, in opposition to the sympathies of all true-hearted Christians, have been practised against them. When urged to do justice to the South, the reply has always been "Neutrality" while, at the same time the Government of the Federal States has really been aided in every possible way. We do not know that there has been an understanding between the Cabinets of England and Washington, and should be loth to believe it, and think, on the contrary, that the voice and true feeling of the country has only to be firmly made known, to induce a different course, but we do know that their actions have to a great degree been harmonious with regard to the Confederate States: both agreeing to an inefficient blockade, and therefore both opposed to any supplies going over frontier from this country both opposed to Recognition, and seemingly both agreed in allowing the capture of English vessels, even when bound to a neutral port. The Yankees have blockaded the Southern ports at great expense, but England at a much greater sacrifice her commercial interests to a fear of the North, and the so-called "neutrality" practised against the South has been their greatest hardship, and inflicted a deeper wound than if England had sent an army of one hundred thousand men, to aid the Northern States to subjugate and starve out their Southern brethren. How strange and inexplicable has been our conduct towards the combatants—the Confederate States having declared their ports open to us and their readiness to exchange cotton for manufactures, and in every case shown a continued desire for the most cordial relations with us, which hitherto we have refused. The Federal Government, on the contrary, has threatened, renounced, and insulted us almost continually, and openly declared that as soon as the South should declare war, they would declare war with us and take "Canada." President JEFFERSON DAVIS has stretched out the right hand of friendship to us with an olive branch, and we have given a serpent. President LINCOLN has approached us in a most hostile and warlike manner, with a drawn sword in one hand and an ignited thunderbolt charged with Greek fire in the other. Yet we give this blood-thirsty tyrant the cordial hand of fellowship, and maintain the most friendly relations with him in his ignominious crusade of fire and sword on this fairest portion of the earth. The sooner that support is withdrawn from the Washington Government, and the independence of the Confederate States is recognised by us, the better for England's future prosperity, happiness, and character. Let us, therefore, co-operate in the common interest of humanity and justice in procuring the Recognition of a brave and suffering people. We are morally bound to finally decide what position we will occupy in regard to the great American war. From fear of offence to the North, we have acted as if the South ought not to be considered as having a right to existence: nay, we have, during this entire unprecedented struggle, given succour and support to the North, and remain her friendly ally. The time has arrived when we must decide whether in our opinion the North should be blot out of the map, or whether the South ought to have her independence. The "London Confederate States Commercial League" firmly believes that a large majority of the freemen of this great nation are anxious to grasp the lion-hearted South in their arms, and welcome her into the family of nations. If the high character, bravery, honour, and heroic defence of their country entitle them to be of then surely they merit our consideration. Who will be first to welcome them to the honours so richly merited? We invite all those that are in favour of the Recognition of the Independence of the "Confederate States of America" to unite with us in adopting the best means to accomplish that end. The importance of action and activity, and the friends of this movement are earnestly urged by the "London Confederate States Commercial League," who are anxious to communicate with other associations, clubs, and friends as to the best means of a General Demonstration throughout the Empire. Offices open daily from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., at 7, St. Mildred's-court, Fenchurch-street, E.C. Meetings on Wednesday at one o'clock, p.m., at the above place, James YEOHANS, Hon. Sec.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 2½, Rue Lord Byron.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

On the 19th September the Confederate army under General Bragg attacked the Federal army under General Rosecrans at Chicamanga, about six miles from Chattanooga. The battle commenced at 11 o'clock in the day by a simultaneous assault on both flanks of the Northern army, that on the left being the most desperate. At 2 o'clock the Confederates charged upon the Federal centre and broke the line. The divisions under the Federal Generals M'Cook and Crittenden were beaten and scattered, and but for the firmness of the division under General Thomas, who seems to have displayed admirable conduct and courage, the Confederate victory would have been at once complete. The fighting was continued until dark, when it terminated without any decisive result. Next day the battle was renewed. The right and centre of the Federals were first driven from the field, and retreated on Chattanooga; the division under General Thomas showed more fight, but was at length also beaten, and retreated on Rossville. On this day the victory was complete. The Federals lost at least 10,000 in killed and wounded, 50 pieces of artillery, and a large quantity of small arms and ammunition. In the absence of Southern accounts, we can do no more than record the results of the battles of Chicamanga. We do not know what were the exact numbers on either side; but we learn from the telegraphic summary of General Bragg's official statement that the report of his being heavily reinforced from every part of the Confederacy is as false as the previous reports of the demoralisation of his army. He writes on the 21st, "The victory is complete, and our cavalry is pursuing. With the blessing of God, our troops have accomplished great results against greatly superior numbers." The Confederate loss is heavy, but we anticipate that the estimate of 5,000 killed and wounded is an exaggeration. Generals Preston Smith, Helm, and Deshles were killed. Generals Hood, Adams, Gregg, and Brown were wounded; and we regret to hear that the gallant Hood has since died from his wounds.

General Rosecrans is said to be in a "safe" position, but a defeated army in an enemy's country cannot be very secure; and it is not surprising that the assurances of his safety do not inspire the Northern people with confidence. On the 24th a reconnaissance discovered the Confederates in force in his front, and guerilla bands were threatening to harass his line of communication.

The safety of Rosecrans was supposed to greatly depend upon his being joined by Burnside, and it was announced by the authorities at Washington on the 21st of September, that the junction would be immediately effected. Up to the 24th, however, Burnside had not reached Chattanooga, and fears were entertained that he might be cut off. We may judge of the anxiety on this head by a rumour that the whole of Burnside's force had been captured being prevalent. The Northern journals censure the Government for scattering their forces, and there is some ground for the complaint. But, on the other hand, how can the Federals hold the long line of the Mississippi, and hold military possession of 800,000 square miles of territory, inhabited by a bitterly hostile and warlike race, without scattering their forces?

In our leader columns the important military news of the week is discussed.

As yet no Southern account of the Federal defeat at Sabine Pass has been received, but the Northern version of the affair, though it does not indicate the extent of the loss in killed and wounded, admits that the failure was complete and disastrous. The object of the expedition was to capture Sabine City, which is situated at the mouth of the Sabine River, and is about forty-five miles from Galveston, and sixty miles from Houston, the capital of Texas. The fleet of transports was escorted by four gunboats—the Clifton, the Arizona, the Granite City, and the Schem. Berwick Bay was selected for the rendezvous. Some delay and much confusion was caused by the pilots depending upon sighting the Federal blockading vessel supposed to be stationed off Sabine Pass for an indication of their having reached the appointed spot; but the blockader had gone on a cruise (it is not at all uncommon for the Federals to trust to a purely paper blockade), and the gunboats overshot their mark. At length all things being ready, the attack was made on the afternoon of the following day—the 6th September. The gunboats opened on the fort, but though forty or fifty shells were thrown there was no reply. The boats approached nearer and nearer, and there was an idea that the fort had been abandoned. The Federals were soon undeceived. The Confederates had reserved their fire until it could be delivered with effect. The Schem attempted to pass to the rear of the fort, and this sealed her fate. She was struck by a shot that crushed in her side; there was an escape of steam, and when that cleared off the flag was lowered. The Clifton was not more fortunate. She attempted to run towards the fort, got slightly aground, and in that position found herself exposed to a raking fire from a hitherto unsuspected battery, as well as to the fire of the main works. A few minutes were sufficient to disable her and to play havoc with her crew; and the white flag was run up. On the Clifton, besides the crew, there were seventy-five sharpshooters and three of the signal corps; and these, as well as all on board the Schem, fell into the hands of the Confederates. General Franklin, in command of the expedition, withdrew as soon as the boats surrendered. He had no option but to retreat; for not only had he lost two out of his four supporting force, but the Arizona had been considerably damaged. Some interesting details of the affairs will be found in our New Orleans correspondence.

The defeat of Rosecrans, and the defeat at Sabine Pass, though the prominent, are not the only events that discourage the Federals. The second division of the Texas expedition under General Herron has been defeated; and the third division, under General Washburne, has been unable to advance, from the want of gunboats to protect his crossing at Berwick Bay, and if he could have crossed we presume he would not have done so, if he had known the fate of the other two divisions. Meantime the siege of Charleston is suspended, and for twenty days General Gilmore had ceased his cannonade. Under these circumstances the cry of "On to Richmond" is again raised, and the Federal commander is urged to go forward, as "Richmond is left nearly defenceless." We wish that General Meade would believe and act upon the report of the defenceless condition of the Southern capital. We fear that he is not so easily imposed upon as General Pope. He may, however, be forced, for political reasons, to advance. Something must be done, or the position of the Washington Government will be anything but "safe."

We are reliably informed that the Confederate Government has decided hereafter to grant no clearances to vessels intending to run the blockade, except on condition of their taking one-third of their outward cargo on Government account. It is urged at Richmond, and is the opinion of good business men here, that this measure does not go sufficiently far to remedy the existing evil of the abnormal price of foreign exchange in the Confederate States, that the Government should take the purchase of supplies abroad exclusively into its own hands, and altogether prohibit the exportation of cotton on private account, except such as is pledged to the holders of the Confederate loan.

A singular illustration of the contempt of the Confederates for the blockade is reported. Certain very valuable stores were ordered from Mississippi to the southern frontier of Texas, but, the fall of Vicksburg and Port Hudson intervening, it was deemed too hazardous to cross the river at that particular time with a train, and the supplies were deliberately embarked at Mobile in a Government vessel to run the blockade there and into a convenient Texan port. They arrived safely. A Confederate General, assigned to a command on the Rio Grande, with his staff, took the same route, and with equal success.

On the 15th September General Gilmore issued an order of the day, in which he congratulates his army upon the achievement of taking possession of the evacuated battery Wagner in terms that would be ridiculous if he had gained the most glorious victory in the annals of war. But in spite of himself he manifests a consciousness that he has not so very much to boast of. So he devotes two long paragraphs to the victory over Fort Sumter, and only one short paragraph to the occupation of Wagner and Gregg. He says:—

It is with no ordinary feeling of gratification and pride that the brigadier-general commanding is enabled to congratulate the army upon the signal success which has crowned the enterprise in which it has been engaged. Fort Sumter is destroyed. The scene where our country's flag suffered its first dishonour you have made the theatre of one of its proudest triumphs.

The fort has been in the possession of the enemy for more than two years, has been his pride and boast, has been strengthened by every appliance known to military science, and has defied the assaults of the most powerful and gallant fleet the world ever saw. But it has yielded to your courage and patient labour. Its walls are now crumbled to ruins, its formidable batteries are silenced, and, though a hostile flag still floats over it, the fort is a harmless and helpless wreck.

What marvellous indecency, not to wait until he has taken Sumter, before he triumphs! But we must not expect such a man to be decent, or able to appreciate, and respect the heroism of an enemy. If Sumter is so utterly destroyed, how honourable and glorious to the Confederates that they yet hold it! But surely that the Confederate flag waves over the ruins is no credit to the Federal forces. If Sumter is doomed to fall, the glory of its defenders will not be obscured by the barren triumph of the enemy. General Gilmore does not think it beneath his dignity to indulge in a grim joke. He tells his soldiers, "The city and harbour of Charleston lie at the mercy of your artillery." There is something hideously comic in Gilmore using the word mercy, even in jest. He is evidently proud of the plot he laid to roast women and children in their beds with Greek fire, and he evidently anticipates being hereafter able to gratify his fiendish passion for the slaughter of the helpless and innocent. We confidently predict that he will be disappointed. General Beauregard now knows the kind of enemy he has to deal with, and will not leave women and children to his mercy.

There was a grand review in General Lee's army on the 9th September. Besides General Lee, Generals Ewell, Longstreet, Hill, Stuart, Wilcox, and others were present. The condition of the troops was excellent, and the only fault the strictest disciplinarian could find was the irrepressible manifestations of affection for the Generals. The number of troops reviewed is not stated, but that the number was considerable we may infer from the fact that in passing along the lines and returning to the starting point, the various Generals had to gallop over fully nine miles.

The conscription in the North has not yielded many soldiers, and of these not a few are being shot as deserters. A shocking but significant scene took place at one of these executions. Two substitutes, sent from Boston, were condemned to death as deserters, and the 18th of September was fixed upon for carrying out the sentence. With the usual parade the men were brought to the place of execution, their eyes bandaged, and one was seated on his coffin, and the other, kneeling beside his, audibly engaged in prayer. The word was given to fire, but though sixteen guns were discharged at the agonised men the fire was ineffectual. One was slightly wounded, and the other, uninjured, jumped up and tore the bandage from his eyes. The reserve was brought forward, fired, but missed the men. Then the provost-marshal took out his revolver, went up to the victims, and blew out their brains. After this the troops were marched past the corpses. Of course the men were missed intentionally and not accidentally, and the despots of the North may well tremble when they find that their troops regard deserters with so much favour. Mr. Lincoln may rely upon it that such a spirit will not be exorcised by bloody pageants. The men were substitutes from Boston, and it would be interesting to know for whom amongst the Abolitionists of that city they were substituted.

The New York papers have circulated a story to the effect that Vice-President Stephens is coming to Europe to negotiate an alliance with the Emperor of the French, on terms supposed to have been offered by his Majesty in December last—the cession of Texas to France. We are not aware that Mr. Stephens is entrusted with any mission to Europe, and certainly, if he were, the object of his mission would not be communicated to Northern newsmongers.

On the 17th September, the seventy-sixth anniversary of the signing of the United States Constitution by Washington, the Hon. W. B. Reed addressed a Democratic meeting at Meadville, Pennsylvania, on the condition and prospects of the country. After dwelling on the risk that any person incurred who ventured to speak the truth, Mr. Reed declared that the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania was in imminent danger, not of invasion from without, for if that were threatened the citizens would rally to arms and repel the invader, but of Federal usurpation. The men at Washington cling to office, not merely for the love of place and for the emoluments thereof, but because they remember the fate of other deposed usurpers, and are afraid to part with power. Therefore, Mr. Lincoln and his adherents are intent on preventing the voice of the Democracy being heard at the forthcoming elections; for this they have suspended the habeas corpus, a proceeding which no English monarch ever ventured on in Pennsylvania, or indeed in any of the Colonies; for this, liberty has been replaced by the most oppressive tyranny, so that Mr. Reed is able to say, with perfect truth, "If Mr. Lincoln were to order a Federal marshal to handcuff me, and beat me, and put me in jail, and keep me there, as he and his secretaries have better men than me, I could have no redress; for such an order is made a good defence, involving double costs on the litigant." Mr. Reed denounced the Federal paper currency as a huge engine of ultimate misery, and as a confession of weakness on the part of the Government. "No government," he says, "that felt itself strong, and was not on the defensive, ever made such an experiment. We did it in the Revolution because we were the defending as well as the resisting Power. The French Republic did it when the monarchs of Europe were in league against it. The Southern Confederacy does it because it, too, is on the defensive. We do it with all our boasted prosperity because, in point of truth, the sources of real and substantial credit are cut off by our own insanity; because no one abroad will lend us money, and no one at home will, if they can help it, pay taxes." Mr. Reed observed that the conscription had proved a total failure as a military measure, and that, for example, from his part of the country not a single conscript was obtained. But as a measure of taxation the conscription had been to some extent successful. The rich and the poor had contributed to the exemption fund, and, speaking of the experience of his own neighbourhood, Mr. Reed said that the demand for exemption money was like a sharp poll-tax, which was levied on Democratic citizens only. Mr. Reed pointed out the only means by which the country can be saved from the threatened ruin. If those who value liberty, if the Democratic party would offer a united resistance to the Administration, the designs of the Republican party might be frustrated. There was, he assured his hearers, no time to be lost, and the battle must be fought at the ensuing elections. In conclusion, Mr. Reed intimated plainly that the first duty of Pennsylvanians was to their State. If Pennsylvania could remain in the Union without losing her rights she did not wish to resume the limited power she has entrusted to the Federal Government; but whether in the Union or in a new Confederacy, or alone, Pennsylvania is bound, at any sacrifice, to maintain her sovereign independence.

The Federal Government has found that the conscription is a failure. For instance, of 1,127 men drafted in the city of Hertford, only four have gone to the army, and of these two were negroes. Of those that go to the army a large percentage desert, and hunting and shooting deserters occupies a large force. True, Mr. Lincoln gets plenty of exemption money, but that is of small advantage. Money he can make with printing presses, and what he wants are men to recruit his armies. It is said that more men were obtained under the volunteer system, and it is proposed to return to it; but it must be remembered that the conscription was resorted to because the volunteering had been exhausted.

An act of patriotism is mentioned in the Southern papers that deserves more than a passing record. Colour-Sergeant John Brent, of the 21st Virginia Regiment, lost his right arm of Chancellorsville; upon returning to his regiment he was offered his discharge, but he refused to accept it, and asked his colonel to be allowed to carry the colours of his regiment in his left hand. The colonel consented, and General Johnston hearing of the affair took the colours and, in person, presented them to the gallant soldier.

Mr. Chase's presses are constantly at work, yet they cannot turn out greenbacks fast enough to meet the enormous expenditure of the Government, and there are heavy arrears in the navy as well as the army. On the 17th ultimo there was much excitement in Brooklyn Navy Yard by the arrival of between 200 and 300 United States sailors, lately of the Brooklyn, who came to demand their arrears of pay, or at least so much as would enable them to redeem their hammocks and bags, which they had been obliged to leave in the hands of their landlords. Captain Meade, of the North Carolina, pacified them by assuring them that he had made arrangements by which they could receive half what was due to them, a third of that half to be paid on the following morning.

The New York Herald is constantly being charged with blustering and ranting, but upon an emergency it can beautifully modify unpleasant facts. In a leader upon the battle of Chattanooga, it asks, "How was it that Rosecrans, with all his experience, prudence, and sagacity, was drawn into the snare from which he has so narrowly escaped?" A disastrous defeat was never more delicately described. The effect is, however, a little spoiled by the answer to the question: "We have no doubt," says the Herald, "that this bloody misadventure was due to that oft-repeated mistake at Washington of underrating the strength, resource, recuperative powers, skill, and tenacity of the enemy." The Washington authorities might rejoin that the New York Herald and other Federal papers had made the same mistake. At all events we know that Mr. Lincoln's English organs have done so.

The New York Times notes that the cotton plantations in Southern Illinois have proved a failure. The frost "has ruined the meagre and weakly stock of cotton that had been secured, and not a bale will be raised north of the Ohio." The same journal exposes what in this country would be called a swindle, but in the North a smart piece of business, on the part of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, an enterprise in which some or at least one distinguished Anglo-Federal is interested. It says the Company "would do well to revise their illustrated maps, in which their Illinois lands are represented clothed with such robust and gorgeous stalks of growing cotton. It is not in accordance with fact, and is hardly fair to innocent purchasers."

Mr. Carl Benson, in an article on "Political Retrogression," published in the New York Times, observes sarcastically that in 1858 "Mr. Buckle was congratulating the world that the reign of wars was nearly over, and that for a great war to be possible in the future one at least of the parties must be a semi-barbarous nation." It occurs to us that if Mr. Buckle were living, he might vindicate his judgment by citing the war in America. He might say, without fear of contradiction, that a nation which included such men amongst its commanders as Butler, Pope, Turchin, Milroy, and a long list of names more or less infamous; that sanctioned the use of Greek fire to burn women, children, and sick persons in their beds; that gave up its liberty to such a despot as Abraham Lincoln, was at the very least semi-barbarous.

The New York World says a collision is expected at the mouth of the Rio Grande between the Federal and French gunboats, on matters connected with cotton and supplies of the Confederates. We may be sure that the chance of such a collision is extremely remote. The North may bluster, but any act that would lead to war with France will be studiously avoided.

It has been reported, and appears to be confirmed, that a Confederate steamer—the Sumter—having been mistaken by the forts for an enemy's vessel, was fired into and sunk in Charleston harbour; and that of 600 persons she had on board, 20 were killed or injured. It is scarcely probable that this is the Gibraltar, the old Sumter, which lately ran the blockade at Wilmington; for though the double blockade-running from one Confederate port into another has recently become no uncommon occurrence, it is inconceivable that a vessel under those circumstances should have so large a number of passengers on board. The ill-fated vessel is more likely to have been a river steamer plying inside the harbour.

ENGLAND.

SHORTLY after 3 o'clock, a.m., on Tuesday, a shock of earthquake was felt in the midland, western, and north-western counties of England, and in Wales. The tremor was sufficient to awake people from their sleep, to make windows rattle, and in some cases it is reported that bricks were loosened. The shock consisted of an oscillatory motion from E.N.E. to W.S.W., and it lasted from three to ten seconds. Some accounts describe two shocks, of which the last was the most severe. The vibration was accompanied by a rumbling noise, but the testimony on this head is not so certain as it is with regard to the motion. Mrs. Somerville, in her "Physical Geography," states that 255 earthquakes have been felt in England, so that the phenomenon of Tuesday night is not so rare as generally supposed. One shock which was felt throughout England occurred in 1089; a shock was "severely felt" at Lincoln in 1142; another was felt throughout England in 1274; and "the greatest ever known" in this country happened on the 14th of November, 1828. An earthquake was felt in London in 1580, when part of St. Paul's and the Temple Church fell; and another shock was "severely felt" in Ireland in 1690. The most violent shock in modern times took place in Scotland on the 23rd October, 1839. The last shock in England until Tuesday was on the 9th November, 1852. In that instance the convulsion was felt in Manchester, Liverpool, North Wales, and in some parts of Ireland. On Tuesday the earthquake was not preceded or accompanied by any change of weather.

Throughout the past week in various parts of England agricultural associations have been holding meetings, and agriculturists have dined and listened to the speeches of their members. At Maidenhead, Mr. Walter, M.P., addressed the Royal East Berks Association on the social state of the agricultural classes. At St. Neots, General Peel, M.P., and Lord Robert Montagu have done the like. At Woodstock, the Duke of Marlborough and Mr. Henley, M.P., have discoursed on the progress and wants of agriculture. With one exception, however, the several speakers have abstained from more than a passing allusion to home or foreign politics. At King's Lynn, Mr. G. W. P. Bentinck, M.P., who with Mr. Gurden, M.P., was present at the meeting of the Marshland Agricultural Association, took the opportunity of alluding to the present state of affairs in America. After recalling to the mind of his hearers that last year he had held the opinion that the policy and duty of this country was at once to recognise the independence of the Southern States of America, Mr. Bentinck adverted to the horror excited for two years past by the tyranny practised by Mr. President Lincoln, and by the brutalities practised by General Butler. They had, said he, formed the topic of conversation and the scandal of Europe, and there was no limit to the strong expression of disgust with which the accounts of the transactions in that country had been received in what he, in contradistinction to them, would term the civilised world. He thought that England had learned from America the useful lesson that civilisation and humanity are not compatible with democratic institutions. As to Poland, Mr. Bentinck thought that the aim of France was to drag England into a war, the end of which would be an accession of territory to the former Power, while this country would be left in the lurch. At Shepperton, the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer and Mr. Lindsay, M.P., attended the meeting of the Middlesex Agricultural Association, and, while the Chief Baron talked learnedly on agricultural science, Mr. Lindsay spoke at considerable length on the state of affairs in America. Mr. Lindsay denied the statement of Earl Russell, that the sympathies of the majority of this country were in favour of the Northern States. Mr. Lindsay dwelt forcibly on the fallacy that the war was one of Abolition, on the abhorrence entertained towards the negro by the Northern people, and on the impracticability of emancipation, either at home or by exportation. He also spoke of the massacres and barbarities which appeared to be the natural result of the President's proclamation. He contended that if the North was to be supplied with cannon and ammunition it was injustice to refuse ships to the South. He held that the South must eventually succeed, and that the separation would not end in a mere division of North and South. Mr. Lindsay's opinions were greeted with unanimous applause.

The Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia arrived at Dover on Wednesday the 30th of September, and at once proceeded to London. On the following day their Highnesses proceeded to Edinburgh, where they met the Prince and Princess of Wales, who were passing through the city on their way to England. On Friday, the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia proceeded to Balmoral on a visit to the Queen. The Prince and Princess of Wales have arrived at Marlborough House.

His Majesty George I., King of the Greeks, arrived at Dover on Monday last, on board the packet Samphire. He was met at Dover by the Greek Ambassador, and at the Victoria Station by his brother-in-law, the Prince of Wales. The King will be the guest of his Royal Highness at Marlborough House during the stay of his Majesty in London.

The Channel Fleet left the Bay of Dublin on the 1st of October, and is now lying off Plymouth. Prior to the departure of the ships, Mr. S. Graves, commodore of the Royal Mersey Yacht Club, who was on board the Edgar as the guest of Admiral Dacres, was presented with a silver claret jug and an address of thanks, in testimony of the kindness and hospitality shown by him to the petty officers and men of Her Majesty's ship Defence during her stay at Liverpool.

The Great Eastern, having survived the accidents of fire and flood, seems destined to succumb to the powers of the Court of Chancery. The Great Ship Company is in a state of considerable embarrassment. On Friday last a meeting was held, at which the report of the directors was read. In that document the actual receipts for the year are set down at £37,308, or £20,000 less than they would have been had not the rates of last year been reduced. The latter sum represents also the excess of the expenditure above the receipts for the current year. In fact, as the report says, immediate steps must be taken either to raise additional capital for the prosecution of the undertaking or to dissolve the company. Notice, moreover, had been given to the effect that the ship would be compulsorily sold in a fortnight. Proceedings, however, have been taken by one of the mortgagees in the form of an action at law, and, inasmuch as an order of adjournment has been granted by a judge at chambers on a summons in the action, the sale will be stayed, and the fate of the great vessel will probably remain in doubt for some time to come.

The Bishopric of Nassau, which became vacant some months since by the death of the Right Rev. Dr. Caulfield, has been filled by the nomination of the Rev. Addington R. P. Venables. The see of Nassau, which comprises the Bahamas, was founded in 1861, and Dr. Caulfield was the first Bishop. The nomination is vested in the Duke of Newcastle as Secretary for the Colonies, subject to the recommendation of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Sir William Atherton has resigned the office of Attorney-General. He was offered the judgeship vacant by the appointment of Baron Wilde to succeed the late Sir Cresswell Cresswell; but it is alleged that his state of health compelled him to relinquish all official work. Sir Roundell Palmer, the present Solicitor-General, will succeed to the office of Attorney-General, and Mr. Collier, Q.C., will, it is supposed, be appointed Solicitor-General.

The Liverymen of the City of London, convened on the 29th of September last in Common Hall, elected a citizen to fill the office of Lord Mayor for the year commencing on the 9th of November. According to custom the Lord Mayor went in state from the Mansion House to Guildhall, and thence, accompanied by the Recorder, Aldermen, Sheriffs, and the chief officers of the Corporation, proceeded to the church of St. Lawrence Jewry, and, after the hearing of the sermon by the Lord Mayor's chaplain, returned to the Guildhall. There the Common Serjeant read over the names of the aldermen eligible for election, the show of hands was duly taken, and the Sheriff's announced that the choice of the Livery had fallen on Alderman William Lawrence and Alderman Hale. Of these the Court of Aldermen, in virtue of their right, chose Alderman Lawrence, citizen and carpenter, who was then declared to be the Lord Mayor for the ensuing year. After the Alderman had returned thanks, a resolution was submitted to the meeting, embodying an expression of satisfaction on the part of the Common Hall at the mark of Royal favour shown to the Corporation by the presence of the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs at the marriage of the Prince of Wales. The resolution also deplored the attempt made to deprive the citizens of one of their most valued privileges by amalgamating their police with the metropolitan force, which it regarded as an unconstitutional and dangerous proceeding. The Lord Mayor, in his address, said that he believed the country was now thoroughly alive to the importance of the principle of local self-government, and to the dangerous tendency of that centralising system which aimed at the creation of a Minister of Police. From an official document recently compiled by Sir Richard Mayne, it had been inferred that there was an intention on the part of the Home Secretary to renew the struggle in the matter of the police amalgamation. If that were so, he warned the Government that the Corporation of London would again enter the lists with them in defence of a principle which they believed to lie at the foundation of popular freedom.

The first of the three autumnal meetings at Newmarket has passed off with considerable success. Thirty races were decided in the four days, and 207 competitors took part in the struggles for the various prizes. The Great Eastern Railway Handicap, being a subscription stake of £15 each, with £100 added by the Railway Company, attracted ninety-four subscriptions and brought twenty-five horses to the post. The race was won rather easily by Sir Alexis, a son of Stockwell, and the property of Sir Joseph Hawley, against whom the odds at starting were 17 to 1. This horse figured somewhat ingloriously in the Derby of 1862, and for some time was degraded to the position of a mere "hack" in the training establishment. His success was therefore a considerable surprise; but inasmuch as the distance of the race was but three-quarters of a mile, and the weight carried by him only 102 lbs., he is not to be esteemed an animal of decided merit. On the second day of the meeting the Ranger, who won the Grand Prix de Paris in May, beating the famous mare La Touque and Lord Clifden, but who did not maintain his reputation in the Doncaster St. Leger, contested two races. In the first of them he was defeated by Mr. Ten Broeck's mare Tornado, the daughter of the Wild Dayrell, and also by Turcos; and in the second contest he with difficulty defeated Early Purl for the Newmarket St. Leger Stakes. Assuredly these performances do not justify the rank he occupied in the spring among the finest champions of the turf, but it was obvious to the most superficial observer that neither the condition of his legs nor the state of his health were compatible with a just exhibition of his powers. In the race for the Queen's Plate, over a distance of more than four miles, Isoline maintained the reputation gained in her victory for the Goodwood Cup, by defeating, through indomitable courage, Mr. Savile's Harlequin, who but two days before had beaten Hurricane. This performance deserves especial attention. The exact distance traversed by Isoline was four miles one furlong and 173 yards, the weight carried by her was 113 lbs., and the time occupied in the journey was 8 min. 10 sec. Isoline can scarcely be considered equal to Lord Clifden, Maccaroni, or Asteroid, and she is but three years old. Yet the finest American performance on record is scarcely superior to that of Isoline. For it is recorded that on the 2nd of April, 1855, a time match was run at New Orleans between Lecomte and Lexington, in which the latter, who won, did the four miles in 7 minutes and 19½ seconds. In this race both horses were four years old, and carried 103 lbs., or 10 lbs. less than Isoline. Had they started in the race for the Queen's Plate they would have carried 133 lbs., or 20 lbs. more than Isoline. The only other race to which attention need be drawn is the Newmarket October Handicap, for which twenty-one horses came to the post, and which was won by the Monk, who, curiously enough, carried off this very prize two years ago. The gallant Man-at-Arms was second, and Lord William Powlett's beautiful mare Eleanor was third. The weather during the week was generally fine, the company considerable, and many of the races were well contested. After an interval of a week, Newmarket will again form the object of attraction to the racing world, the great Cesarewitch Stakes being fixed for the 13th October. The final meeting commences on the 26th October, at which the race for the Cambridgeshire Stakes will be decided.

The seventh annual meeting of the National Association for the promotion of Social Science was opened yesterday at Edinburgh by Lord Brougham, who delivered the inaugural address in the Free Church Assembly Hall. His lordship, in glancing at the aspect of affairs abroad, dwelt at some length upon the war in America. He said "the term Civil War is now hardly applicable to this miserable contest. The people of the South are banded against those of the North, exactly as any two European nations, differing in all respects save language, have been banded against each other—the Austrians and Prussians, for example." He declared that with the North emancipation is a hollow pretext. "Hollow we may well call it, for those who proclaimed emancipation confess that it was a measure of hostility to the whites, and designed to produce slave insurrection, from which the much-enduring nature of the unhappy negro saved the country. My esteemed friend, the prelate, who exalts by his eloquence and his virtues the name of Wilberforce, which he inherits, declared that the authors of the measure cared as little for the black's freedom as for the white's; and now they call for extermination of the one race to liberate the other." His lordship denounced Northern vanity and lust of empire. He said, "Man who is a prey to vanity thirsts not for the blood of his neighbour. How fearfully otherwise is it when a nation is its slave! Magnifying itself beyond all measure, and despising the rest of mankind—blinded and intoxicated with self-satisfaction—persuaded that their very crimes are proofs of greatness, and believing that they are both admired and envied, the Americans have not only not been content with the destruction of half a million, but been vain of the slaughter. Their object being to retain a great name among nations for their extent of territory, they exulted in the wholesale bloodshed by which it must be accomplished, because others were unable to make such a sacrifice." The noble lord drew a graphic picture of Northern despotism, and declared that the hatred to this country in the United States prevails in a degree "almost amounting to mental alienation."

The General Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England for the year ending the 1st November, 1862, has been published. The Board was appointed some fifteen years ago, with the object of applying the superfluities of the temporalities of episcopal sees and capitular corporations to the endowment of new livings or the augmentation of small benefices. To effect these purposes, all estates belonging to episcopal sees became, upon the death of the Bishop in possession at the time of the passing of the Act, vested in the Ecclesiastical Commission, and a large proportion also of the capitular estates has, by consent of the Deans and Chapters, been vested in the same Board. The Acts of Parliament setting forth the powers of the Board are numerous, complicated, and ill-drawn; and, inasmuch as they culminated in the Act of 1860, which, without contradiction is the worst of all, little regret need be felt at their impending annihilation. The Commission consists of fifty members, Bishops, Judges, and "persons of distinction," but the working members are three in number. From the report it appears, as may be expected, that the cost of administration is enormous. Thus, for the year the expense of management was £58,476, while the total amount applied to the endowment and augmentation of benefices and the general purposes of the Commission was but £196,408. The official establishment consumed £18,000, and the legal expenses £14,000. This year has moreover, not been an exceptional one, for during the last twelve years the funds administered for the purposes of the Commission have amounted to £1,710,453, while the expenses of management have reached the sum of £619,533. Probably the great blot in the structure of the Commission is its cumbrous character, inevitably leading to the drifting of the entire management into the hands of the officials.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE is not content with the failure of the intervention for Poland, and as the newspapers have not the slightest idea of the course which the Emperor intends to pursue, they are driven in their impatience to invent one for him. Thus we have had positive statements that the three Powers have addressed, or are prepared to address, a circular to their diplomatic agents, declaring that Russia has forfeited all her rights to Poland by her repudiation of the treaties of 1815—a story which can have no other foundation than the language of Earl Russell at Blairgowrie. No negotiations can be actively pursued at the present time. The Emperor has been at Biarritz; Earl Russell is still in Scotland; and his Lordship would hardly venture to commit England to a policy which involves so many dangers without consulting the Cabinet.

The three Powers have certainly not agreed to anything at present unless it be to put up with the rebuff they have received. It is rumoured that the Emperor means to consult the Corps Legislatif as to the course which he should pursue in this question, and that for this purpose the Chambers will be convoked for the 4th November. The convocation of the Chambers about that date is probable enough, but it is not likely that the Emperor will delay his decision to consult them. As himself the elect of the people, entrusted with full power and charged with the whole responsibility, he has no need of the approbation of the Corps Legislatif for war or peace. M. Billault, the President of the Council, the minister upon whom will devolve the onerous task of defending the Government against such skilful debaters as Thiers, Barryer, Jules Favre, and Marie, in the next session, has been unwell. Exaggerated statements created some disquietude, but according to the Moniteur his illness at no time presented a serious character, and he is now quite convalescent. Prince Napoleon is in London, but not, as was rumoured, upon any political mission.

A telegram from Thorn says, that an order of the day of the revolutionary Town Captain of Warsaw announces that the attempt upon the life of General Berg took place by order of the National Government, and that the measure was adopted with the view of compelling the general to declare his policy of extermination, which he would otherwise have carried out gradually and imperceptibly. To murder a man, as the National Government attempted to do, is rather an Irish way of inducing him to declare his policy. The excuse is a very pitiful one. Morally and politically such acts are perfectly indefensible; and the Poles will find that if they continue to have recourse to them they will tire out the long suffering sympathies of Europe. With reference to the conduct of the Russians towards the inmates of the Zamoyiski palace, the most conflicting accounts reach us. In the Polish version of the affair, the inmates of the palace were guiltless of all participation in the attempt upon the General, and were treated with a barbarity which is described in most luxurious detail. According to the Russian version, the bombs must have been thrown from the palace, and many of the inmates must have been privy to the attempt. Many of them had packed up their things, and had prepared for an immediate departure. Large stores of weapons, powder and ball were discovered, together with a powder manufactory, and a laboratory, in which it is supposed the bombs were made. Executions and murders are, however, the staple of the intelligence from Warsaw. On the one hand, the Russian Government shoots Polish gendarmes and the few executioners of the National Government's decrees it can find; on the other hand, the National Government continues to employ its agents to assassinate all persons who show any fidelity to the Russian Government. From all parts of Poland come stories which prove that both sides have abandoned all regard for humanity or decency: the struggle is carried on by the most revolting barbarities. A note has been addressed to the newspapers by Grabowski, an active agent of the National Government, a Prussian Pole, who has eluded prosecution by a timely flight, announcing that the National Government has appointed General Mieroslawski Organiser-general of the Polish troops. If the announcement be correct the "reds" have triumphed over the "whites," and the contest will henceforth be guided by the Polish democracy. The National Government ought to be the best judge in such a matter; but foreigners cannot help regarding this as a most injudicious appointment. It will disgust the Polish nobility, who have hitherto, by their great pecuniary sacrifices, found the means to keep up the contest; and it certainly will stimulate the Prussian Government to use severer measures of precaution. It is also said that Prince Ladislaus Czartoryski has resigned his post as agent of the revolutionary government, for two reasons: the one, probable enough, the attack made upon him by the Polish democracy; the other, quite incredible, an approximation of Russia and France, putting an end to all chance of French help. On the other hand, it is said by the Patrie, which probably speaks by the book, that the Prince is taking formal steps in the name of the Polish National Government to obtain from England and France the recognition of the Poles as belligerents. Taking formal steps "means, of course, no more than making a formal application" which is likely, for the present, at least, to be met by a refusal.

The dates of the Prussian elections are fixed. The primary elections, that is to say, the choice by the constituencies of the Wahlmänner or election-men, are appointed for the 20th of this month, and on the 28th the so-selected electors assemble and choose the deputies. The Minister of the Interior has addressed a circular to the Presidents of the Provinces relative to the conduct of public functionaries in the elections. Count Eulenberg calls upon the presidents to watch very closely all functionaries, especially those of high rank, and to take care not only that they do not oppose the Government but that they work actively for it. "He who has sworn respect, fidelity, and obedience to the King his most gracious lord, is not released from that oath either as elector or elected, and when his Majesty points out positively the constitutional road upon which functionaries ought to accompany him, all are obliged to obey him; but those whom the royal grace has called, by a special confidence, to important political functions, are bound, moreover, to actively support the policy of the Government." The Minister concludes with this significant sentence: "The questions now at issue are of too great importance, the differences which are manifested are too considerable for the Government to renounce the rights which it has over its functionaries, and show [the same] clemency to which it might be disposed under other circumstances. In allowing the enemy to act in its own camp the Government would become a traitor to the cause which it is charged to defend with conviction and conscience." And the name of this minister is at the foot of the ministerial report we summarised last week, in which a German parliament was pronounced the sole remedy for the evils which afflict the German nation. No doubt the Government will act up to the threats of this circular and strain the law as much as possible to punish recalcitrant officials; but all its efforts will only obtain a small increase of its supporters in the next Chamber. The vast majority of the old members will be re-elected, and such changes as may take place will be the substitution of men of Democratic opinions for the old or moderate Liberals.

The Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath has adopted a motion for the abolition of the necessity of a government and parochial permission for marriage. In a large part of Germany a man is not allowed to marry unless he can satisfy the authorities of the parish that he can support a family and that his marriage is not likely to entail any burden upon the parochial funds. A telegram announces that the Minister of Finance has laid before the House a plan for the complete reform of the system of taxation.

The most important event we have to record this week—the most important event, perhaps, which we have recorded this year—is the adoption by the German Diet of the resolution of its committee recommending federal execution in Holstein and Lauenburg. Long threatened, it has come at last, and come at the most dangerous moment. A slight spark would now set Europe in a blaze, and in all human probability the entry of the federal soldiers into Holstein will supply that spark. The Diet, it will be remembered, summoned the Danish Government, under the threat of execution, to withdraw the ordinance of the 30th March, and fulfil the stipulations of 1851-52, according to the German interpretation, or accept the proposals of Earl Russell's despatch of September, last year. On the 27th August, the Danish Government made its reply, which amounts to a refusal. The Diet has now charged the governments of Hanover and Saxony to supply 6000 men, who are to occupy the Duchies, and to appoint two commissioners to administer the Government in the name of the King Duke. The occupation is to be prolonged until the Danish Government complies with all the demands of the Diet. As it is possible that Denmark may resist the occupation as unwarranted by the federal constitution, Austria and Prussia are called upon to supply a sufficient number of troops to overcome any opposition that may be offered. Three weeks are given the Danish Government to comply with the demands of the Bund. What course Denmark will take is not clear. She certainly will not comply with the summons of the Bund; but whether she will resist the occupation is not yet known. Most probably she will not. In any case it may be considered certain, that unless England and France interfere in an energetic manner the execution will take place, and then it is, humanly speaking, almost impossible that a war, certain to develop into a general one, should not break out.

The bills which the Danish Government has laid before the Rigsraad for a reform of that body may perhaps be described more correctly as a new constitution for Denmark and Schleswig. Provincial affairs are to continue to be determined by the separate assemblies of the kingdom and of Schleswig. The Rigsraad, which now consists of only one house, which, since the abolition of the common constitution for Holstein and Lauenburg in 1858, has only sixty members, is, according to the new project, to consist of two houses, or "Things," the Landething and Folkething—the names of the two houses of the Rigsdag, or Parliament of Denmark Proper. The Landething is to be composed of the princes of the Royal house of age, and seventy-five members, of whom twenty-five—nineteen resident in the kingdom and six in Schleswig—are to be appointed by the King for twelve years. Forty of the other fifty members are to be elected from the kingdom and ten from Schleswig. The electoral qualification is an income of 1200 rix-dollars—rather more than £130—or the payment of 200 dollars taxation. The Folkething will consist of 130 members—101 for the kingdom and twenty-nine for Schleswig, elected by a suffrage which is pretty nearly universal.

General Montebello, the commander of the French army of occupation, has felt himself obliged to publish an order of the day which is a severe condemnation of the Papal Minister of War, Monsignor de Merode.

The order explains the causes of the difficulty. "On Thursday, the 10th September, on the banks of the Sacco," the boundary between the Italian and Papal territory, "within 200 metres of a French post, the pontifical gendarme Samorini fired twice, without any provocation, at inoffensive Italian soldiers"—two officers of the Italian frontier post, who were bathing. "The General commanding the division, having for his mission at the frontier to prevent any disturbance, decided that the gendarme should be tried by the divisional council of war. It was his right, his duty, but the culprit has been withdrawn from him. It remains for him to fulfil a duty of honour: to brand publicly an act, the repression of which escapes him, and to repel all connivance in the impunity which has been arranged for it." This step of General Montebello's will probably lead to his recall. The Pope will not brook such an insult as the publication of this order, and the Emperor will not break with the Pope.

Prince Humbert, the eldest son of the King of Italy is to reside in Naples this winter. The step is a very judicious one. Much of the discontent of the Neapolitans has its origin in the feeling that the city is reduced to the condition of a mere provincial town.

Sicily is in a very deplorable condition. Assassination and robbery are perpetrated with impunity. The attention of the Government is devoted to the seizure of the recalcitrant conscripts. The conscription is felt in Sicily as an evil which more than counterbalances all the advantages of the Garibaldi liberation. Flying columns traverse the island, surrounding the towns, and committing—if the organs of the Party of Action are to be believed—the most horrible atrocities.

By way of Berlin, we have the news that the Marquis Pepoli has concluded a treaty of commerce with the Russian Government, by which Italy is placed upon an equal footing with the most favoured nations. From Turin we hear that the minister will shortly arrive there on leave of absence. If the statement, with respect to the treaty, should be confirmed, the extreme party in Italy will cause a great commotion. To have treated with Russia at such a time will be pronounced treason to the cause of Poland and nationalities.

The public was informed in the daily papers of Saturday, by a despatch from Madrid, that the Democratic committee had issued a proclamation recommending the electors to abstain from voting—a resolution adopted a long time since—and that the Ministry await the result of the elections with confidence:—as well they may, when nearly all their opponents, convinced that they have no means of resisting the pressure exercised by the public functionaries upon the electors, have resolved to let them have everything their own way. The influence of the Government in Spain upon the elections is always enormous; but this time it seems that the agents of the Ministry have carried their zeal so far as to make all opposition a farce in the sense of its inutility, and something of a tragedy so far as the consequences to independent voters and candidates are concerned. A curious illustration of the severity of the régime under which the Spanish press suffers is afforded by a Royal decree, highly creditable to the Ministry, which restores to the family of Senor Calvo Assensio, the editor of the Progressist journal La Iberia, the fines paid by the deceased since the promulgation of the law. The amount to be refunded has been estimated at £6000 sterling.

M. James Fazy is one of the leaders of the Swiss Democracy, and has long enjoyed an enormous influence in the Canton of Geneva. Of late, however, his party has lost ground, and the majority of the Grand Council is Conservative. M. Fazy has long been the object of attack on the ground that he is the owner of a gambling house, and the authorities of Geneva have been exposed to much reproach for their determination to screen the leader of their party against the laws in force against such houses. The Grand Council, discussing the report of the Council of State, the executive power of the Canton, noted a formal censure against that body, for not having applied a particular article of the penal code, interdicting games of chance, against M. Fazy's house. This resolution, which was carried after a stormy sitting, in which the galleries, filled with radicals, partisans of M. Fazy took, so far as noise was concerned, a very active part, was resented by the Council of State, which closed the session of the Grand Council. As both these bodies are appointed by direct election, it will be for the people to decide between them at the next election.

The session of the Ionian Parliament was opened on Thursday, and on Monday it voted the annexation to Greece, accompanying the vote with an expression of thanks to England—the first civil thing it has said of the protectorate. King George, after having visited St. Petersburg and Berlin, joined a family party at Rumpenheim, near Frankfurt, and paid his respects to King Leopold, has arrived in England. The Greek community intend to fête him. His Majesty is enjoying the sweets of royalty, and he is right to take what he can of them; he will find bitters enough in Athens.

MEXICO.

The deputation of notables sent to offer the throne of Mexico to the Archduke Maximilian had an interview with that prince at his residence, at Miramar, near Trieste, on the 3rd inst. They appear to have been received in regal state, as appears from the account of the Times' Trieste correspondent:—

The Archduke had been obliging enough to hire for them the whole of the first floor of the principal hotel of the town, where two chamberlains were in attendance to show them their rooms. It appears the leading citizens of Trieste disputed with each other the honour of placing their equipages at their orders. They drove out to Miramar on Saturday in the archducal carriage, and were received by the future Emperor, surrounded by his aides-de-camp, chamberlains, and household, all, of course, in gala-dresses. After the usual compliments, they exhibited the vote of the "notables" of Mexico engrossed on parchment. It was enclosed in the handle of a sceptre of solid gold which had been sent from Mexico, and had been made at the shortest notice by Mexican artists. This emblem of sovereignty represents two eagles supporting the Imperial crown, with a serpent in their beaks, encircled with a garland of laurels and olives. M. Gutierrez de Estrada was the spokesman on the occasion. He described the events and vicissitudes which had led the Mexican nation to seek in the re-establishment of monarchy the term of their discords, which he showed to be the necessary consequence of all that has occurred since the emancipation of the old Spanish colonies. As a matter of course he paid a just tribute of homage to the Emperor Napoleon III. (and to France) who took so leading a part in the great and noble task of Mexican regeneration. He added, that in making choice of an Austrian Prince, the "notables" had only rendered homage to the popular traditions of the country, and that the most prosperous period ever known by the Mexicans was while they were under the domination of the Archduke's ancestors. M. Gutierrez de Estrada grew warm with his theme. The finger of God, he said, by endowing the Archduke Ferdinand Maximilian with the richest and rarest qualities, pointed and designed him as the object of the unanimous choice of the people. The Archduke could not refuse the crown thus spontaneously and enthusiastically offered to him without opposing the designs of Providence; and if Providence had brought out to light the gifts and merits of the Prince, it was clearly in order to direct them towards the fulfilment of the great work: the salvation and regeneration of Mexico.

The Archduke's reply was in effect an acceptance of the proffered crown, with such reserves as became the dignity of a prince of the oldest sovereign house in Europe, on such conditions as might have been expected, and, indeed, were accepted. Although we cannot approve of the principle of universal suffrage for a people, more than one-half of whom are Indian serfs, and at least, a third of the whole half-castes, the Archduke cannot be blamed for desiring an additional and more formal expression of the national will. The Stock Exchange has found the reply not quite satisfactory, simply because it believes to read in Earl Russell's speech that England will withhold even that moral guarantee which is all that is asked of her. We believe that in this respect the Stock Exchange attaches undue importance to the Blairgowrie manifesto. We subjoin the text of the Archduke's speech, on which we comment elsewhere more at length:—

The wishes of the Mexican Assembly of Notables have touched me deeply. It cannot but be exceedingly flattering for our House that they have turned their eyes to the descendants of Charles V. Although the mission of maintaining the independence and welfare of Mexico on a solid foundation, and with free institutions, is a most noble one, I must, nevertheless, in complete accordance with the views of the Emperor Napoleon, declare that the monarchy cannot be re-established on a legitimate and firm basis without a spontaneous expression of the wishes of the whole nation. I must make my acceptance of the throne dependant upon a plébiscite of the whole country. On the other hand, it would be my duty to ask for guarantees, which are indispensable to secure Mexico against the dangers which threaten her integrity and independence. Should these guarantees be obtained, and the universal vote of the nation be given in my favour, I am ready to accept the crown, subject to the approval of the Emperor, my brother. In case Providence should call me to this high mission, I must at once declare that it is my firm intention to open the path of progress by a Constitution, as was done by my brother, and after the complete pacification of the country to seal the fundamental law with an oath. By such means only can a new and really national policy be called into existence by which all parties, forgetting old disputes, would co-operate with me in raising Mexico to a prominent rank among nations. Carry back with you these frank declarations to your fellow-citizens, and act in such a manner that it may become possible for the nation to declare what form of government it desires to have."

ST. DOMINGO AND HAYTI.

THE latest news from Havannah show that the fears expressed in the letter from St. Domingo which we published last week had but too good foundation. The revolt is described as spreading, and although Puerto Plata had been retaken from the insurgents by an assault, in which the Spaniards, according to the bulletin, performed prodigies of valour, made a great slaughter and sustained a trifling loss themselves, the Spanish forces under the command of Santana are, it is admitted, closely pressed by the insurgents.

Meanwhile, on the other side of the island President Jeffrard has been opening the Parliamentary session. His speech to the senators and representatives of the Haytian Republic is a lecture to the representatives after the Prussian fashion. It seems, according to the President, that "the representatives of the people of the 10th legislative period have not been penetrated with the thought that without a complete accord between the Executive and the legal representatives of the nation, the development of our institutions is an impossible work." On the contrary, in spite of all the President's "moderation and patience during two sessions," they put him "by their blind and systematic opposition in the painful necessity of dissolving the Chambers." He appeals to the new representatives to lend him a loyal co-operation. "The political struggles of persons and of amour propre in creating a sterile antagonism can only hinder the march of public affairs and become fatal to our independence. Let us escape from this fatal road of agitation and conflict." It is curious to see how glibly this language, of which we have had so much in Europe, falls from the lips of a black creature of universal suffrage. Who shall say that the blacks are not equal to the whites when they can so soon pick up this jargon? The President goes on to say that his relations with foreign powers are excellent, and to promise that the secretary of state will give a full account of the reforms and ameliorations already realised. President Jeffrard is a clever man. He puts his laws into execution, and then asks parliamentary assent further.

NEW ZEALAND.

A telegram, giving news from Melbourne to the 25th of August, says that the war in New Zealand is spreading, that the Maories are appearing in great numbers, and that reinforcements are necessary. This want of reinforcements, the Globe announces, has already been provided for.

ANOTHER FEDERAL BLUNDER AND DISASTER.

NEW ORLEANS, September 12.

THE extensive reinforcements lately sent from Vicksburg to New Orleans were indicative that Banks was preparing for a vigorous, perhaps important, fall campaign in this Department. The entire force concentrated here within a few weeks past cannot fall far short of 40,000 men. For some days past a large number of these troops have been in motion for the next grand movement. A week ago last Friday the movement commenced. General Washburne's column of 15,000 men was sent to Brashear City. At the same time Herron's division, say 7,000 men, moved from Port Hudson up the Mississippi towards the mouth of Red River, while Franklin, with 3,000 men, went down the river to the Gulf from this city. There were thus three distinct columns on the march at once, while a fourth column, the 19th Army Corps (Ord's), was preparing to move, a large part of the regiments belonging to that corps having already been sent to Ship Island. In addition to all these movements, which were supposed to be secret, Banks chartered a number of transports which lay at the Levee under orders to be in readiness to sail at any moment.

What did all this mean? Our Mobile friends, in view of the sudden concentration of troops at Ship Island, and knowing that the Federal force at Pensacola, Florida, had lately also been reinforced, looked for an immediate advance upon their city. They expected the advance from the three points—Pascagoula and Pensacola on the coast, and from the interior, via Montgomery, by a division from Grant's Vicksburg army. The Mobile newspapers seemed quite anxious about it, and warned the people to look for the attack at any time. That they have not been idle, in making preparations for the expected assault, is evident from the following, which is taken from an editorial in the Mobile Register, September 1:—

All accounts from New Orleans state that the Federals are coming over here very soon, to "gobble up" Mobile. They affect to be quite sure of an easy job of it. Vicksburg has made them vain again and turned their heads. Well, Mobile has been taking lessons too, and her studies do not date from the fall of Vicksburg, but from the sacrifice of New Orleans. We have here prosecuted branches of practical engineering similar to those described at Savannah. We have hemmed ourselves in and the Yankees out with Chinese walls above ground, and with hospitable preparations to receive the promised visits under and on top of earth, which afford us the perfect assurance that "our house is in order" for all the eventualities of war. Many people in the interior take it for granted they Mobile must knock under to the Yankees as soon as that knock at our doors. They are as much mistaken as the Yankees are. If Mobile is half as well defended as Charleston has been, the gridiron flag will never fly over it. Vicksburg was supposed to be impregnable by these people, and when it fell the bottom of the tub of defensive engineering fell out with them, and nothing could be held against the Yankees. Yet a sand battery on Morris Island has for forty days resisted a fire to which that of Sebastopol was but play. Our unhelpful friends in the interior will perhaps be surprised to hear the opinion that Mobile is stronger than Vicksburg, both in the means of offence and defence. That is our opinion, and when the trial comes it will be verified. Governor Shorter lost his election mainly by his patriotic efforts to supply the labour to work on Mobile defences. First and last he sent to our engineers from 8,000 to 10,000 hands. What do the doubters suppose these hands have been about under the direction of the best engineering talent in the Confederacy? Let them come and see, and change their opinions.

Now leaving Mobile alone for the present, as I have before written you the Federals will do, let me note what was undoubtedly intended by the late movements of the Federal army in this department.

The movement did not indicate an immediate advance upon Mobile; it did look like a march upon Texas, and in the following order: Franklin's column would go by the Gulf to Sabine Pass, while Washburne's column crossed the Bay at Brashear City and attacked the Taylor-Mouton army on the Teche; Herron being in readiness to cut off the retreat of the Confederates towards Red River, while Franklin would be equally in position to prevent them from retreating into Texas. The movement thus contemplated the "gobble" of the 10,000 or 15,000 men on the Teche, or their destruction as an army, and then a triumphal march through Western Louisiana into Texas; to Houston first, which was to be reduced and occupied, and then by land to Galveston, which was to be besieged and reduced at leisure. Meanwhile, when this grand movement had sufficiently progressed towards a favourable completion, the chartered transports would be sent from here to bring back a greater part of the troops from Texas, to carry them eastward to Pascagoula and to Pensacola, and then to invest Mobile in the rear.

This plan, which looks very well on paper, and which is believed to have been dictated by Halleck himself, makes no allowance whatever for the fact that the Confederates might possibly do all they could to prevent its accomplishment.

Franklin, with Weitzel, Emory, 3,000 men, 13 transports, and 2 gunboats (the Arizona and Crescent City), left this city last week to commence the Texas campaign. Washburne's column having arrived at Brashear City, and at Bayou Boeuf near by, the Federal force there was large enough to permit the two gunboats in Berwick Bay to depart and join the Texas movement. The Schem and Clifton accordingly sailed away from Brashear, and joined Franklin's expedition in the Gulf. The whole Franklin force arrived at Sabine Pass, the boundary between Texas and Louisiana, last Tuesday. The Clifton crossed the bar first, the Schem following, and the first transport, the Banks, which had on board Weitzel's 500 men, who were to make the first landing to assault the work on shore, was about one hundred yards in the rear. On board the Clifton were 130 sharpshooters belonging to Weitzel's brigade, who were taken on board from the camp at Brashear City.

It had been reported to the Federals that the Confederate defences at Sabine Pass consisted solely of a small earthwork, mounting two old-fashioned 24's and two old 32's, with perhaps a piece or two of field artillery. Instead of this, they found a very fine work, mounting, as they soon discovered, seven large siege guns. What followed can be narrated in as brief time almost as the events occurred. The Clifton and Schem were allowed to fire several times, but as soon as they were in proper position the battery opened upon them both with terrible effect. A shot went through the steam drum of the Schem, and at the same moment she grounded. The Clifton was terribly cut to pieces. She also grounded, and showed the white flag. Seven men who escaped from this gunboat swam to the shore and were taken off by boat and brought to one of the transports. They say that thirty men were killed and wounded on the Clifton. At the same time there were four Confederate gunboats above the work in Sabine Lake, which did not need to take part in the action. Two of them came down and took the prisoners and property from the two grounded gunboats. The whole action did not last fifteen minutes.

The whole Federal fleet was witness to this short but sharp affair, and as soon as the Schem and Clifton were lost, the expedition returned, minus those two boats, to the Gulf. The capture of the guns, on the Clifton especially, is a most valuable one to the Confederates. Driving back the whole expedition from Texas is an immense success. The Federals all came back, part of them to Brashear and the rest to this city, arriving last night and to-day. As soon as Banks heard of the disaster and failure of the expedition he ordered the immediate discharge of the chartered and seized transports that were to join in the movement upon Mobile. Washburne's column has not yet crossed Berwick Bay; Herron is believed to be marching back to Port Hudson; the conquest of Texas is necessarily postponed for a few days; and, as I wrote you last, there are no indications of an immediate movement upon Mobile. There will be no doubt, however, a lively fall campaign in this Department. There is nothing more of moment to send by this mail.

TENNESSEE, MISSOURI, AND KANSAS.

NEW YORK, September 23.

THIS steamer will bring you very encouraging news from the South. The grand Federal expedition into Texas, which, after so much preparation, set out on its march to easy victory, has been repulsed in one of the most important movements forward, and been compelled to return; and a great disaster has fallen upon the Federal arms by the defeat, near Chattanooga, of the grand army of General Rosecrans, from which so much was expected.

The previous accounts left General Rosecrans advancing, without sensible opposition, through South-east Tennessee, into Georgia, threatening the interior lines of communication with Richmond, and the cutting of the Confederacy in two by a line from Charleston to the Mississippi; and a column under General Burnside was advancing from Kentucky, aiming at a junction in North-western Georgia. Rosecrans occupied Chattanooga, and Burnside Knoxville. The Confederate army under General Bragg was represented in the Union papers as hopelessly demoralised by desertions, in companies and brigades, and retiring, unable to make any head against the victorious Yankees, with the purpose to attempt a stand to cover Atlanta, if possible, and prevent the enemy from penetrating into the interior of Georgia.

But instead of being disheartened, scattered and disorganised, the Confederates have been engaged, with amazing energy, in concentrating their forces, and collecting recruits; and having watched their opportunity for attack have turned upon General Rosecrans with terrible vigour. The battle commenced on Saturday the 11th, and was renewed on Sunday. The details have not reached us with anything like accuracy. What has reached the public has been diluted through the administrative censorship of telegraph lines and the press, and is undoubtedly falsified, as is always the case after great battles, to weaken the effect of disaster on the public mind. But enough is known and confessed, to show that Rosecrans suffered a terrible repulse, and to warrant the belief, when all is told, that he has sustained a most disastrous defeat; which must have a very beneficial result to the South in the progress of this campaign and on the issues of the war. The effort to penetrate into Georgia, in order to give co-operation in the assault upon Charleston and the projected movement on Richmond, is baffled; and the inquiry which disturbs the Yankees most is—whether the “magnificent army,” which has been driven back upon Chattanooga, can succeed in staying there, or must go back and give up East Tennessee. To the Confederates the battle is a great achievement of arms; and a refutation to the world of the vainglorious boasts of the Federal Government and its oracles that defeats have weakened the determination of the people of the South to battle on for their independence to the “bitter end.”

The Confederates say that the continuous fire of their batteries has made it impossible for General Gilmore to plant his guns on Cumming's Point or Fort Wagner—that he complains of the inactivity and incompetency of the navy, and has a serious quarrel with Admiral Dahlgren, whose removal he has asked for from Washington, with the alternative of sending in his own resignation, and that in the interim he has suspended the siege. There is a fact confirmatory of this, that the latest accounts from Hilton Head state that the Federals have ceased firing. This waits for confirmation.

There is a notable example of the effrontery with which the cant of the blessings of Union, as carried to the South by Federal arms, is talked of, in the language with which the Philadelphia press of yesterday speaks of the battle at Chattanooga. The editor of the Press, Jno. W. Forney, is proprietor also of the Chronicle at Washington City. These two papers are more than any others in direct communication with President Lincoln; he is also Secretary of the Senate of the United States, and an oracle among the partisans of the Administration. Treating of that battle as a great triumph for the North, whether a victory or not, because it has got so far into the South to fight, he speaks of the Northern progress to that point in the following terms:—

Our armies stand in the centre of the South, and behind them, two happy States which they have wrested from rebellion and restored to loyalty and peace from the grandeur of our past achievements.

By the two “happy States” which have been rescued from the rebels and restored to loyalty and peace, he means, of course, Mississippi and Tennessee—the only Confederate States in which their troops have won victories. The “loyalty” of these States is witnessed by the fact that there is not a point in either of them where there is any professed Unionism which is capable of sustaining itself beyond the reach of Federal guns. Of their “peace” it may be said that wherever the Union troops are not in overwhelming force the Confederates swarm, and disappear only when pressed, to reappear again when the outposts or the marches of the invaders are to be harassed.

There are horrible accounts from the frontier between Kansas and Missouri. It is far out of the way of the main operations of the armies of the two Governments. The region is under the military administration of the United States, without a competing army of any strength within reach. The original animosities between Secessionism and Unionism there, have, in the absence of civil rule and the prevalence of military disorder, been aggravated by local excitements to a pitch of ferocity which would be beyond belief but for the convincing proofs which abound in well-authenticated forms. Armed bands of desperate and lawless men range throughout the country, under various designations, and burn and destroy, murder and pillage, without check by authority, military or civil, State or National. The question is no longer whether a man is for the Union, except he is for all the measures of emancipation, confiscation, and the arming of blacks, which the Administration has adopted, and all the personal glosses of extermination and robbery, which are added by its roving partisans. Whoever hesitates to give instant adhesion is summarily dealt with by the bullet or rope, his house burned, and his property carried off. The predatory bands who go about enforcing these Union tests, find easy grounds for suspicion when they want an excuse for violence; and more often work their will without the ceremony of an excuse. Resistance was made, of course; retaliation followed; men fought first for defence, then attacked for revenge, then doubtless are inflamed or starved into being plunderers in their turn, equally remorseless. The strife has spread through the two States, and has taken the character of internecine war at home, and warfare between the border inhabitants on either side, without respect to opinions. They burn each other houses and shoot and kill without mercy, like savages. A gang of “rebel” sympathisers, so-called, under a chief named Quantrell, lately sacked and burned the town of Lawrence in Kansas, under circumstances of great reported barbarity. It was a piece of bloody and unchristian retaliation for a long series of alleged outrages from Kansas, in Missouri. The populace of Kansas, headed by General James Lane, who is a brigadier-general in the United States service and Senator from Kansas in the United States Senate, met under the eyes of the United States commander of the Department, and deliberately determined to invade the State of Missouri, on their own account, and voted to lay waste and utterly devastate the whole tier of counties in Missouri along the Kansas line, to drive out or kill all the inhabitants, and make a desert of their territory, to be interposed as a protection to Kansas. This General and Senator Lane, in a frantic public speech, inciting his hearers to this bloody work, made a public boast of the fate he had bestowed on a citizen of Missouri—an avowed and notorious Unionist—for saying that in the event of the adoption by the Government of the exterminating policy of Abolitionism, his feelings would be with the South. “Where is he?” shouted one of the crowd. “In hell,” responded the ruffian. “I left him with his executioners.” This man's scheme of invasion has been organised, and the inroad on Missouri has already commenced. The Missouri papers are filled with accounts of plunderings and ravagings all along the border; but Lane is undisturbed, and continues to enjoy, as before, the favour of the President, of whom he is an intimate friend.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, October 6th.

THE Archduke has, as was foreseen, accepted the Mexican crown, for the reserves he makes are clearly understood to be merely formal expressions. The terms in which he spoke of the French Emperor have given great satisfaction here, and the second act in the historical drama of the regeneration of Mexico has thus been happily completed. The next will task the best energies of all the actors, if only one half be true of all that is said of the chronic state of society in that country. Wisely, the Archduke, in promising liberal institutions, reserves to himself the determination of when they are to be granted, at the same time that he invites all parties to hasten this epoch by forgetting past differences. He is expected at Compiègne about the end of the month, when the terms on which the French army of occupation will be maintained are to be settled. The new position taken by the Federal Government in America with regard to Mexico, as shown by the despatches from its Minister there, Mr. Corwin, has not attracted much comment in the French press, although the contents of the despatches have been published in most of the papers. These despatches were evidently prepared on instructions from Washington to afford a plausible excuse for recognising the new Government, in hopes of thus preventing an alliance between it and the Confederacy. For the moment the move seems successful, so far at least as can be judged from the language of the Mémorial Diplomatique of this week, which is believed to be in the confidence of the Foreign Minister here. This Mexican business has caused great anxiety and given great trouble to the French Government, and we may gather from the expressions used in reproducing the Tribune's article on the subject of Mr. Corwin's correspondence, that there is no wish here to take the initiative in any step which could lead to further complications.

The Mémorial does full justice to the absurdity of the report which sent Mr. Stephens on a diplomatic tour in Europe, and to the ignorance of those who know so little of the constitutional position of the Vice-President of the Confederacy, or of the power of the executive Government to interfere with the social laws of the various States. The theory of the American Constitution, that of North and South being in this respect similar, is so foreign to European ideas that we have to remind ourselves perpetually that the Central Government possesses only delegated and limited powers. It may be instructive for those who have been led by the declamations of the Northern press and its revolutionary compeers in Europe to believe that the question of Emancipation has really any interest for them except as a catch-word, to see how the Siecle treats the report that Mr. Stephens was empowered to make a treaty containing a clause in favour of abolition.

The English papers announce that Mr. Stephens, the Vice-President of the Confederate States, is expected in Paris, furnished with full powers to conclude a treaty with the French Government containing a clause for the abolition of slavery. If he comes to Paris with this intention, we believe that Mr. Stephens will return as he came. The time for recognising the South, if there ever was one, is past. By arming the negroes and speaking of emancipation, the South only proves that it has exhausted all means of resistance, nor can concessions thus wrung from it in extremis conciliate the sympathy of liberals in Europe or elsewhere. The South, in the struggle which it has begun and carried on with such obstinacy, has certainly proved its bravery, but this bravery will not suffice to obtain pardon for the blow it has inflicted on a constitution which was the admiration and hope of the friends of liberty. In refusing every compromise only to proclaim the abolition of slavery on the ruins of its principal cities, the South has shown itself headstrong rather than heroic. It will fall without exciting a feeling of admiration, or even of pity.

The day after this was written the same paper was obliged to print the despatches which prove that the South, caring little for its admiration, is in no need of the pity it would refuse; and the Mémorial, having characterised those who accepted the story of Mr. Stephens' mission as having merely fanciful notions about American institutions, both in North and South, makes a volte-face, and says: “However fanciful may be our notions about Mr. Davis's Government, we never pushed fancy to the extreme of believing that he either wished or was able to abolish slavery.” Such contradictions are the best proof how little such writers have at heart the emancipation on which alone they now found their advocacy of the North, while the treatment of the unhappy blacks who, in Louisiana, have fallen under the sway of their Northern allies, is the best evidence how undesirable for the slaves themselves such emancipation would be.

The Polish question daily fills less space in the greater number of the Paris papers. It has afforded matter for long and passionate controversy, and has now served its turn. Beyond the limits of the great towns, Poland excites no sympathy. The lovers of order have no affection for either party in the struggle; for, if the revolutionary element becomes daily more menacing in Poland, they cannot forget that the most destructively and systematically revolutionary Government in the world is, and always has been, that of Russia.

Denmark and Prussia furnish the occasion for paragraphs which only prove how little interest is here felt on either subject. Denmark has been so long threatened that no one believes in the “federal execution,” and the Germans have shown themselves so incapable of conducting a political struggle that, however earnest the Prussian people may now be, no one gives them credit for practically vindicating their rights. Some of the French papers regard the Crown Prince's visit to England as a respectful protest against his father's present acts, and perhaps as a means of escaping the catastrophe which may await him.

There was a great fête in the Champ de Mars on Sunday, to see the first ascension of Nadar's giant balloon, a description of which you have, doubtless, by this time seen in the London papers. Some 20,000 people surrounded the balloon, looking like a mere handful in the vast space, on the outside of which a crowd probably ten times as great was assembled. The boulevards were deserted, and all the holiday folk seemed to have rendez-vous'd at the Champ de Mars.

Paris is filling rapidly. All the Ministers have returned to their posts excepting M. Billaut, who has been dangerously ill, and is only now recovering. The Emperor is expected this evening at St. Cloud, with the Prince Imperial, the Empress having taken a long route by sea, coasting the peninsula to pay a visit to the young Queen of Portugal, and inhale the balmy breezes of her native Spain before encountering the fatigues of the winter campaign. The excursion was the result of a sudden determination, unsuspected by the Court till the eve of her departure. She is not expected here for ten days.

RECENT PROMOTIONS.—Among the recent promotions in the Confederate army are the following:—Colonel H. W. Allen, of Louisiana, to be Brigadier-General, to rank from August 19; Colonel C. A. Rattle, of Alabama, to rank as Brigadier-General, from August 20; Colonel William A. Quarles, of Tennessee, to rank as Brigadier-General, from August 25; Colonel Goode Bryan, of Georgia, and Colonel W. H. Kirkland, of North Carolina, to rank as Brigadier-Generals, from August 29; Colonel Robert D. Johnson, of North Carolina, to rank as Brigadier-General, from September 1; Colonel M. C. Butler, of South Carolina, and Colonel William C. Wickham, of Virginia, to be Brigadier-Generals of cavalry, from September 1.

EARL RUSSELL IN SCOTLAND.—Earl Russell has availed himself of the opportunity presented to him by a small circle of Scotch admirers to deliver a speech on his own life in general, and his present policy as Foreign Minister in particular. . . . Our immediate interest is in what he says about the great struggle going on in America. And, in reading his speech, we are particularly impressed with two features in it. The first is, the apologetic tone he adopts throughout. The Foreign Secretary seems to labour under the conviction that certain parties have been watching him with suspicion and anxiety; and he is desirous, above all things, of convincing them that their surmises are utterly groundless. Thus, his self-vindication is addressed almost exclusively to the partisans of the North. Indeed, for the South he has not a single encouraging word. Their gallantry in battle, the prescience and power of their statesmanship, and the determination and intensity of their patriotism are nothing to him. On Mr. Sumner he can waste whole paragraphs of expostulation; but President Davis he treats with silent contempt. He deprecates in really eloquent language a war between England and America, but the question of the relations between England and the Confederate States is too insignificant to claim his notice even for a single moment. His talk about “justice,” to which he has evidently endeavoured to give a tone almost of Ministerial sublimity, is addressed, not to the combatants as such, on equal terms, but to the North, which is perpetually manifesting a peevish and childish irritability with which, for ourselves, we grew irreclaimably disgusted a long time since. In short, the entire purport of the noble earl's address was to convince Mr. Lincoln that Great Britain would do everything it could to further his schemes, short of fighting for him; and that he had not only the sympathies, but the timid and suppliant devotion of the English Government. This he evidently, with a characteristic Yankee twist in his logic, regards as neutrality.—Sunday Times.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER, Oct. 7.

THE prediction with which some weeks ago I opened this correspondence, is in a fair way of being fulfilled by the event. The flagrantly unpatriotic conduct of the Union and Emancipation Society, of which—in an evil hour for his political hopes—Mr. T. B. Potter consented to act as President, has at length forced the would-be re-employers of Lancashire labour, to speak out and to make their people's cause their own. For this seeming partisan turn of affairs in favour of the Confederacy, the Northern factionists here must be held to be entirely responsible. If there had been no Union and Emancipation Society, there had been no Southern Independence Association. And the former body, which—grievously to the honourable gentleman's discredit—has recently enlisted Mr. Forster in its service, will probably rue the day it constituted itself the un-English exponent and advocate of a "warm neutrality." The agitation they have so disloyally taught us we are now called to execute in turn, and it will be in mere self-defence if we better the instruction.

A large and most influential meeting of our leading merchants and manufacturers was held on Monday at the Clarence Hotel. The ostensible purpose of the gathering was to unite certain independent Southern societies here, but the real object was undoubtedly to give expression to the feelings of the vast majority of all classes in Lancashire upon the subject of the American war. Lord Wharncliffe, as President-elect of the newly constituted association, took the chair at that important meeting, and certainly the thanks of all of us, whether we belong to the represented or unrepresented classes, are due to his lordship for the manly and outspoken way in which he defined the principles and objects of the great movement he has taken upon himself to lead. His speech—which I have the pleasure of forwarding herewith for publication—though brief for so large a subject, was eminently comprehensive. His lordship's view of the real objects and bearings of the war approved itself to the reasonable convictions of all who knew him, while the unhesitating avowal of his opinion as to the right of that "gallant and distinguished nation" to be recognised by the great powers of Europe, was welcomed with the most enthusiastic cheering. Nor was his lordship less successful in dealing with that sickening portion of the subject, known as the "slavery aspect" of the war. Of course we are all agreed that slavery is an evil, but some few of us seem disposed to forget that many evils are worse than slavery. For instance, it is worse than slavery, and better worth going to war about, that a great nation should be a great bully. It is also worse than slavery when we find it is no thanks to Abraham Lincoln that some millions of slaves have not been incited to massacre the undefended women and children on their masters' estates. But worst of all is it when a base attempt is made to trade upon England's cherished sympathy for the bondman, and to steal from us on that account, by the aid and complicity of some who should not stoop to such dishonour, a sham appearance of support of the most detestable and unjustifiable war ever permitted to be waged against a gallant people.

It is, however, worthy of remark, that Lord Wharncliffe's arguments were in the main in the interests of peace. In any event, argued his lordship, with or without recognition of the South, the North should be bound over to keep the peace. Without recognition and upon the unimaginable supposition that the North could succeed in subjugating the South, the Northern armies would have more than they could do to hold the territory they have yet to conquer. On the other hand, with recognition, the North would be all unable to bear up against the massive moral pressure of European opinion. War, on the part of the North, would mean not merely war with England, but with England and France; and the bare risk of a war even with the latter Power alone was "a contingency which no sane American could contemplate with complacency." The least, however, that would have to be done before such a "contingency" could be reckoned possible, would be for the civil Government at Washington to place a good deal more confidence in itself than it has been able to do heretofore. The mere shadow, ere now, of a temporary military success has been enough to scare the Federal officials with the presage of downfall. They have confessed, before this, their contemptible weakness on that point, and that, too, in a way in which, but for the fortunate lack of repeated opportunities, they would have confessed it oftener. Any military servant had only to be a likely man to go near winning a battle, to be cashiered for his popularity with the army. But, at all events, the civil masters at Washington are entitled to all the consolation they can extract from the chance that, probably, their places will not again be jeopardised for a while in the same peculiar fashion. The hour, indeed, for an armed despotism at the White House has struck long ago, if only the man were forthcoming to command the necessary preliminary success in the field.

But humouring a moment the supposition that the North may seek to snatch a desperate safety in a foreign war, then, Lord Wharncliffe argued, the first blow and the hardest one would be struck against us in Canada. In that event, our best hopes of conquering a speedy peace from the Yankees would be centred in our close and hearty amity with the Confederacy. Our interest, therefore, are at one with our sympathies. The Southern States would thus find work for the enemy's land forces, while our iron-clads could be safely left to yield their own account at sea. Failing such a bond of union with the South, the consequences could not be contemplated but with horror. During no portion of his lordship's address was the enthusiasm more striking than when he handled that supposed case. The idea of Canada being given up a prey to hordes of hirelings, officered, in at least some instances, by ruffians with no touch of honour, truth, or pity, roused his lordship to more eloquence than he is usually given to. And this frightful peril forthwith, was to be incurred for the sake of the most unchivalrous people on the face of the earth,—a people who have no sense of the noble spirit of warfare—no notion of those recognised amenities which soften even the rugged profession of arms, and the practice of which has become a habit with European nations after centuries of gallant strife.

But, after all, without undervaluing the importance of the address from the noble President, I must say that the pith and full meaning of the meeting would be better got at from the speeches of the Manchester men themselves. These were not the set speeches of people with a professional turn for local political oratory, but the involuntary expressions of the leading representatives of the business interests of the city. To say that these gentlemen's names are scarcely known, except on 'change, is almost to define their character and influence: while the same fact is eloquent of the honourable reluctance with which they have stepped out of their privacy to meet the necessity of the time. As their speeches were not reported in the Manchester press, it may not be out of place if I give a brief summary of one or two of them from my private notes.

Mr. T. H. Birley said they would not be holding a meeting of that unusual character, if it were not to protect themselves against a society in Manchester, called the Union and Emancipation Society. It was indeed high time that some steps should be taken to disabuse the public mind—and notably the mind of one of our statesmen—of the condition and tendency of public feeling in England. The association which had been inaugurated that day, ought, under the circumstances, to have been established long ago, for he believed such an association would express the opinion of the large majority throughout the country. They all knew that the only argument advanced by the Union people in Manchester, was the much abused argument of slavery. That was not the place to speak of the hollow pretensions of the Federal Government,—or rather of its friends in England,—in making this an anti-slavery war; nor was their any need to remark that the slave was not likely to form any very elevated notion of liberty when he found it offered to him by fire and sword. Surely, not even the Union and Emancipation Society would come forward and recommend that more life should be lost in administering that kind of freedom. He did not think the members of that society would be disposed to fight in such a cause themselves, and they ought not to recommend that course to others. With regard to Lincoln's emancipation proclamation, the author of it had said that if it was illegal, it was worthless. Well, it was not only illegal, and therefore worthless, but, as Lincoln himself wrote to his friends, it was known to be illegal, and was intended to be worthless. The object of the Southern Independence Association was clearly defined. It was to protect themselves against misrepresentations calculated at once to bring Manchester into disgrace, and to be made use of to the disadvantage of a struggling nation. With regard to the desired accomplishment of recognition, he believed it was but a work of time. The ministry discredited the notion that the South could ever be subjugated, and he believed they were only waiting for the proper opportunity to recognise them as an independent nation.

Mr. E. Hardcastle, after referring to topics in the foregoing speech, regretted that the society was not formed at an earlier period of the struggle. If any apology were needed, other than that of self-defence, for the establishment of such an association, it would be found in the proved necessity for doing something to correct Earl Russell's mis-statement at Blairgowrie; and since so much time had been lost in forming their society, they ought to be grateful to the Foreign Minister for the occasion and the spur his lordship had just given. That opportunity would give point to the movement. It was incumbent upon all who thought Earl Russell in error to bear witness accordingly. Mr. Forster, in his speech at Leeds, had stated that the upper classes at all events were in favour of the South, so that Earl Russell could not have derived his misconception from those of his own rank. It remained, therefore, to show his lordship that the opinions of the "working classes" were not represented by the Union and Emancipation Society.

Lieut.-Colonel Jackson, of one of our distinguished rifle regiments, said many persons supposed that Earl Russell was not unwilling to apply to Parliament for an alteration of the law affecting ship-building for belligerents. He had seen it stated in the press that such an inference could be legitimately drawn from the words of the Foreign Minister. If for nothing else, the Southern Independence Association would be of use in protesting against such a flagrant breach of the spirit and letter of our laws. When the famous steam-rauns were building in Mr. Laird's dock-yards, the Union and Emancipation people wrote to Earl Russell, and his lordship in reply was understood to say that if the present act was not sufficient to meet the case, it would be desirable to extend it. He (Lieut.-Colonel Jackson) thought they should lose no time in letting Earl Russell know that the country would not tolerate such an outrage upon the law of the land.

Mr. James Spence also made a stirring speech, but I need not draw more fully upon my notes to give the readers of "THE INDEX" a faithful reflex of the highly important meeting under consideration.

EXPLODED FALLACIES.

(From the New York World of September 23.)

If the torpedoes manufactured at the South have failed to explode, the fallacies at the North have met with more success. They have gone off one after the other, and have done infinite damage to—ourselves.

The first fallacy was that the South was not in earnest, that a great game of brag was being played; the next was that it was in earnest indeed, but that it was in a pet, and that a careful inattention, a severe letting alone, were only needed to bring the spoiled child to its senses; the third was that it was a mere bully, and would not fight; the fourth that it could be starved within three months into abject submission. When it was proved by events that it considered itself deeply wronged, that it was in earnest, that it would fight, and could not be starved, the new fallacy of a real Union majority, kept under by the superior ability and admirable management of a daring and organised minority, took the place of those others which had been blown into fragments so fine that no piece could be seen by the naked eye. We have had the opportunity, by the favour of Heaven, of testing this theory, and it is just as much a soap-bubble as the others. In his last letter the President endeavours to draw a distinction between the people and the military power, which possibly his own experience may make familiar to him, but which we do not believe in. If the majority of people in the loyal States were, willing to recognize secession, it would be recognized in spite of the army; if the majority of the people in the Southern States were willing to give up secession, the Confederacy would fall to pieces in spite of its armies. Take North Carolina, for instance; if a majority of its population chose, it might be represented in the next Congress. It would violate no faith in quitting the Confederacy; that is, no contract, for the voluntary principle is the principle of existence of that organisation. Its will is not controlled by troops, for there are none there except those in face of an enemy. Louisiana and Tennessee present the same case, with still greater opportunities. Wherever Union troops have been is the feeling more or less hostile to the Union? Has Virginia even whimpered, scoured as she has been for two years by the presence of two immense armies?

In the face of these facts how utterly idle it is to talk of the Southern States being controlled by Davis and a few men of his personal and political antecedents. A few men never control in the United States, nor in any part of them. The power so far lies in the people, and individuals are utterly powerless except as their representatives. This being the case, we have not only to create armies to crush the military power of the rebellion, but we have to address the interests and reason of the people who supply those armies. The first argument and the best and the only argument we can address to them must be:—You will be better off as citizens of the United States than as citizens of the Confederacy; equally well off so far as your local self-government is concerned, equally well off so far as your freedom from taxation is concerned; equally well off so far as pride is concerned; and better off as belonging to a great commonwealth instead of to a small commonwealth. We are of the same blood and the same bone; we have the same language, the same religious faiths; we have the same love of liberty, the same habits of thought. We can do each other infinite damage; we can be to each other of incalculable advantage. How much wiser to walk arm-in-arm than to stand aiming at each other's lives.

How can we say this—how can one population speak to the other? Only through elections. The present Administration and its party represent eternal agitation. To continue that dynasty means not simply to continue a war against secession, but a war against slavery. The first is a merely political, the last a social war. Of course, the people of the United States are entitled to the luxury of just as much war as they are willing to die in and pay for; but they are also entitled to have the question fully and fairly presented to them, and of discriminate in their choice between the two characters of war.

WELCOME TO THE REV. H. W. BEECHER.

An "Enquirer" writes to the Manchester Guardian on this subject as follows:—

SIR,—I see from an advertisement in your paper, and from placards plentifully pasted on the walls of this city, that a meeting is to be held in the Free-trade Hall on Friday the 9th October next, to "welcome" the Reverend Henry Ward Beecher on his first public appearance in this country. Can you, or any of your numerous readers, inform me whether this is the same Reverend Mr. Beecher who, at a meeting in America during the discussion of the Trent affair, said:—"That the best blood of England must flow as an atonement for the outrage England had perpetrated on America"? If it is the same reverend gentleman, what sort of a "welcome" is he deserving of by this country?—I am, sir, respectfully yours,

MANCHESTER, 2nd October, 1863.

THE CAROLINE GOODYEAR.—A correspondent of the New York World, writing from the Grand Hotel, Paris, under date of September 2, gives the following account of the Caroline Goodyear case, which forms probably the occasion for the anticipated collision between the French and Federal gunboats at the mouth of the Rio Grande:—"The case of the Caroline Goodyear, captured by a French vessel of war off the mouth of the Rio Grande, is going to bring a nine question before the French Government. The Caroline Goodyear cleared from England for Matamoros, laden with arms and munitions of war. At the mouth of the Rio Grande she was seized by the French, under the suspicion of being laden with contraband articles destined to 'aid and comfort' the Mexicans in their war against France, and was towed down to Vera Cruz. After careful examination of the ship's papers the French authorities decided that they had got 'the wrong pig by the ear,' and prepared to let her go; but a Federal cruiser that chanced to be hovering near got wind of the affair, and threatened to pounce upon the game as soon as the French released it. Having escaped Scylla only to run into the mouth of Charybdis, the captain of the Goodyear demanded of his captors that they should convoy him back to the place where they found him. This reasonable demand, it is presumed, was acceded to by the gallant Frenchman. But now comes up a claim for 'interest, costs, and damages,' for delays, loss of market, and, perhaps, loss of battles for the want of the very items kept back by French interference! As the case is pending, it would not be proper to make further disclosures. If, however, it can be established that the ship and cargo were English property, then there will be no difficulty in making out the claim for indemnity. But suppose this should turn out to be a Confederate venture—the goods purchased by a Confederate citizen and destined for the Confederate Government? What then? Can France indemnify without recognising the Confederacy? As you will hear more of this curious case, I will not stop to argue it."

Chicamanga Creek.

ONE of the great battles which were foreshadowed in our impression of last week has taken place, and the result is a great and decisive victory of the Confederate army of Tennessee. Without wishing to exaggerate its importance, or magnifying it into the critical struggle of the war, we shall probably be correct in assigning to it an importance, on the American continent and in Europe, scarcely second to that of the Confederate triumphs on the Chickahominy. The State of Tennessee was the weak point of the Confederacy. When the defences of the Cumberland and Tennessee Rivers yielded to the armies of invasion, the whole of Western Tennessee was easily overrun, and the Federals had secured a position almost in the heart of the South, whence their forces, easily provisioned and reinforced, could strike at all her most vital points; and it is strikingly suggestive of the want of capacity or want of means amongst the Federals that, after occupying Nashville, and having full control of the Cumberland River for twelve months, they should only now for the first time have hazarded an advance into Eastern Tennessee. The possession of this portion of the State is of immense importance to either belligerent. Through it runs the main line of communication between Richmond and the south-west. The Switzerland of the South, in the hands of the Federals it would speedily become, as it were, an impregnable and gigantic citadel, where armies might securely rendezvous and concentrate for the invasion of Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia. Apart from obvious political reasons for defending Richmond, it may even be doubted if the capital of the Confederacy is of such intrinsic strategic value to the South as this hilly region of Tennessee, which is to the States adjoining its eastern frontier almost what Savoy is to Piedmont. It is not to be wondered at, then, that the news of the abandonment of Chattanooga, and of the safe progress of Burnside's army, raised considerable exultation in the North. Chattanooga reached, even Rosecrans seems to have lost his usual discretion. Hitherto all his steps had been taken with remarkable caution. But the weak defence of Tullahoma, the plausible tales of deserters, and the subsequent evacuation of Chattanooga without a struggle, seem to have led him into the fatal blunder of utterly underrating the forces opposed to him—a blunder which he has expiated by a most disastrous and irretrievable defeat.

In our last number we described the movements and the positions of the two armies; and events justified our estimate of the "situation" almost earlier than we had anticipated. On the 19th ult. the Confederates under General Bragg became the assailants. Rosecrans had by that time learnt his error, and endeavoured to make the best of it by concentrating his troops in a strong position on the slope of a chain of hills at Chicamanga Creek, some seventeen miles south-east of Chattanooga. Of the strength of the army under his command we cannot speak with any certainty. His force, with that of General Burnside, was computed by Northern correspondents at about 100,000 men. It is probable that on the day of battle he had in position between 60,000 and 70,000 men. Bragg's army of Tennessee had been strengthened by reinforcements from Mississippi, Alabama, and South Carolina, but was still numerically inferior to that of his opponent; and it speaks highly for the gallantry of the Confederate soldiers, and the skill and enterprise of their commander, that they should have successfully attacked so fine an army as Rosecrans commanded, posted in a country so easily defensible. The battle, like most of the great engagements of this war, lasted two days. It began at mid-day on the 19th. It terminated with the retreat, almost the rout of the Federals, on the night of the 20th. We are even now without any precise and trustworthy details of the fighting. The Federal press has by this time acquired a wholesome horror of supplying "contraband" war news, and the earlier accounts of the engagements bear obvious impress of Federal supervision. But no manipulation of the correspondence can make the affair appear otherwise than as a decisive Federal reverse. The reports differ as to the first day's battle. Some accounts report it as a mere demonstration or reconnaissance in force; others state it to have been an obstinately contested battle. The latter seems to be the true version. It would appear that the attack was made along the whole line with that dashing gallantry that has always distinguished the Confederate advances, and that the Federal centre was pierced, the right thrown back, the left, under General Thomas, which appears to have held entrenched ground, alone retaining its position, so that at one time the Confederate left was almost at right angles with the rest of the line. An eye-witness of the battle, writing to a New York paper, admits a decided defeat on the first day; and there seems to be no doubt that a considerable portion of the Federal army was driven from the field of battle, and that it was solely to the stubborn resistance of General Thomas, reinforced by every available man of the reserve, that Rosecrans owed his escape from total defeat on the 19th. Even on that day Bragg had captured twenty cannon and a large number of prisoners, and the results on the whole were decidedly in his favour. The Federal accounts of captured cannon and prisoners were mere inventions; the artillery they took being only recaptures of their own guns, which the Confederates had not time to secure. On the 20th the battle was renewed, the Confederates again being the assailants, and attacking on both the enemy's flanks. According to Federal correspondence the defeat was complete and even disgraceful. The two wings appear to have given way before the first onslaught, and again it was left to General Thomas to sustain the honour of the Federal army. One correspondent says, "The first charge of the Confederates broke their lines, routed their entire divisions and drove them in disgraceful panic into Rossville and Chattanooga." All accounts agree as to the fact that the retreat was conducted in great disorder, and that the troops were utterly disorganised. General Thomas's division, assisted by some others which rallied round his entrenchments, is reported to have held his ground against every attack until nightfall, and then to have fallen back upon Rossville. The result of the two days' engagements are thus modestly and characteristically summed up by the Confederate general:—"The enemy retreated on Chattanooga last night, leaving his dead and wounded in our hands. His loss is very large in men, artillery, small arms, and colours. Ours is heavy, but not yet ascertained. The victory is complete, and our cavalry is pursuing. With the blessing of God, our troops have accomplished great results against greatly superior numbers." Fifty cannon, 10,000 killed, wounded, and prisoners, and an immense amount of material are the admitted losses of the Federals. The Confederacy has to mourn another heavy list of casualties; 5,000 killed and wounded, amongst these several of the most promising officers, being the terrible price she has paid for this glorious victory over the invader.

The consequences of the battle may be most serious to the Federals. We pointed out last week the difficulties and dangers of the armies of Rosecrans and Burnside marching through a hostile territory, at an enormous distance from their bases of operations, and separated from each other by a hilly country, through which at all times the progress of a large army must necessarily be exceedingly slow. Rosecrans' army has been beaten, and will in all probability be compelled to retire from the line of the Tennessee. Burnside's army, a smaller force, is in still greater peril. It was reported that Confederate troops had already marched to attack him on his march through the mountains, and a rumour was current that his whole force had surrendered. This is, doubtless, premature. But it is certain that only a rapid retreat or an immediate junction with Rosecrans will save him. The latter is plainly unable to leave Chattanooga. Burnside had lost 300 men near Knoxville, and had been repulsed with loss at Zollicoffer. He had in front of him a Confederate corps sufficiently strong to work him great harm, if not effectually to arrest his advance. It will be quite in accordance with Confederate tactics if a dash is made upon Burnside's isolated army, and another Confederate victory follows fast upon the battle at Chicamanga Creek. For Burnside, at any rate, there is no possibility of reinforcement, whatever facility may exist for strengthening Rosecrans. It is said that portions of Grant's army had already arrived at Chattanooga. But this can hardly be true. A fortnight would be required for any considerable force to reach Chattanooga from Memphis; and unless General Sherman's division had been on the march in anticipation of disaster, it could not have reached Rosecrans at the latest date of which we have intelligence from his army. But all that we know of the Federal programme negatives this supposition. Rosecrans advanced as if to an assured victory. At Washington it was believed that Bragg's army had ceased to exist; the armies under Burnside and Rosecrans were thought to be ample for the conquest and occupation of Eastern Tennessee. Here again the Federals have bitterly paid for their rash confidence in their own strength. Their finest army under their best general has been grievously defeated, and is in imminent danger of destruction. Their hold upon Tennessee and Kentucky is rudely shaken; the prestige of their success on the Mississippi is gone. The South has again proved that on anything like equal terms it is far more than a match for the invader, and that the work of subjugation is more hopeless than ever. What can any honest man in the North expect when in this the third year of the war the great armies of invasion in the West, instead of advancing, are anxiously looking out for means of escape; and when any day the electric wire may flash the ominous news to Washington, that General Lee, with a force numerically not very inferior to the Federal army of the Potomac, but in courage, in discipline, in organisation ten times its superior, has once more become the assailant on that Virginian soil that has never yet witnessed a Confederate defeat?

The Blockade.

WE published in our last week's impression an official statement, duly authenticated, of the number of vessels that had entered the port of Bermuda from the "blockaded" port of Wilmington during a certain period, and also similar statistics, copied from the Charleston Courier, of the arrivals in Charleston and Wilmington during the first seven months of this year. During the whole of that time these ports have been under blockade; during a portion of that time an iron-clad squadron was actually attacking Charleston by sea; and nevertheless it appears that the number of vessels which succeeded in entering Wilmington between the beginning of January and the end of July was forty-nine, while the number that made their way into Charleston, within the same period, was forty-three. In fact, the trade of those two ports is more active now than in time of peace; while the vessels captured bear no comparison in number and value with those that pass in safety through the blockading squadrons. The Confederate Government carries on its communications with Europe, not, indeed, in perfect security, but with very rare and unimportant interruptions. We receive, as our readers know, our files of Southern newspapers with as much regularity as could well be expected in war time, even if the ports were open, seeing that the regular mail traffic must in any case be suspended by the ordinary risks of capture. Arms, cannon, supplies of all sorts, reach the Confederate Government, paying but an insignificant toll to the enemy in the shape of occasional captures. And in the face of facts like these, two questions irresistibly force themselves upon the consideration of English observers. First, Ought we to acknowledge the validity of this blockade? Second, Who bears the real burden of the mischief it inflicts?

First, it can hardly be contended that neutrals are entitled, in default of stipulations to the contrary, to recognise an invalid blockade. To allow an advantage of this kind to one party is essentially an act of unfriendliness to the other. If, for example, we allowed Confederate cruisers to capture Federal vessels within our own jurisdiction, it would be admitted on all hands, and noisily asserted by the Federalists, that we were committing a distinct violation of neutrality: nay, it is all but certain that such a neglect of duty would be considered by the Federal Government a casus belli. Now, how does this case differ from that of acknowledging an illegal blockade—that is, allowing the Federal cruisers to capture goods destined for the Confederate States, not indeed in our waters, but in vessels bearing our flag, and as much under our protection and jurisdiction, while they commit no act withdrawing them therefrom, as our own shores? How would the law stand independently of a blockade? Suppose the United States at war with France on account of Mexico: should we be justified in stopping supplies, not contraband of war, destined for a Mexican port, while within our own jurisdiction? Assuredly not; and what we could not do ourselves we could not give a belligerent leave to do; that is, we could not, without giving cause of remonstrance to France, allow the United States to seize such supplies under our flag on the high seas. But to tolerate an invalid blockade is to allow this very proceeding. Or, to put the matter in another form, we could not ourselves, without a breach of neutrality, forbid or impose disabilities on the trade of British subjects with the Confederate States. We cannot, therefore, give to the Federal Government any right or permission to do this, except in such cases and under such conditions as, by international law, entitle them to do it. But the only case in which, by international law, they are entitled to interfere with any neutral trade not contraband of war, is the case of a valid blockade. Therefore, in allowing them to stop our trade with the Confederate States under colour of an invalid blockade, we are committing a breach of neutrality of just the same kind as would be a prohibition, enforced by our own Government, of all trade with New York or Boston.

It is tolerably clear that, even by what may be called the common law of nations, the present blockade of the Confederate ports is illegal; that is to say, that every capture of a neutral vessel not carrying contraband of war is a wrong to the neutral, and every sufferance of such wrong by a Power strong enough to prevent it is an injustice towards the Confederacy. We hardly think that any jurist of old would have pronounced in favour of the validity of a blockade which was evaded by three vessels out of four. It is quite true that modern maritime science has greatly facilitated the evasion of blockades enforced on the old plan; but this is no excuse for the inefficiency of such blockades. It is the business of Powers pretending to institute a blockade to send such ships, and such a number of ships, as will suffice to enforce it at the time and place when and where it is actually declared to exist; and it is in vain for the Federal Government to send worn-out or antiquated vessels to lie off a Southern port, and then affirm that port to be blockaded, because, a hundred years ago, such vessels might have really been able to prevent ingress or egress.

But all speculations on this point are rendered unnecessary by the existence of stipulations, in express words and expressly accepted by all parties concerned, which define, for the present purpose, the validity of a blockade. Treaties and conventions, formal or informal, are the statutes of international law; and there is such a statute applicable to the present war by which this question of blockade must be decided. England and France invited both the American belligerents to accept, as the rules by which their maritime operations during the present war were to be conducted, the three last articles of the Treaty of Paris on the subject, and those articles were accepted. During the present war, therefore, a valid blockade is one "maintained by a force sufficient actually to prevent access to the blockaded port." As there is not the least pretence on any part that the blockade of the Southern ports fulfils this definition; as, in point of fact, even during the present siege of Charleston access has not been prevented; as the blockading squadrons have actually confessed their own inefficiency by the outrageous threat to sink blockade-runners in future instead of attempting to capture them, there remains no possible plea by which we can pretend to avert the conclusion that we are tolerating a blockade which, by express agreement between ourselves and the belligerents, is invalid.

It may be that the fourth article of the Convention is in itself absurd, inasmuch as it imposes an impossible condition. But that does not release from their obligation those who voluntarily became parties to it. The Confederates might as well plead that they had been guilty of a stupendous folly in agreeing not to capture enemy's goods under a neutral flag, and proceed to treat that engagement as void. If a man or nation promises not to do a particular act except in a particular manner, and that particular manner of doing it proves impracticable, the promise is not thereby annulled; it simply becomes a promise to abstain altogether from the act in question. Above all, when a special exception is made to the general law of nations and the natural liberty of trade—as is the whole law of belligerent rights—it is essential that such an exception be construed as strictly as possible against him in whose favour it is made; and therefore no claim on the part of the Federal Government for a lax construction of the restrictions imposed on blockades by the engagements to which it is itself a party, can on any account be tolerated.

Lord Russell was not a member of the Cabinet which accepted the Convention of Paris; and he may possibly consider the whole bargain a bad one. He may think that we were over-reached, and have been beguiled into the surrender of rights essential to our position as a maritime Power. He may be right in this view. But he is bound by the acts of his predecessors, which are the acts of his Sovereign; and if he were not he would certainly be bound by his own. It was by him that the concurrence of the American belligerents in these articles was obtained; and he is the last man in the world who can claim the right to substitute for the most important of them an arbitrary declaration of his own. He may be right or he may be wrong in saying that by the general law of nations a blockade is valid if an "evident danger" exist in entering or leaving the place which is said to be blockaded; but when he pretends to substitute this extravagantly wide definition for the very strict one supplied by the Parisian articles he is guilty of an act which would be unpardonably treacherous if it were not outrageously impudent. We doubt whether any more shameless breach of public faith has ever been committed by the Minister of a Christian Power; certainly no English statesman except Lord Russell could have ventured on so barefaced and so monstrous an evasion of his plighted word. It is vain to suppose that anything has been gained thereby. So far as the present moment is concerned, we have only postponed a quarrel which might as well have occurred now as at the future but not distant period which may best suit the convenience of our implacable enemy. And the statesman must be weak indeed who imagines that even America will ever allow us to plead the precedent set by our own timidity in this case, in bar of our clear and distinct engagements under the treaty of 1856. To acknowledge the pretended blockade of the Confederate ports is to subject ourselves to present injury without the hope of future profit, and to do grievous wrong to our friends without the slightest chance of conciliating those who are not less the enemies of England than of the Confederate States.

2. Who suffers by the blockade? No doubt it inflicts inconvenience both on the blockaded people and on those who used to trade with them. But which party loses most by the suspension of that trade? To which was it most necessary? and which has the greatest power within itself of providing substitutes for all it formerly received from the other?

Europe, it is clear, could dispense with everything she once received from the South, except cotton. On cotton depended the bread of hundreds of thousands of industrious families, and the trade of vast districts. In the manufacture of cotton some eighty millions sterling were invested in England alone; and the suspension of the cotton supply not merely suspended the productive power of this vast capital, but actually doomed it to gradual and by no means slow dilapidation. And experience has shown us that it is utterly impossible to provide within any reasonable time from any other source an adequate substitute for the intercepted supply of cotton from the South.

On the other hand, the South received from abroad chiefly commodities of two sorts—luxuries, and goods required by the producers of cotton. With luxuries she has dispensed; her people have learned to forego the use of coffee, and tea, and wine, and even of ice. The producers of cotton have turned their hands to other trades, and have contrived to produce substitutes for all the necessary articles which were formerly imported, either from the Northern States or from countries foreign to both. Manufactures have sprung up rapidly, under the protection given by the blockade; the negroes are made to grow corn instead of cotton; no one suffers, by reason of the blockade, from any want of occupation, and now that a good harvest has crowned the exertions of the people no one is likely to suffer for want of necessaries. The war, with its tremendous expenditure and its fearful waste of life, is undoubtedly a severe affliction to the people of the Confederate States; but by the blockade they suffer nothing that a people fighting for independence may not cheerfully endure.

Again, the blockade is ineffective as against the Confederate Government. It raises the cost of getting arms and other supplies, but only to a comparatively trifling extent. And it must be remembered that the acknowledgment of the blockade has no effect here. These supplies are contraband of war, and would be seized, blockade or no blockade, wherever the enemy could find them. But as against England the blockade is effective, and it is our acknowledgment which gives it all its efficiency. Cotton is too bulky an article to be brought away in large quantities by vessels of the class suited for a contraband trade—swift sailing ships and steamers of light draught. The presence of a Federal squadron, however inefficient, with the name of a blockade, off the Southern ports, is sufficient to preclude the export of a commodity which contains so little value in so vast a bulk. But it is only because we acknowledge the existence of a blockade, eo nomine, that British ships carrying in goods not contraband of war, and exporting cotton, can be touched at all. If our Government were to declare, what has been proved to be the fact, that the blockade is invalid, the capture of any such vessels by the Federal cruisers would become a casus belli. It is our consent alone which enables the Government of the United States to close our mills and starve our operatives; it is by the voluntary submission of our Government to proceedings which are not in accordance with law that the trade of Lancashire has been annihilated, and its population pauperized.

We have answered the two questions raised by the blockade-running statistics. We have shown that the recognition of the blockade is an act of partiality towards the North, and therefore a wrong towards the Confederate States. We have shown that the blockade inflicts far more injury on us than on the South, and that, whereas the South suffers chiefly by the presence of the enemy's ships, independently of their legal position, we suffer simply by their acknowledged privileges as a blockading squadron—privileges to which they are not justly entitled. In a word, the present course of our Government in this matter is at once a folly and a crime; a departure from neutrality, to the injury of the Confederate States; and a source of loss, demoralization, misery, and ruin to hundreds of thousands of Her Majesty's loyal and innocent subjects. How long the latter will tolerate the pursuance of such a course is a question which they must decide for themselves. So long as they were duped into the belief that their sufferings could only be relieved by a breach of neutrality, most of them thought it better to endure wrong than to commit it; when once they understand that the policy which is ruinous to them is also unjust and unneutral, that in sacrificing their interests England is betraying her international duties and soiling her national honour, we doubt whether their patience will last much longer.

The Emperor of Mexico.

AMONG statesmen of princely rank, none holds a higher position than that of the Archduke Maximilian of Austria. His very birth is a title to the esteem and confidence of those who pay more attention to historical fact than to political passion and popular clamour. Italian sympathies have excited a strong prejudice in England against the House of Hapsburg; we are prone to underrate their virtues, exaggerate their failures, and render scanty justice to their actual achievements; but the fact remains that that house has produced more men of distinguished ability and high character than any other royal family in Europe. It has rendered services of no common order to Germany and to the world. Among the kinsmen of Maximilian was the Prince whom Germany, in her brief hour of faith and hope, chose as "Regent of the Empire." Among them, too, was the Archduke Charles, who all but beat Napoleon, and who was certainly one of the first generals of the last generation. The Archduke's brother, the reigning Emperor of Austria, has done things which were not very wise, and which were exceedingly obnoxious to English feeling; but he has displayed both courage, capacity, and good faith in the policy by which, after the defeat of Solferino, he has retrieved the position and repute of Austria both as a German State and as a European power. It is plain that even Francis Joseph is a man of no common order; it is believed that his brother is his superior. The Archduke has raised high hopes by his past career. He was appointed to the viceroyalty of Lombardo-Venetia. He had to represent a government ruling by terror among a people who hate his family and his country with a hatred equalling that of the Southerner for the Yankee, or of the Yankee for the Red Indian. He so ruled that, while he retained the confidence of his brother, he won the respect of his brother's rebellious subjects. He is regarded with personal esteem by a people whose aristocracy refused to attend his court, and whose lower orders abstained from smoking in order to injure his revenue. He has remained of late in judicious retirement, but every time that he is heard of it is in connection with some creditable trait of character. His marriage, too, is greatly in his favour. His wife is the Princess Charlotte of Belgium, the daughter of the most respected King in Europe. Since the days of St. Louis, no prince has commanded more general esteem and enjoyed more extensive influence, by virtue simply of his personal character, than Leopold I. The authority of Lord Palmerston or Louis Napoleon in the councils of Europe is due, not so much to their individual weight, great as that is, as to the fact that they speak with the force of great armies and great navies. King Leopold's authority is that of personal character alone, and yet it is enormous. His advice, on a question of European policy, would be received with more respect than that of any other statesman; his arbitration is sought in national disputes, more readily, and accepted with more confidence, than that of any other Sovereign in modern times. In choosing for a wife the daughter of such a King, the Archduke has added another claim to those he already possessed on the confidence and esteem of public men, has bound himself by another tie to the principles of good government and popular liberty. Mexico is fortunate in obtaining his consent to accept her throne, and may be grateful to the Emperor of the French for the wisdom and good feeling which induced him to elect, even from the family of an enemy, the man in all the world best fitted for the situation and most likely to promote the happiness of his people.

The Archduke demands two further measures as the condition of his acceptance of the throne: a general vote of the people, or plebiscitum, as it is called in the pedantic Latinism of France, and a satisfactory guarantee for the security of the new Empire against foreign foes. We regret the former demand. It seems to us at once unworthy, unwise, and unpromising. The Archduke knows that there is no formality of public business more hollow, hypocritical, and worthless, than a general vote of the people, aye or no, on such a question as the election of a monarch. It suits France, it is necessary to a French Emperor, ruling avowedly by the will of a majority over a people much more careful to preserve the forms of democracy than the substance of liberty. But its introduction into Mexico is altogether gratuitous. The Emperor will reign by the grace of God and Napoleon III., not by the will of the Mexican multitude. He ought not to begin his reign by pretending to accept the throne from a mongrel population as incapable of national will as unworthy of political liberty. The affectation, if it be not a concession to France, is a gratuitous hypocrisy. It is foolish, too, to introduce into Mexico the French notion of democratic equality. The principle on which society ought to be constructed in such a country is aristocratic. To Englishmen it seems painful and harsh, if not unchristian, to deny in toto the doctrine of human equality, and to substitute for it the assertion of generic gradation. Englishmen like to act on practical truths while asserting philanthropic fictions. They do not admire anything like amalgamation between their own and inferior races. They govern India, Ceylon, New Zealand, on principles which recognise the subordination of races; they have ruined Ireland and the West Indies by ignoring that subordination. But they do not like to see the truths on which they act broadly stated in contradiction to the theories they have embraced; and therefore they are apt to do great injustice to those who are only doing precisely what Englishmen always do in like circumstances. Practically, if Mexico belonged to us, we should govern through and by the aid of the pure portion of its people; but it is to be feared that if the Archduke determine to do so English orators will rail at him, and English Ministers scold him, as if we acted otherwise in India, or had done well to act otherwise in Jamaica. By demanding a plebiscite, the Archduke puts all classes on a level, and deprives himself of what ought to be the best internal support and security of his throne—the attachment of the Mexicans of European blood. We are not without fears that he will endeavour to follow up this principle; that, instead of looking to the actual condition of Mexico, and giving it institutions adapted to a half-barbarous country, with a population of half-castes, he will go thither with ideas already formed, and a system cut and dried in Europe; and if so, we fear that endless troubles are in store for him and his subjects. Mexico must have a despot. She could not desire a better than Maximilian, if he will be a despot; but it would be better for her to have a worse man who will consent to rule, than Maximilian if he mean to play the constitutional king—to summon a parliament, to choose his ministers at its bidding, to yield to its caprices, to be "le roi qui régit et ne gouverne pas."

With perfect justice, both for himself and for his future subjects, the Emperor-elect demands security for his empire against external foes; that is, in plain English, against the Government of the United States. It may now suit that Government to waive its hostility. Ready to throw the gauntlet in the face of France, having already lifted it to throw, having given license and signal to the press to threaten her with war, it may recoil before her attitude of contemptuous indifference, of perfect willingness, and reserve its defiance for a better opportunity or a more patient foe. But for all that, the United States will be the persevering enemy of the Mexican empire; will always threaten it, incessantly harass it, and attack it on the first favourable occasion. The Monroe doctrine will never be abjured by the Yankees, even though not a foot of ground south of the Potomac should be left in Northern possession. Mexico will not, for a long time, be able to hold her ground against the North without foreign assistance. Austria cannot promise that aid; England will not; no other European power will raise a finger in aid of Mexico or her sovereign, except the Power which has given peace to the one and a crown to the other. The guarantee demanded by the Emperor-elect must be a guarantee from France.

In order to give such a guarantee without entailing upon herself very heavy and very permanent burdens, France must find an ally able to bear a portion of her responsibility in Europe, or a friend able and willing to lighten it in America. The former is out of the question. No European Power will join in engaging to defend the Empire of Mexico. No American Power but one is in a condition to lighten in any degree the difficulty of defending it. France and the nation which she has redeemed from anarchy and barbarism, have no choice but to seek the alliance of the Confederate States; no alternative but to do their best, for their own sake, to save and strengthen their future ally. The declared hostility of the North to the Mexican Empire makes the independence of the South, and of the whole South, a matter of necessity to the new State. Nothing less can prevent the great dishonour to France and calamity to the human race which would be involved by the overthrow of the work achieved by so much labour and so many sacrifices, and the restoration of republican anarchy in one of the fairest and richest regions of the New World.

We do not pretend to know anything of the secret counsels of Napoleon III.; we do not venture, to guess at the motives which have hitherto withheld him from giving countenance to the Confederacy, to say nothing of making common cause therewith. But now that the enemy of both has made their cause common, has shown that the overthrow of the one would be a signal for an instant attack upon the work of the other, we cannot believe that a statesman so profound and so observant will hesitate much longer. We believe that the first act of the Emperor of Mexico must be the recognition of the Confederate States, and an alliance offensive and defensive with them. That alliance must, necessarily, bring France into the field; and her appearance therein, whether as mediator or as partner in the war, must at once bring its termination and decide its issue. Her choice is a simple one: to assist now in establishing the independence of the Confederacy, or to stand still aloof, in deference to the English Government, waiting to see whether the Confederates will so far prevail as to free her from peril, or so far succumb as to oblige her to fight, under great disadvantages, to protect the order and the sovereign she has just bestowed on Mexico.

Desquensus Avernæ.

A LOCAL saying suggested to Lord Russell the most remarkable part of his oration at Blairgowrie. On the text of "Rest and be thankful" he delivered a few sentences pregnant with meanings of which he himself seems to have been wholly unconscious. As the gods of the ancient world, and the demons of the middle ages, often delivered their oracles through the mouths of unintelligent and even unwilling agents, so some Nemesis of political truth spoke through the lips of the Foreign Secretary, and pronounced an emphatic condemnation on the whole of his career. "Rest and be thankful" is at this moment an advice exceedingly grateful to the English mind, well satisfied with the present and heartily proud of the past. But it came oddly from the mouth of one whose life has been spent in creating confusion and disturbance. He was speaking of political reform; and he, the author of a dozen Reform Bills, the last of which was ignominiously stifled but three years ago, bids England "rest and be thankful." We take the advice, without feeling much indebted to the giver. We rest from a long and tiresome course of political conflict, necessitated by the gratuitous agitation of a factious partisan, who thought it a trifle to make a breach in the Constitution in order to shorten his own road to power, and was eager to pull it down to the foundations in order to fortify himself in office. We are thankful for the liberty, order, and good government we enjoy; for the preservation of the Constitution from all its enemies; for the victory achieved by the conservative instincts of the people over democratic agitation and factious intrigue; thankful, above all, for our deliverance from the restless machinations, the unceasing turbulence, the destructive energies of the man so opportunely removed from the House of Commons to "another and a happier place." Politically we are thankful for many great blessings, but above all for the defeats and humiliations which have put an end to mis-called Reform, and extinguished the political importance of John Earl Russell.

In foreign policy, it is true, his restless spirit keeps the nation in continual hot water, and involves it in constant danger either of disgrace or of war. But the instinct of the people is not so averse to disturbance abroad as to innovation at home; and most Englishmen would much rather have to fight with American ships at sea than with American ideas in Parliament; would rather have to defend themselves against French aggression than against French principles. And yet, as in domestic politics, in spite of party intrigues and Radical agitation, the country has rested in fact, thankful for its actual prosperity and contented with the fruit of former labours, so in foreign policy a tendency to practical inactivity is becoming the most marked characteristic of our statesmanship. Lord Russell's personal qualities—his aggressive temper, his morbid ambition, his insatiable vanity, his diseased appetite for purposeless intrigue—make it impossible for him to rest; he must be busy doing mischief, if not to the constitution of England, then to her international interests, to her public honour, to the peace of Europe. But his political timidity—his fear of foreign war and parliamentary difficulties—dispose him to restrain his own activity within limits which allow the nation to rest. He preaches the doctrine of non-intervention as loudly as Cobden or Bright; though in his mouth it only means that, while the Foreign Secretary of England has a finger in every diplomatic squabble and every popular disturbance of Europe, her army should never meet a foe more formidable than the retainers of a Japanese Daimio, her fleets be employed only in parading about the Channel and patrolling the China seas.

This doctrine of non-intervention is either a very old or a very new one. If it mean simply that we should not interfere in a foreign quarrel where neither the interests of England, nor the vindication of international law, nor the balance of European power is seriously threatened; that we should not take up arms because Franco and Russia choose to settle by the duello a dispute on a point of honour, or because France and America may quarrel for the possession of Mexico, then the doctrine is as old as the existence of the British monarchy. Englishmen are not averse to fighting from any Quakerlike scruples of conscience, or any abstract devotion to peace; but they have always objected to waste blood and money without some very just and satisfactory cause; and they by no means sympathise with that famous exclamation of Irish disappointment, "Is there a row, and I not in it?" But if non-intervention means a simple and absolute withdrawal from all concern with the affairs of foreign nations; a declaration that whatever wrong be done, whatever atrocities committed, whatever crimes perpetrated by the strong, and whatever cruelties endured by the weak, England will not lift her hand to prevent the consummation of any wickedness by which her own rights are not invaded and by which her own security is not impaired—then the doctrine is one not only of very modern origin, but utterly loathsome to the hereditary feelings and repugnant to the traditional policy of England. Englishmen are generally agreed that we ought not to interpose in the intestine quarrels of foreign countries, except when those quarrels become scandalous to mankind by their length and ferocity, or dangerous by the interest they excite to the peace of the world; but this rule has been set aside by general consent when the interest of England required that peace should be restored. Englishmen are generally agreed that we ought not to interfere in wars between equals, so long as the balance of power is not threatened and English interests are not endangered. But we have not yet come to admit that we ought not to interpose to protect weak States from conquest and dismemberment; to repress outrageous wrong; in some cases to punish a tyranny too frightful to be borne and too powerful to be overthrown by internal efforts. We have not yet reached this point, but we are drifting towards it; and it is time that we should ask ourselves how far we mean to drift.

Non-intervention, in the Radical sense, in the sense affixed to it by Messrs. Bright and Cobden, is utterly inconsistent with the position of a great Power. Laches, by international as by municipal law, is only excused to weakness. By not asserting our rights, we forfeit them; by not performing the duties of a certain rank, we are held to waive its privileges. By general consent and by natural necessity, the great Powers of Europe are the appointed vindicators and enforcers of international law. It is their function to do right and enforce justice under that law, as it is the function of chiefs and nobles, in an ill-organised society, to protect the rights and liberties of their clients. It is expected of them that they shall be jealous of their own honour and punctilious in resenting affronts, precisely as the same conduct was expected in the chivalric age from every one laying claim to the rank of a gentleman. Weak Powers, like women and clergymen, are excused in right of their weakness from the obligation of self-defence. Barbaric Powers, like churls, are deemed incapable of giving or receiving insults—are outside of the international law of honour altogether. But a great Power which either receives an affront with patience, or stands by tamely to see a wrong done to one incapable of resenting it, suffers dishonour thereby; and a policy which makes profession of such dishonour amounts to an abnegation of all the rights and privileges of greatness. The Radicals are consistent in this matter. They do not wish that England should remain a great Power. They would prefer for her the guaranteed neutrality of Belgium or the safe insignificance of Holland. They would rejoice to see her disband her army, reduce her fleet, isolate herself entirely from politics, and devote herself to commerce; they would have her abnegate all other objects of national life than that of growing rich, and abandon all privileges save that of free trade. They would degrade her from her rank, back her spurs from her heels, reduce her to the class of churls, in order to leave her free to pursue with uninterrupted diligence the one useful end of human existence—the acquisition of wealth.

But this is not the feeling of Englishmen in general. They are, in the first place, wiser than the enthusiasts of commerce in regard to commerce itself. They know that empire and colonization gave us our trade, and justly fear that with our empire and our colonies our trade would also pass away. They are, moreover, proud of the power and prestige of England. Apart from their conviction of its tangible value, they love it for its own sake, and would make great sacrifices to maintain it. They would maintain a twenty years' war for India. They would fight to the death for Canada against any other enemy than the Canadians themselves: we doubt whether, in despite of all that has been said on the subject, they would let Canada go without a struggle if she attempted to obtain her independence otherwise than by the constitutional method of petition. They would pay an income-tax of five shillings in the pound for ten years rather than submit to affront from any foreign Power. They would risk the prosperity of British trade, the whole shipping and manufacturing interests of Great Britain, rather than abandon the place of England in the councils of Europe, if once the alternative were put before them in a form instantly appreciable. What they have to quarrel against is the tendency of statesmen to sacrifice insensibly and unawares to mere material interests those things which are of higher value than any material interest, however important: to abandon the place which England ought to fill, in the idea that she can resume it at pleasure; to forsake her duties, when inconvenient or perilous, in the belief that this involves no sacrifice of rights and powers which are precious to the heart of the nation. A dangerous progress has already been made in this direction. The abandonment of Spain to the mercies of the French Bourbons by Mr. Canning; the betrayal of Italy to Austria by successive English Ministers; the cowardice which permitted the liberties of Hungary to be trampled out by Russia; the unhappy weakness which permitted France to inflict a signal humiliation upon us through the side of Portugal, "our ancient and faithful ally"—are derelictions of duty which leave their trace not only on the traditions of the Foreign Office, but on the spirit of England and the opinion of the world. It is by derelictions like these that great Powers lose their rank and honour. One act of treachery to the common cause of Europe has kept Prussia, for the last ten years, degraded, impotent, insignificant, shorn of her just influence in German and in European politics. One vigorous act of self-assertion raised Sardinia at once into a rank almost equal to that of the five Powers. It is possible even for England to sink as Prussia has sunk. One failure in duty may not sink her so low; for she stands higher and has nobler traditions in the past to atone the shortcomings of the present. But whenever she fails to vindicate her own honour, to assert the maritime law of nations against all encroachment in a manner becoming the greatest of maritime Powers; whenever she allows a gross outrage to be committed by the strong against the weak; whenever she stands by an indifferent spectator of atrocities perpetrated by one people against another, greater than those committed by the Turks in Greece, and forbears to protest or to punish simply because the criminal is stronger than the Sultan was: she takes a step on that downward path which is proverbially so difficult to retrace. Retrace it she will, no doubt; but it may cost long years, bloody wars, and many sacrifices to recover the position which nothing but an ordinary exertion of vigilance and energy is required at present to maintain.

GENERAL LEE'S army has been supplied with new outfits, and an officer, writing to a Southern paper, says, "the metamorphosis is wonderful."

THE Richmond Dispatch says that yellow fever prevails at Norfolk and Portsmouth, Virginia.

IN response to President Davis's call for 8,000 men, 238 companies, or about 15,350 troops, had volunteered in Georgia some weeks ago—all made up from men not liable to conscription.

MAGAZINES FOR OCTOBER.

If ever Mr. D'Israeli should have the leisure to continue the work with which his father's name is so honourably associated, he will surely not pass by the opening article in the current number of Fraser, entitled "England and America," and which is a veritable curiosity of literature. We do not mean that it is ill written, or that there is anything eccentric in the style thereof. Nor does the curiosity arise from a magazine which has hitherto been the able exponent of the Southern cause suddenly manifesting a "warm neutrality" for the North. What seem to us curious, and even exceedingly humorous, are the arguments adduced against the Confederates. Whilst reading them we were reminded of the story of the barrister who, forgetting his instructions, made a vigorous appeal for the plaintiff although he had been retained for the defendant. The exigencies of space forbid our replying to all the salient points in the article, but we propose to notice one or two for the amusement if not for the edification of our readers.

The problem which the writer of "England and America," tries to solve is, "With whom are we to sympathise: the North or the South?" and he commences by stating the case for the Federals, or rather the case of the Federals against this country. The first charge is, that our press "has done great and even cruel injustice to the North," and he might have added that, in the North, Fraser's Magazine is regarded as peculiarly cruel and unjust. It appears that our journals, and especially the Times, have been instigated by a sentiment of revenge, and that the secession of the South has been gloated over as a fitting punishment for the rebellion which resulted in the independence of the American colonies. And this way of writing, we are told—

Tacitly imputed to the Americans that the founders of the United States had laid down the principle that whenever any considerable body of men chose to withdraw themselves from the control of a given Government they ought to be allowed to do so. Such a principle was probably never held by any sane man. It would not only give the South a right to repudiate the North, but it would give New York City a right to secede from the State of New York. Nay, it would give the City of Westminster a right to secede from the City of London, and set up for itself, with its high bailiff for a king.

Now, it is true that the first War of Independence has been cited to justify the second War of Independence, or rather to show the unreasonableness of the Federal conduct in carrying on a war against the South because she chooses to assert her independence. There is, indeed, a material difference: when the Colonies set up for themselves they rebelled, whilst the Confederate States have only exercised a sovereign right in withdrawing from the federation. But no one on the Southern side has ever contended "that whenever any considerable body of men chose to withdraw themselves from the control of a given government, they ought to be allowed to do so." It was the Colonies, as Colonies, that revolted from British allegiance, and the Congress of Colonies passed a law making it treason for any persons, even aliens, residing in any of the Colonies, to aid and abet the public enemy, or to own any allegiance to any power except to the Government of their particular Colony. So, also, it is the Southern States that have seceded from the Union. But though the Confederates are totally opposed to the principle of any number of people being at liberty to withdraw from any government at discretion, the North, as represented by Mr. Abraham Lincoln, fully endorses it. He has publicly declared that—

Any people, anywhere, being inclined and having the power, have the right to rise up and shake off the existing government, and form a new one that suits them better. Nor is this right confined to cases where the people of an existing government may choose to exercise it. Any portion of such people that can, may revolutionise, putting down a minority, intermingled with or near about them, who may oppose them.

And he has acted upon this declaration, and, contrary to the State Rights doctrine guaranteed by the United States Constitution and strenuously upheld by the South, he has given a precedent by which New York City might claim a right to secede from the State of New York. We allude to the formation of the bogus State of Western Virginia. So it is the North and not the South that has been guilty in word and deed of the insane folly against which Fraser protests.

Another charge equally groundless is, that the Southerners, being the governing power of the Union, were "at the time of secession guilty of gross treachery." They had in their hands the forces of the Union, and they disposed of them in such a way as to enable themselves to destroy the Union." Unfortunately this is utterly false. Better would it have been for both North and South if the Southerners had prepared against the aggression of the North, for then this desolating war would have been avoided. When the war broke out, there was not a powder-mill, nor even any store of ammunition, in the South. The whole of the United States army remained to the North. The whole of the navy remained to the North. The only treachery the Southerners were guilty of was treachery to their own interests. Still more grotesque is the assertion that the Confederates have taken possession of Union property. Fraser contends that the North would have been justified in saying to the South, "Pay for the forts we built, for the roads we made; repay the purchase-money which we gave for Florida and Louisiana." Does the writer of this nonsense suppose that in the old Union the North paid all the taxes and the South went scot-free? It was not so; but the South paid, as we think, rather more than a fair share. If, then, the North wants a settlement for the forts and roads of the South, and for the purchase-money of Florida and Louisiana, an account must be taken of all the forts and roads in the whole of the late Union, and of all the army and navy; for all of them were made and maintained out of money contributed by both sections. And when a balance is struck it will be found that the North is enormously indebted to the South, and that in the dissolution of the partnership it has secured the lion's share of the stock in trade.

The New York correspondent of the Times is attacked as "an unscrupulous advocate." Has that gentleman written anything that is false? If so, why not convict him of falsehood? Had he been silent, are there not sources of intelligence from which Europe would have learnt of the atrocities of Butler and other equally infamous Federal commanders? It is not true that "he quotes every blackguard rant of the New York Herald," for if so his letters would occupy at least two pages of the Times. Does Fraser ever see a file of Northern papers? We suppose not, or he would know that "blackguard ranting" is not peculiar to the New York Herald, and that that paper is only quoted because it has the largest circulation and is the most influential organ of the Republican party. And let us ask our contemporary if the "blackguard ranting" of the New York Herald has ever been more atrocious than the blackguard ranting of Mr. Sumner, United States Senator and Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs? Has the New York Herald ever ventured, as Mr. Sumner has done, to associate a filthy metaphor with the name of our Queen? No, the blackguardism, the cruelty, the jobbery, and the tyranny of the Federals would have been published, even if the Times correspondent, instead of being an honest gentleman, had been the ready tool of Mr. John Bright and Mr. Abraham Lincoln, and had suppressed truth and written that which is false.

We will notice one more passage and then dismiss this article. Fraser says:—

Whatever may be the iniquity of the policy of the South, the instrument by and through which they worked was the Constitution of the United States, and the hold which they had over the Free States was the threat of destroying the Union. No one, indeed, can read the history of their proceedings without indignant disgust. Their policy for some forty years was vile, and its fruits, on several occasions, as for instance in the whole management of the affairs of Kansas, were detestable. To see such a power established over the whole length and breadth of North America, would indeed be an awful misfortune: but secession destroyed its chance; by the act of withdrawing from the Union, the seceding States renounced the power, the quasi-tyrannical power, which for a generation they had exercised over the North. They executed their threat; they fired their shot and did their worst, and from that moment they had no hold on the North.

To charge the South with breaking up the Union is very much like imputing it as a crime for a man to get rid of a partner who robs him, or of a wife who is faithless to her marriage vows. The South went out of the Union because the North was violating the Federal compact. And then, as to the threat of seceding, it is worth observing that, whilst the South was striving to keep the Union intact, the Republican party in the North was threatening and clamouring for disunion. For the instruction of Fraser we append a few, a very few, of the utterances of leading Republicans before secession, to show that they contemplated it and threatened the South with it. Mr. Wendell Phillips, speaking of the organisation of the Republican party, said:—

No man has a right to be surprised at this state of things. It is just what we have attempted to bring about. It is the first sectional party ever organised in this country. It does not know its own face, and calls itself National; but it is not national—it is sectional. The Republican party is a party of the North pledged against the South.

On another occasion Mr. Phillips said:—

The Constitution of our fathers was a mistake. Tear it in pieces and make a better. Don't say the machine is out of order; it is in order; it does what its framers intended—protects slavery. Our claim is disunion—breaking up of the States!

The three following quotations from Mr. Lloyd Garrison will prove that he was a disunionist before Southern secession:—

This Union is a lie! The American Union is an imposition, a covenant with death and an agreement with hell!

I am for its overthrow! . . . Up with the flag of disunion, that we may have a free and glorious republic of our own; and when the hour shall come, the hour will have arrived that shall witness the overthrow of slavery.

No act of ours do we regard with more conscientious approval or higher satisfaction—none do we submit more confidently to the tribunal of Heaven and the moral verdict of mankind—than when, several years ago, on the 4th of July, in the presence of a great assembly, we committed to the flames the Constitution of the United States.

The Republican party is moulding public sentiment in the right direction for the specific work the Abolitionists are striving to accomplish, viz., the dissolution of the Union and the abolition of slavery throughout the land.

The following resolutions were passed at a meeting of the American Anti-Slavery Society:—

Resolved, That secession from the United States Government is the duty of every Abolitionist, since no one can take office or deposit his vote under the Constitution without violating his anti-slavery principles, and rendering himself an abettor to the slave-holder in his sin.

Resolved, That years of warfare against the slave power have convinced us that every act done in support of the American Union rivets the chain of the slave—that the only exodus of the slave to freedom, unless it be one of blood, must be over the remains of the present American Church and the grave of the present Union.

Resolved, That the Abolitionists of this country should make it one of the primary objects of this agitation to dissolve the American Union.

During the Fremont campaign, Mr. Spinner, the present Assistant-Secretary to the Federal Treasury, said:—

. Should this [the election of Fremont] fail, no true man would be any longer safe here from the assaults of the arrogant slave oligarchy, who then would rule with an iron hand. For the North would be left the choice of a peaceful dissolution of the Union, a civil war which would end in the same, or an unconditional surrender of every principle held dear by freemen.

Mr. Pike, once editor of the New York Tribune, and now United States Minister to the Netherlands, said:—

I have no doubt that the free and slave States ought to separate. The Union is not worth supporting in connection with the South.

In 1859 the Tribune published the following verses:—

THE AMERICAN FLAG.

Tear down the flaunting lie!
Half-mast the starry flag!
Insult no sunny sky
With hate's polluted rag!

Destroy it ye who can!
Deep sink it in the waves!
It bears a fellow-man
To groan with fellow-slaves!

In December, 1860, the Tribune wrote:—

Whenever a portion of this Union, large enough to form an independent, self-subsisting nation, shall see fit to say to the residue, "We want to get away from you," we shall say—and we trust self-respect, if not regard for the principle of self-government, will constrain the residue of the American people to say—"Go!"

So it was the North and not the South that threatened secession, and those who now call secession "wicked rebellion," clamoured for it before the war began. It is the North and not the South that has preached and acted on the "insane" principle, that "whenever any considerable body of men chose to withdraw themselves from the control of a given government they ought to be allowed to do so." It is the North and not the South that has taken an undue share of the common property. It is Mr. Sumner, United States Senator and Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, and not the friends of the South, who has disgusted Europe with a display of Federal "blackguard ranting." Well may the North pray to be delivered from all such advocates as the writer in Fraser. In stating the case for the Federals, he has so completely exposed its rottenness, that it is needless even to glance at what he puts forth in favour of the Confederates.

Blackwood presents us with an excellent number. There is the first part of a new novel, entitled "Tory Butler," which, if it goes on as it has begun, will be a great success. It is animated, without being sensational, and the characters of the dramatis personæ are admirably sketched.—Sir E. B. Lytton concludes his "Caxtoniana," and explains that these essays were suggested to him whilst writing the novels attributed to Pisisistratus Caxton.—A review of the plays of Sheridan Knowles is preceded by a dissertation on his forsaking the stage for the pulpit. About his sincerity there can be no question, and there is nothing in his dramatic works of which as a preacher he need have been ashamed.—A paper on Harrow School is historically interesting, and would be very useful to a student of our institutions. It is impossible to overrate the influence that our public schools have had upon our national advancement. We do not refer to learning. So far as mere intellectual development is concerned, the German system would have been as successful. Our public schools have done incalculable good in forming character. The noblest youth in England, whether at Eton, Rugby, Harrow, Westminster, or any other of our public schools, have been inured to manly sports and to those physical contests which brace up the nerves and develop pluck. The monitoria and fagging systems, though often abused, have resulted in teaching our youth both to obey and to command. Public schools have been the agency for cementing the union between the aristocracy and the upper middle class, by making the son of the duke the school comrade and equal of the son of the commoner. Harrow was founded in the reign of Elizabeth, and though it has not the advantages of Eton—we mean as to revenue—it has by private enterprise attained and long enjoyed a distinguished position. It is, we believe, the dearest of our schools, yet it has at present 466 students. In the long list of eminent men who have been at Harrow are Lord Byron, the late Sir Robert Peel, and Lord Palmerston.—An article on "Gold and Social Politics" is not such heavy reading as the title suggests. The beneficial results of the late discoveries of gold are described, and the fictitious high value of gold explained. The precious metal is sought for, not for its use in the arts, nor even for its beauty, but because a portion of mankind have agreed to use it as their counters in trade. We have seldom seen a dry subject more popularly treated.

"Sea Fights, Ancient and Modern," is an essay which the readers of the Cornhill will appreciate as timely and replete with information. It has often been remarked that our system of naval warfare is in some respects approximating to the ancient system; but it would be truer to say that in getting rid of sails and spars we are entering upon an entirely new system. The manoeuvres which we accomplished by seamanship are now executed by the power of steam, and this involves as great a change from the naval warfare of Nelson as his did upon the sea-fights of the Greeks. Then, again, our modern ordnance is an advance upon the means of attack in vogue at the beginning of the century, just as the use of cannon itself was on the means of attack practised by the ancients. The one point in which an iron-clad or a steam-ram is supposed to be like an ancient vessel of war is its adaptation for running down an adversary; but it should be observed that it is yet doubtful how far ramming will be found useful. Until now the only instance on record is the famous fight in the Hampton Roads, when the Confederate iron-clad played havoc with the wooden fleet of the Federals. This, however, is hardly a fair test. It proved that wood has no chance against iron, but did not decide whether, when iron encounters iron, the rams are likely to be of much avail. It is to be observed, too, that the introduction of monitors is likely to put an end to boarding—a method of naval warfare always in use hitherto, but which, from the earliest times until the present, has been employed less and less with the improvement of the construction of war vessels and of their armaments. We agree with the writer in the Cornhill that the relative superiority of the British tar is not jeopardised by the changes that have lately taken place:—

The men who conquered afloat in row-boats with spear and battle-axe, were the men who conquered afterwards in one-masted galleys with cross-bow and lance; and again, as the ages rolled by, with culverins in small bluff-bowed merchant-ships; and again in stately seventy-fours, with fleet-maneuvring and fine gunnery. Jervis did not beat the Spaniards more thoroughly than the Black Prince. Duncan did not beat the Dutch more decidedly than Blake. Nelson did not destroy the French more effectually than Edward the Third. Was the change from Edward's "coy," the Thomas, to Nelson's Victory, not as great as the change from Nelson's Victory to the Warrior and the Black Prince?

A lady enlivens the columns of the Cornhill with an account of a visit to the House of Commons on the night of the debate on the Italian question. We are glad to learn that though ladies are put out of sight they can see what is going on, and that though they are cruelly forbidden to talk or whisper they can hear the speeches. The fair visitor was enraptured with Mr. Gladstone, thought Sir George Bowyer rather dull, and that Mr. Layard would be quite as effective in a debate if he would get rid of the habit of clapping his hands—which is an unkind, not to say rather spiteful, hit at the member for Nineveh. The lady was greatly surprised and yet very pleased to see Sir George Bowyer cross over the House, put his hand on Mr. Gladstone's shoulder, and enter into friendly conference, just after the last-named gentleman had been smiting him "with a great slaughter." The same spirit will always be manifested amongst politicians who respect each other, and who are patriots as well as opponents. In the United States Congress there were Southern Whigs and Southern Democrats, differing from each other as much as Sir George Bowyer does from Mr. Gladstone, but they were, after the heat of the debate, as good friends as though no political difference existed between them. But in the United States Congress there was an antagonism between North and South that lasted out of Congress as well as in Congress. It was due principally to the perpetual and violent abuse of the South by Northern Republicans; but, whatever the cause, this perpetual discord is one of a multitude of proofs that the North and South were virtually distinct long before the formal dissolution of the Union.

The New Review has a sketch of the life of the Countess of Albany, the unhappy wife of Prince Charles the Pretender. There is nothing original in the information, and we are under the impression that a few months since we read a paper in another magazine upon the same subject. However, the story is worth repeating, even if for no other reason than to make us thankful that we were rebels enough to get rid of the Stuarts. In 1772 the Pretender, who had been abandoned by his mistress on account of his violent temper, and who had been a confirmed drunkard for years, was married to Louise, Princess de Stolburg, then in her nineteenth year. The marriage was performed by proxy, and the unfortunate Princess knew not of her husband's degraded character until too late to retract; but it is likely enough that under any circumstances she would, dazzled by the chance of becoming Queen of England, have complied with the wish of the French Court, which brought about the marriage in order that the Stuarts might have heirs, and so be ready one day to hurl the House of Hanover from the throne of England. In 1772 it did not seem impossible that the wife of the Pretender might become de facto Queen of England. After not quite three years of married life, the Countess of Albany—such was her diplomatic title—left her husband on account of his ill-treatment, and because she had formed an attachment for the illustrious poet Alfieri, then in his twenty-seventh year. The Countess would not return to the Pretender, and kept up an intercourse with Alfieri. On the death of her husband she continued to live with the poet, but did not marry him, probably because she would not give up her pretension to be called Queen of England. The most disgraceful part of her career was that after the poet's death in 1803; when she was fifty-one years of age, she became the mistress of Fabre, a painter, and friend of Alfieri, and who was fifteen years her junior. If her first fault can be palliated, her last indelibly disgraces her memory.—"The East and West Ends of London" is an over-true story. The West-end is a city worthy of the wealth and glory of the Empire; the East-end is full of dens and hovels—"guilt-gardens," as they have been fitly called—that would have been a crying evil and shame in any age and to any people. We trust that as attention is being called to this matter, a remedy will be devised, and that our working classes will be housed, both in town and country, like human creatures, and not like vermin—we cannot say like cattle, for our cattle are better housed than our poor.—In an essay on the "Sisterhoods of the Church of England," and which may be described as institutions having most of the faults and few of the virtues of Romish Sisterhoods, an account is given of the absurd ceremonies observed by the Lady Superior of Davonport. A flight of stone stairs which she uses is covered with pieces of wood, on which are nailed pieces of rich carpeting. These are put down for her to walk on and taken up when she has passed. "It seems too ridiculous to be believed, but it is true, that these steps sometimes were put down and taken up four or five times a day, and the placing or displacing of them was quite an hour's work." Taking this for his text, the reviewer treats us to a short sermon upon the evils of absolute power. After informing us that our fellow-countrymen in India are vitiated by the cringing of the natives, of which fact we confess we were entirely ignorant, he asks, "Have the American planters reaped more of good than evil from their lifelong contact with a system of slavery worse than any known to Jew or Gentile in the days of classic Heathendom?" This is the most genuine bit of New England Abolitionism that was ever coined out of New England. It is worse, says the New Reviewer, to enslave the negro than it is to enslave a white and equal race. It is worse, says the New Reviewer, to hold slaves subject to laws for their protection, than it is to hold slaves subject to no law, and when killing a slave is not murder. Then the insinuation that the South has been enervated by slavery is worse than unfounded. Three years ago the New Reviewer might have pleaded ignorance, and that he had only the fictions of Abolitionists on which to form his opinion. Now such an excuse is not admissible. The gallantry of the Confederates, the heroic endurance with which they have battled in defence of their independence, and the noble, generous way in which they have conducted the war, whilst the Federals have made war like savages, are palpable evidence that slavery has not demoralised the dominant race. We are surprised that an English writer could pen such a sentence as we have quoted, and still more that it should be allowed a place in such a well conducted publication as the New Review.

Macmillan is rather dull this month, though it need not be added that in such a clever periodical there are always papers worth perusal. The most interesting contribution, though not the best, is entitled "Our Relations with Brazil," which is an ingenious attempt to disparage the Brazilian Government, and to prove that Lord Russell was right in the late dispute, although the verdict of the King of the Belgians was against England. Surely this is a wanton insult to such a sagacious and respected sovereign as King Leopold. Surely it is mean and paltry to quarrel with an award after submitting the case to an arbitrator, who, if he had any leaning at all, must have been partial to England. The Brazil outrage was a bad piece of business, and the sooner the friends of Lord Russell allow it to sink into oblivion the better it will be for his Lordship's credit.

London Society gives the first instalment of "Passages from the Family History of the English Aristocracy," and which holds out the prospect of a very readable series of articles. A commendable contribution in the current number is "The Mart in Mining Lane," which gives the reader a very good idea of the way in which our vast business in colonial produce—in which are included tea and other articles that do not come from colonies—is carried on. The illustrations are, as usual, excellent, though we would suggest that it is possible to have too much of a good thing—even of pretty pictures of delicious girls.

THE AMENDE HONORABLE.

We cheerfully correct certain errors into which we had inadvertently fallen in our last impression in referring to the Sunday Times, and we cannot make the correction better than in our esteemed contemporary's own words:—

We beg respectfully to remind the Index that the Sunday Times professes to be a first-class journal, specially devoted to the interests of the Drama, Music, Literature, and the Fine Arts. In its politics, too, it is decidedly Conservative. It is not a "penny paper," though we are happy in being able to own the "soft impeachment" that "it has but few rivals in circulation among the organs of the weekly press." We hope the Sunday Times will never be "unfair" in its treatment of any cause; but we believe that so far from being "not specially partial to the cause of the South," it has been the most consistent, earnest, and unfaltering advocate of the claims of the Confederates they have had in the newspaper press of England. Perhaps the editor of the Index will do us the justice of examining our files for two years past, if he doubts the accuracy of these explanations.

FAITHFUL SLAVES.—An incident, for the truth of which we can vouch, and which in a remarkable manner illustrates the attachment of the Southern slaves to their masters, is worth mention. Among the arrivals in Liverpool by one of the recent steamers from New York was a young Confederate officer, accompanied by two fine strapping "contrabands." The officer and the two blacks, one his own body servant and the other the servant of a brother officer, had been captured in an attempt to run the double blockade from one Confederate port to another (a species of voyage now becoming quite frequent), and carried to New York. The negroes cunningly concealed their connection with their protector, but kept their eyes upon him, and on his release on parole they so earnestly and pathetically begged to be taken along with him, that, in spite of the danger, inconvenience, and expense, he could not find it in his heart to refuse them. Another fact which this little incident illustrates is the peculiar pleasure the typical "intelligent contraband" takes in outwitting the Yankees, a feature of negro character which has been abundantly displayed in this war, and has on many occasions signally assisted the operations of the Confederate armies.

It has been ascertained that among those killed at Gettysburg was William Mitchell, a son of John Mitchell, now well known to be connected with the editorial department of the Richmond Enquirer. He was a private in the 1st Virginia Regiment, and had fought most gallantly in all the battles in Virginia. He was about eighteen years old—just in the dawn of manhood—and had given bright promise of future usefulness as a soldier and as a citizen. Two brothers of the deceased are in the service.—Southern Paper.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, October 7.

It seems that the money market is again to be pressed upon by loans, and a variety of new projects encouraging miscellaneous adventure. In the question of loans it appears Brazil requires a few millions to pay off old loans running at a higher rate of interest, and Portugal will need further assistance to give her railway system increased development. Spain, it is said, will have to obtain financial aid, but of course nothing will be done for her till she has arranged the Passive debts and made provision for the certificates. The new projects principally comprise Banks—and if they are to be encouraged as they were last year, we shall sooner or later have a panic which must be most devastating in its effects. With these new engagements in immediate progress of arrangement the expectation of cheaper money in a great degree vanishes. It is true the dividends will come into play directly, while the large sums realised by the Indian Council will augment the available supplies, but these will be swallowed up without much delay if the transactions of this character accumulate—and it is said they will, in the space of the next week or a fortnight. The bankers and brokers are therefore working cautiously, and avoiding any very extensive business, and though several have exhibited a tendency for long-dated paper in preference to short, owing to the peculiar position of things, we think their policy will now undergo some change. The Bank have had altogether recently a very strong inquiry, and it is not probable that it will yet diminish when millions are to be found to complete loan contracts, and to supply funds necessary to organise and work Indian and foreign Banks. The rate for choice selected paper is 4 per cent., the Bank minimum; and though, perhaps, a little business has been done at 3½ per cent., it has in other respects more frequently ranged to 4½ and 4¾. Till the money which has been so freely employed in harvest operations returns from the provinces there will be little variation or reduction in the rates of discount.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The amount of gold sent into the Bank of England, including £55,000 this afternoon, is £282,000, against which there have been withdrawals for transmission abroad to the amount of £162,000. The arrivals of specie have been moderate, viz., £505,599, of which £280,088 is from Port Philip, £22,511 from the Brazils, and £203,000 from New York. The shipments of specie by the last mail for the East were £109,905, of which £58,645 was in gold and £51,260 in silver. The quantities were, for India £1,645, China and the Straits £57,260, and Alexandria £57,000. The silver market remains very steady; the bar silver brought by the last West India mail has been sold at 6½d. per oz., being about the previous quotation. The Mexican dollars by the same mail have not yet been disposed of; the price is nominally 5s. 3½d. per oz. The only gold ship at present announced to be on its way from Australia is the Wellesley, with £131,000.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.
The defeat of Rosecrans has exercised considerable influence on the price of this Stock. On Monday a rapid advance took place, the quotation being 68 to 70 (equal to 22 to 20 dis.); some transactions were effected at 73. Realisation of profits by speculators since caused a reaction to 64 to 66. To-day (Wednesday) large purchases in Liverpool have strengthened the market, and we close 65 to 67.

The last instalment of 15 per cent. having been paid, the Stock is quoted at its actual money value, instead of, as before, at a discount or premium on the subscription price.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.
The biddings for 40,000,000 rupees in Bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were— to Calcutta, 22,000,000; to Bombay, 16,000,000, and to Madras, 2,000,000. The minimum price declared was, as before, 1s. 11½d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1s. 11½d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 121 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta at 1s. 11½d. will receive about 14 per cent.; on Bombay at 2s. about 68 per cent.; on Madras at 1s. 11½d. about 63 per cent., and all above these prices in full.

THE NEW BRAZILIAN LOAN.
An official notification has been issued this afternoon of a new Brazilian Loan for £3,300,000, the object being the redemption in London of the balance of the 5 per cent. Loan of 1843, amounting to £3,620,000, due on the 1st January, 1864; likewise redeeming the balance of the 5 per cent. loans of 1824 and 1825, amounting together to £2,357,900, due on the 1st April, 1864; and discharging in Brazil with the balance the floating Treasury Bonds. Messrs. N. M. Rothschild and Sons, financial agents of the Imperial Government, therefore, announced that they are ready to receive at their office subscriptions for this loan. It will be emitted in bonds to bearer for £100, £500, and £1,000, each carrying interest at 4½ per cent. per annum, in coupons, payable half-yearly in London on the 1st April and 1st October each year; the first half-year's dividend being due 1st April, 1864. The bonds are to be issued for thirty years, and will be redeemed by a sinking fund of £1 13s. per cent. per annum, operating half-yearly by purchases in the market when at or under par, and by drawing by lot when above par. The price of emission is £88 for every £100 stock, payable as follows:—15 per cent. on allotment; 15 per cent. on 16th November, 1863; 15 per cent. on 15th December, 1863; 10 per cent. on 15th January, 1864; and 33 per cent. on 22nd March. To subscribers who prefer payment by anticipation of the above periods a discount, at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum, will be allowed. Applications for this loan must be accompanied with a deposit of 5 per cent. on the amount applied for.

THE NEW ZEALAND LOAN.
The tenders for the New Zealand Loan for the Auckland Provincial Government were opened on the 1st instant at the Bank of New Zealand. The first instalment to be placed was £100,000. The fixed minimum was 105 (virtually 102, as £3 interest has already accrued). The total amount tendered for was £144,500, of which £71,750 was tendered for, and accepted, at sums ranging from £105 to £115, and the balance unaccepted, £72,750, was at prices varying from par to the minimum. The unallotted portion, £28,250, was tendered for on the 3rd instant, and all taken at prices ranging to 45 11s. premium. No tenders at the minimum were accepted, and a much larger amount was offered than required.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.
In the early part of the week business in the English Stock Market was fairly active, and prices were well sustained, notwithstanding that the operators generally were directing their attention more particularly to foreign stocks, where they found a wider field for their speculative tendencies. Within the last day or two, however, the aspect of foreign politics, particularly with reference to the German Confederation, has again created some little uneasiness, and prices consequently have assumed an advanced direction. Consols closed this evening at 93 to 94 for both money and account, which, as compared with this day week, is a decline of ¼ per cent. Exchequer Bills remain standing at par to 3s. premium. An extensive speculative business has again been transacted in foreign securities, the chief attention having been directed to Mexican, which at one time were very good; but, the reply of the Archduke Maximilian to the Mexican deputations not being regarded as altogether satisfactory, a decline to the extent of nearly four per cent. has been the result. Greek stock has met with a fair share of support, but in sympathy with other descriptions closes rather weak. Spanish have been moderately dealt in, but were rather lower at the close. Turkish, on the other hand, continue to maintain their values. The latest quotations were:—Greek Stock, 36½ to 37½; Mexican, 43 to 43½; Spanish Passives, 35 to 35½; Do. Certificates, 13½ to 13¾; Turkish Six per Cent., (1854), 95; Do. do. (1862), 70½ to 71.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.
In American Government and Railway Securities business has again been on a rather restricted scale, and for most descriptions prices have shown a further adverse tendency, in consequence of the reported progress made by the Confederate forces. The dealings comprise Virginia State Six per Cent. at 41, 40, 39, 40, and 39. Atlantic and Great Western (New York Section), 77½, 78½, and 76. Do. do. (Pennsylvania Section), 77, 76½, 76, 77, 76½, 76, and 75. x. c. Erie Shares, $100, all paid, 73, 73½, 73, 76, and 75. Do. do. 5th mortgage, 70. Illinois Central Seven per Cent., 77, 76, 75, and 76. Do. do., $100 Share, $90 paid, 16½, 15½, 16, and 17½. Do. do., all paid, 74, 76, 74½, and 76. Marietta and Cincinnati Railway, 71. New York Central Seven per Cent. 70. Do. do., $100 Shares, 88, 89, and 90; and Pennsylvania Central Bonds, First Mortgage, convertible, 73.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.
Business in the English Railway Share Market has not been very heavy, though the transactions have been to a fair average extent; but with one or two exceptions prices have had a downward tendency; these exceptions being in London, Chatham, and Dover shares, which are better by about 2 per cent.; North-Eastern (York) ½ per cent., and London and Blackwall about ¼ per cent. The decline has been in Metropolitan to the extent of 1 per cent.; in Great Northern, London, Brighton, and South Coast, London and North-Western, and South-Eastern ½ per cent.; and in Great-Western, London and South-Western, and Midland ½ per cent. Foreign Railway Shares have been rather more in demand, and quotations on the whole continue to be fairly maintained. In the shares in British Possessions the dealings have been to a full average extent, without any material alteration in values.

NEW BANKING PROJECTS.
A very important undertaking has just been announced under the auspices of the General Credit and Finance Company of London. It is called the Land Mortgage Bank of India (Credit Foncier Indien) with a nominal capital of £2,000,000 in shares of £20 each. Only a small portion of the capital will be called up, and of that a large portion was arranged for before the prospectus was issued. The Board is very influentially constituted, Mr. S. Laing, late financial secretary in India, being the Chairman, the other members being Colonel Balfour, C.B., Mr. H. L. Bischoffsheim, the Hon. W. S. Fitzwilliam, Sir J. P. Grant, K.C.B., Mr. P. Northall Laurie, and others. The chief business of the company will be the granting of loans on land, either for fixed periods, or upon tenures that will extinguish the debt during the currency of the mortgage, or the payment of an annual instalment on account of the principal, in addition to the annual interest; thus conferring on the borrowers the benefit of an eventual liquidation of their debts. The remarkable success of the French Credit Foncier is referred to in illustration of the system it is proposed to adopt. That there is an extensive field for the operations of the Company is beyond all doubt, and as the directors will issue deliveries for fixed periods, the resources at their command for enlarged enterprise will be in a measure unlimited. The prospectus has also been issued of the Anglo-Austrian Bank, with a proposed capital of £2,000,000, which in the first instance is to be divided into £20 certificates, of which 30 per cent. will be at once called up; viz., 10 per cent. on application, 10 per cent. on allotment, and 10 per cent. within one month after allotment. The Bank, it is affirmed, is established under a direct concession for the purpose of promoting and extending commercial and financial relations between Austria and this country, by the ordinary business of a bank of deposit, discount and exchange. The head office is to be at Vienna, with branches at Trieste, Prague, and Brinn. The financial agents in England are Messrs. Glynn, Mills and Co., and the London manager is Mr. Francis Brewer, who has had twenty-five years' experience in the house of Messrs. Fröhling and Goschen. The Government, who have approved of the prospectus, have promised the Bank the opportunity of undertaking such financial operations as loans, placing of bonds, &c., and to open an account current with the establishment. The council of directors is highly constituted.

BANK AMALGAMATIONS.
The junction of the old-established bank of Messrs. Loyd, Entwistle and Co., of Manchester, with the Manchester and Liverpool District Bank, has been announced by the following circular:—

"Dear Sirs,—It is our duty to take the earliest opportunity of informing you that we have made arrangements with the Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company for the conduct of the future business which may be entrusted to this Bank. Circumstances of a purely private character have compelled us to regard such a measure as necessary, but it is not without great regret that we contemplate any modification of a connection which has now subsisted with mutual good will for a period of fifteen years. For the confidence you have reposed in us we shall always feel deeply grateful, and we hope that the arrangements we have made with a view to your convenience will meet with your approval. The business will be continued on the same premises in King-street, and, as far as possible, with the same staff. Our partner, Mr. Bury, will join the direction of the Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Company, and we feel justified in expressing a strong conviction, that, in transferring your business to that Company, you will intrust it to the care of gentlemen in every way worthy of your confidence and respect.

We are, &c.,
Manchester, Oct. 1, 1863. LOYD, ENTWISTLE & CO.

BANK MEETINGS.
At a meeting to-day of the proprietors of the Chartered Bank of India, China, and Australia, an interim dividend of 5 per cent. for the half-year ending the 30th June last was declared out of profits gained during that period, amounting to £51,500. At the same time £24,000 was set apart to be added to the reserve fund.—At the first meeting of the shareholders in the Standard Bank of British South Africa, the report, which was of a highly satisfactory character, was unanimously adopted. It stated that although only a very few months had elapsed since the incorporation of the Company, and although the field of operations was very distant, after payment of all interest on deposits, and deduction of rebate on all bills discounted, but not yet due, the net profits amounted to £4,792, out of which the directors had placed £110 as a half-yearly payment to the credit of the preliminary expenses, £1,176 to suspense account, and they recommended that £3,375 be applied to the payment of a dividend of 6s. 9d. per share, free of income-tax, being at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum on the paid-up capital, and carrying forward £30 to the current account.—At an extraordinary general meeting of the proprietors of the Union Bank of England and France, Mr. Colchester in the chair, resolutions were passed, confirming the resolutions agreed to at a previous meeting for the amalgamation of this bank with the English, Belgian, and Netherlands Bank, under the general title of the European Bank. In answer to a question, the Chairman stated that he should fill the position of deputy chairman in the new Company, and would continue to take as much interest in the bank as he had hitherto done.—At a meeting of the proprietors of the English, Belgian, and Netherlands Bank held to-day, similar resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.
At a meeting of the shareholders in the London and Burton Bottled Beer Company, the report of the directors, and the statement of accounts were adopted, and a dividend declared at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, free of income tax. The accounts showed a net profit of £1,147, upon the six months trading, and an unappropriated balance of £905 had been brought forward from the previous account. After payment of the dividend there would remain £1,515 to be carried to the reserve fund.—At a meeting of the proprietors of the Indian Carrying Company, a dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, for the half-year was declared out of the net profits of the past six months. The chairman stated that their institution, as was incidental to all such establishments, had at its outset met with both success and failure. The failure had occurred through the mismanagement of one of their agents, who had since been removed, but their success was of such a character as to encourage them to proceed.—A special meeting of the Great Ship Company has been held for the purpose of devising means to relieve the company from the pecuniary difficulties in which it is placed, and if possible to prevent the great ship from being seized and sold by the mortgagees. After a lengthened discussion it was agreed to appoint a committee to investigate the affairs, and to report to an adjourned meeting on the 12th instant.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.
The prospectus has been issued of the Llanberis Slate Company with a capital of £50,000, in 10,000 shares of £5 each. The proposal is to purchase the lease and work a slate quarry upon an estate formerly the property of the late Marquis of Anglesea. Very satisfactory terms, it is said, have been made for the purchase of the property, and the reports of the inspecting agents are highly favourable.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.
The current events in America have exercised greater influence in these departments than has been perceptible for some time past. The success of the Confederate arms and the growing indications of an early recognition of the South by the French Government, have caused traders to think more seriously of the extent to which their interests may be involved by the results that these important changes may bring about. The effect has been to render those holding American produce more desirous of realising, and those holding produce suitable to American requirements less disposed to part with their stocks. This effect is, however, modified very materially by the extent to which commercial affairs in general have, by dint of time, become regulated to the altered position in which they have been placed by the protracted war. In cotton, for instance, scarcely any change is noticed, available supplies having been so worked down as hardly to exceed the requirements from day to day, whilst in cotton manufactures the system, for a long time past, has been to work almost exclusively to order. A transition to lower prices under these circumstances would not, therefore, incur anything like the danger of collapse that would have existed some time back. Of American provisions the arrivals are also within the limits of actual demand, and prices are consequently firm. Some prime fresh mild bacon sides, just in from New York, have sold at 48s. per cwt. Fine American butters remain at 90s. and 94s., but lower rates would follow increased arrivals, as the market is by no means strong. American lard remains as last quoted. Our grain markets have become dull, but are not sensibly depressed. Petroleum is decidedly heavy, and prices tend in buyers' favour. French spirits of turpentine have further given way to 70s. per ton. In fish oils there is still but little doing, and American sperm is stationary at £80. The movements in tallows have been less extensive than of late, but have lent steady support to prices. Only a small portion of the tallow delivered off on contract has been offered for sale, whilst the trade have slightly extended their purchases. Holders of American tobacco are firm in consequence of the unfavourable crop reports, but the resort to substitutes checks any tendency to higher rates. In drugs and chemicals some variations have occurred. American oil peppermint has declined 9d. per lb. Lemon grass oil is a shade easier. Cape aloes have risen 1s. per cwt., and bichromate of potash ¼d. per lb. Camphor has receded from £7 (the price paid to execute some American orders) to £6 10s. per cwt. In gums, kowie is again the turn dealer. Dyestuffs generally are firm. Turmeric has recovered 2s. per cwt., and safflower has risen 5s. to 7s. 6d. The only change in metals is a further advance in the price of Scotch pig iron, the trade in other departments being dull.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSION.
The suspension has been announced of Messrs. Levy Brothers, of Fenchurch-street, engaged in the San Francisco and Havannah trades. The stoppage is attributed to the failure of remittances from New York. The books of the firm have been placed in the hands of Messrs. Quilter and Co., the accountants. The liabilities are estimated at between £40,000 to £50,000.

EXTENSIVE MERCANTILE FRAUD.

It has just transpired that Mr. George Thomson, of the firm of Messrs. Catto, Thomson, and Co., shipowners of Aberdeen, has disappeared leaving liabilities unpaid for to the extent, as variously stated, of £70,000 to £100,000, and which are attributed to unsuccessful stock and other speculations. It is affirmed that the house of Catto, Thomson, and Co., is perfectly solvent and that the business will be carried on as heretofore.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, October 7.

Only a moderate business has been transacted during the past week in our cotton market, and very little if any change has to be noticed. Prices are about the same as last week, though the tendency if anything is rather easier. But as the markets at Manchester still continue firm, caused by the general scarcity of yarns and cloth, there is no uneasy feeling; on the contrary, owing to the firm position of the other markets and the continued unsettled state of affairs in America, there appear to be reasonable grounds for the maintenance of present prices. Notwithstanding that the demand during the week has been comparatively moderate, the tone of the market continues good. The sales during the week have been 42,000 bales, of which 13,000 bales were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 1,915,470 bales, against 2,254,220 bales to the same period in 1862. The imports this year have been 1,172,284, and to the same period last year 8,655,503 bales. Exported this year 347,416 bales; same period in 1862, 337,137 bales. The stocks at present are computed at 193,340 bales; at the same period last year, 213,040 bales. Taken for consumption this year 1,021,100 bales; same period in 1862, 954,300 bales. Taken on speculation this year 964,290 bales; same in 1862, 905,020 bales. Prices remain precisely the same as last week.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, October 6.

Very little business has been transacted in this market during the past week, which is partly owing to the quiet state of the Liverpool market, comparatively speaking, and partly to the difficulty experienced by merchants in getting goods for anything like early delivery. Spinners and manufacturers generally being under contract, and not in a position to take further orders without delaying the execution of contracts taken previously.

The home-trade houses, which supply country drapers, are reported as very busy, in fact, more so than has been the case with them for the last two years.

Yarns of all kinds are held for extreme rates, and not the slightest disposition is shown by sellers to concede the smallest fraction.

India cloths of all kinds are in improved demand at the close of the week, and there is every probability of an advance taking place in the quotations for these goods especially.

TO THE PEOPLE OF GALLANT

OLD ENGLAND. Awake! awake!! Arise from your lethargy, and shake off the dew-drops that glitter on your garments, and look well to the signs of the times. Events fraught with the most momentous questions, involving no less a consideration than our liberties, are threatening to overwhelm us at this moment. For two years and a half a most wicked and fiendish war has been waged against the Confederate States of America, which war has received its chief support from this country, in violation of every law, human and Divine, the Queen's Proclamation, and against the dearest interests of this country. Strange and incomprehensible as it may seem, the Federal States, our old arch-enemy, without the slightest hindrance or objection from the English Government, has received every appliance of war, even to Greek fire, from us. During this very period a neutralizing neutrality has been practised with impunity, our friends, natural allies, and kinsmen, have been shamed, abused, and libelled beyond any civilized people on earth, insult added to injury, and the foulest duplicity and partiality, shielded and armoured-plated with the cry of neutrality, in opposition to the sympathies of all true-hearted Christians, have been practised against them. When urged to do justice to the South, the reply has always been "Neutrality!" while, at the same time the Government of the Federal States has really been aided in every possible way. We do not know that there has been an understanding between the Cabinets of England and Washington, and should be loth to believe it, —and think, on the contrary, that the same and true feeling of the country has only to be firmly made known, to induce a different course, but we do know that their actions have to a great degree been harmonious with regard to the Confederate States: both agreeing to an inefficient blockade, and therefore both opposed to any supplies going over from this country, which opposed to any recognition, and seemingly both agreed in allowing the capture of English vessels, even when bound to a neutral port. The Yankees have blockaded the Southern ports at great expense, but England at a much greater sacrifice, her commercial interests to a fear of War with the North. The so-called "neutrality" has been a mere cloak for the "greatest hardship," and inflicted a deeper wound than if England had sent an army of one hundred thousand men, to aid the Northern States to subjugate and starve out their Southern brethren. How strange and inexplicable has been our conduct towards the combatants!—the Confederate States having declared their open opposition to us, and their readiness to exchange cotton for manufactures, and in every case shown a continued desire for the most cordial relations with us, which hitherto we have refused. The Federal Government, on the contrary, has threatened, menaced, and insulted us almost continually, and openly declared that as soon as the South is conquered, they would declare war with us and take "Canada." President JEFFERSON DAVIS has stretched out the right hand of friendship to us with an olive branch, and we have given a serpent. President LINCOLN has approached us in a most hostile and warlike manner, with a drawn sword in one hand and an ignited thunderbolt charged with Greek fire in the other. Yet we give this blood-thirsty tyrant the cordial hand of fellowship, and maintain the most friendly relations with him in his ignominious crusade of fire and sword on this fairest portion of the earth. The sooner that support is withdrawn from the Washington Government, and the independence of the Confederate States of America recognised by us, the better for England's future prosperity, happiness, and character. Let us, therefore, co-operate in the common interest of humanity and justice in procuring the Recognition of a brave and suffering people. We are morally bound to finally decide what position we will occupy in regard to the great American war. From fear of offence to the North, we have acted as if the South ought not to be considered as having a right to existence: nay, we have, during this entire unprecedented struggle, given succour and support to the North, and remain her friendly ally. The time has arrived when we must decide whether in our opinion the North should blot out the South, or not, or whether the South ought to have her independence. The "London Confederate States Commercial League" firmly believes that a large majority of the freemen of this great nation are anxious to grasp the lion-hearted South in their arms, and welcome her into the family of nations. If the high character, bravery, honour, and heroic defence of their country entitle them to be free, then surely they merit our consideration. Who will be first to welcome them to the honours so richly merited? We invite all those that are in favour of the Recognition of the Independence of the "Confederate States of America" to unite with us in adopting the best means to accomplish that end. The importance of concert of action among the friends of this movement is earnestly urged by the "London Confederate States Commercial League," who are anxious to communicate with other associations, clubs, and friends as to the best means of a General Demonstration throughout the Empire. Offices open daily from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., at 7, St. Mildred's-court, Poultry, E.C. Meetings every Wednesday at one o'clock, p.m., at the above place. JAMES YEOMANS, Hon. Sec. September 14th, 1863.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLLY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COURTIS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

No. of Policies issued.	Sums.	Premiums.
1859 .. 605 ..	449,913 ..	14,070 1 6
1860 .. 741 ..	475,649 ..	14,071 17 7
1861 .. 785 ..	527,626 ..	16,553 2 9
1862 .. 1,637 ..	769,534 ..	23,641 0 0

Thus in five years the number of Policies issued was 5,623, assuring the large sum of £2,328,947.

The leading features of the Office are:—
1. Entire Security to Assurers.
2. The large bonus additions already declared, and the prospect of a further bonus at the next investigation.
3. The advantages afforded by the varied Tables of Premiums—unrestricted Conditions of Policies—and general liberality in dealing with the Assured.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The nearest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathize with the sufferings of the following men.

Contribution will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZ, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Rod Byron.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The only item in the latest intelligence from New York that gives anything like a clear conception of the military progress of the respective belligerents is the announcement under date of October 12th, that—"the anxiety concerning the military situation in Virginia and Tennessee has caused an advance in gold, which is now quoted at 51½ per cent. premium." This indicates that the Federals consider their military situation critical—and that we must ascribe the remarkable paucity of military news to the fact of tidings being kept back that are favourable to the Confederates, though enough is allowed to leak out to manifest the reasonableness of the anxiety. One day it is asserted that the communication between Nashville and Chattanooga is cut off, and a little later we are as positively informed that it is not so. At one time General Bragg's forces are estimated at 100,000 men, and then that he has 175,000 men, and that General Joseph Johnston has a reserved force of 55,000 troops. But it needs not any exaggeration to make the authorities at Washington feel nervous about the position of Rosecrans. He is in an enemy's country, at a long distance from his base of operation, with a beaten army fronted by a powerful enemy, in the flush of victory, and with his communications constantly harassed and threatened. The game of war is not exactly like a game of chess, or the Federals would be justified in despairing, instead of being only anxious about the safety of Rosecrans. In the meantime Burnside is reported to have retired from Knoxville, and Shelbyville is said to have been captured with all the Federal forces, estimated at 15,000 men. M'Minville was attacked by the Confederates on the 3rd, and telegraphic communication was soon after suspended, which points to a Confederate success. If we turn to Virginia we find the Federal prospects no brighter than they are in Tennessee. The force of General Lee is so far from being depleted to reinforce General Bragg, as alleged by the Federals, that it is now admitted that General Meade is opposed by a well disciplined and numerically powerful army. General Lee has executed one of those flank movements—Hill's corps having passed from the left to the right of Meade's front—that have so often been the forerunners of severe disaster to the Federals. In the rear of the Northern army "guerillas" are actively engaged, and on the night of the 1st, Fort Beckwith, which is within ten miles of Washington, was attacked, several of the guard were killed and wounded, twenty taken prisoners, and sixty horses and many arms and equipments captured:—and this, be it remembered, is the Federal account. Nor is there any news from Charleston to inspire the North. The Government have suppressed the accounts they have received. All we hear is that Sumter has been put into a defensible state; that Gilmore has had to withdraw from Morris Island to Folly Island; and that on the 6th the Federal fleet was attacked, the Ironsides "was much damaged, and the other vessels of the fleet greatly alarmed for their safety." So carefully are the facts connected with recent operations at Charleston concealed, that there is a strong probability that the Confederates have gained an important victory. The only success claimed by the Federals is that General M'Cook had the best of a skirmish with some of General Wheeler's force, killing and wounding 120, and capturing 87 prisoners and some Federal property previously taken by General Wheeler. Even against this the Confederates have a set-off in the defeat of a Federal cavalry brigade near Robertsons River (Virginia). In Kansas the Confederates are advancing on Fort Scott and Kansas city, the State militia has been called out, and the Confederates have captured General Blunt's staff. It will be a happy result of this movement if it should check the horrible border warfare now raging, and it shows that the South is better able to protect her borders than the North, which has confessed her inability to restore or enforce order in Kansas. The rumour of a Federal defeat above Port Hudson was believed in New York.

We copy elsewhere from the Richmond Sentinel those passages relating to Mr. James Spence, of Liverpool, upon which the Northern press and their coadjutors in England, with characteristic malignity, have based certain perverted statements intended to be injurious to that gentleman. It may be well to remark, that as regards the statement of facts, the passages quoted are entitled to no other credit than as simple newspaper reports, unsupported thus far by positive information, but they demonstrate clearly that the Enquirer's attacks on Mr. Spence, over which some of our contemporaries gloat so much, are dictated by a personal dislike, not so much of him, as of a member of President Davis's Cabinet. So far from the Richmond Enquirer representing the feelings of the Southern Government or people toward Mr. Spence, those feelings are—and we are in a position to add our own testimony to that of the Richmond Sentinel—sincere admiration for his eminent talents, and a warm gratitude for the invaluable services he has rendered them by an advocacy as unselfish and as zealous as it is masterly and effective.

Another Russian fleet is announced shortly to arrive at San Francisco, California. We pointed out last week the obvious meaning of the presence of the seven men-of-war in New York harbour. If any doubt still lingered in the minds of our readers it must now be removed by this open manoeuvre of placing in readiness the naval resources of both the Eastern or Asiatic and the Western or European faces of this unwieldy empire, and of menacing at once the transatlantic and the oriental commerce of its possible adversaries. From an extract from the New York World, which appears elsewhere, it will be seen that the most rational portion of the Northern American press takes substantially the same views that we have expressed. The Southern papers congratulate their readers on the Yankee-Russian alliance, on the ground, in the words of the Richmond Dispatch, that such an alliance would raise such issues "as could not long be deferred, and would no doubt be settled in favour of the peace and security of the world from the unscrupulousness, the atrocities, and brutalities of the worst members of the family of civilised nations."

It appears that there are persons credulous enough to believe the Federal Government. Relying on repeated assurances that the Mississippi is open for trade, sundry vessels have been despatched, and the result is that nearly all of them have learnt from experience that the Mississippi is only open to iron-clads, and that it never can be open to trade, so long as the Confederates are in possession of the country on either side. A voyage up or down the Mississippi is vastly more hazardous than running the blockade at Charleston or Wilmington.

Besides the loss from the operations of the Confederates a large number of steamboats are being destroyed by incendiaries. The Ruth, having on board two millions of dollars in greenbacks for General Grant's army, was burned a few miles below Cairo. The Robert Campbell was burned near Milliken's Bend, and this catastrophe involved the loss of twenty-two lives. The steamers Chancellor, Forest Queen, and Catahoula were burned at St. Louis, at the levee, on the 4th inst., the two latter boats being totally destroyed. On the 13th ultimo, the Imperial, Hawatha, Post Boy, and I. K. Bell, were burned at the same place. The Hope, engaged in the Memphis and St. Louis trade, and at Memphis the Champion, a fine vessel valued at $80,000, have likewise been destroyed. The Choteau was fired, but partially saved by sinking her. Naturally these events have caused a great deal of alarm and panic. The incendiaries are said to be negroes in the employ of the Confederates.

In another part of our impression will be found a letter to the Editor from the officers of the Manchester Southern Independence Association, stating concisely, but clearly and frankly, the motives and object of the Association, and the relations—purely those of political friendship and of cordial sympathy—which it holds to the Government and people of the Confederate States. We need hardly say that, although the letter is suggested by our remarks of last week, those remarks were not intended by us as criticism or censure, but only to indicate the Southern point of view of the incidental question of slavery. We believe that the Association will the more surely and speedily accomplish its noble work from its being genuinely and independently English in tone, feeling, and policy; and though it will be some time before Southerners will be able to see their own institutions through English spectacles, they will not the less give their heartfelt prayers to the labours of an association which has so many titles to their lasting gratitude.

From Texas, or, as the western lobe of the Southern Confederacy is technically termed, the Trans-Mississippi Department, the Richmond papers have full and cheering news of recent date. "The Confederacy, which was to have been utterly destroyed through the bisection which was the object of so much blood and treasure in acquiring command of the great river, appears, polyposus-like, to have equal vitality in each of its severed parts. A council of governors, consisting of Governor Moore, of Louisiana, Lubbock, of Texas, Flanagan, of Arkansas, and Reynolds, of Missouri, which holds its sessions at Marshall, Texas, supplies in sudden emergencies the place of a provisional government. The feelings of the people are described as enthusiastically loyal to the Confederacy, and confident of triumphantly repelling the expected Federal invasion. Recruiting was going on most vigorously. Men and boys were flocking to the ranks. Camps of instruction were established in various parts of the country, the largest being at Bonham. A large foundry for casting and rifling cannon was just commencing work, and other establishments for supplying munitions of war were approaching completion. Valuable stores had also arrived from Mobile, running the double blockade. Owing to the vast influx of population, white and black refugees from the Mississippi valley, and the excellent harvests of the last season, such had been the accumulation of capital and the development of industry that the people scarcely felt the pressure of the war. Provisions were abundant. Good beef on the hoof sold at eight cents a pound; vegetables were cheap, and, thanks to the accumulation of imported goods through Mexico and Matamoros, coffee was only thirty-five cents a pound, and other foreign commodities in proportion. Gold and silver were quoted at 500 in Confederate currency. Cotton-picking commenced in August; the old stock on hand is estimated at 150,000 bales. All the crops are represented as unprecedentedly large, and there was corn and wheat enough to supply the west bank of the Mississippi for two full years. The only shadow in this glowing picture is that, owing to the occasional interruption of communication with the East, distressing rumours were sometimes prevalent, such as that President Davis had died, that General Lee had been superseded; but the people had ceased to believe in reports so often falsified. General Kirby Smith, assisted by Generals Magruder and Taylor, was in the chief command. His headquarters were at Shreveport. The full returns of the recent Texas elections were not yet in, but sufficient was known to indicate that Pendleton Murrah was elected Governor; J. S. Stockdale, Lieutenant-Governor; S. Crosby, Commissioner of the General Land-office; C. Herbert, A. M. Branch, and J. B. Sexton, to Congress. In another district the election was contested between Messrs. Wilcox and Hunter.

General Lee's official report of the late campaign in Pennsylvania has been published. This document states that it was undertaken to withdraw the Northern army from a position in which it could not be attacked with advantage; to transfer hostilities to the north of the Potomac, and so relieve the Shenandoah Valley, which had been occupied with troops during the winter and spring; and to break up the Federal plan of campaign by compelling the enemy to consume part of the season for active operations in forming new combinations. Besides these advantages, it was hoped that other valuable results might be obtained, but General Lee says nothing about an intention to essay the capture of Philadelphia or Washington, which was ascribed to him by Yankee trepidation. The march of the Confederates was, as our readers are aware, for the first few days totally unopposed, and the country was left to their mercy. General Lee did not retaliate for the Federal barbarities committed on Confederate soil, but on the contrary, private property was rigidly respected. The movement of General Lee's army commenced on June 3rd, the main body crossed the Potomac on the 24th, and on the 27th the whole army was at Chambersburg. Preparations were made to advance upon Harrisburg, but the design was abandoned on the 29th, in consequence of information that the Federal army was moving northwards, and so menacing the communications of the Confederate army with the Potomac. To check the Federal advance, Generals Longstreet, Hill, and Ewell, were ordered to proceed to Gettysburg. On the 1st of July, Hill's division—joined by Ewell's division during the engagement—came up with the Federals, who were driven through Gettysburg with heavy loss, including about 5,000 prisoners and several pieces of artillery. The Federals retreated to a high range of hills, and the attack was not pressed that afternoon as the Confederates did not know the force of the enemy. "It had not," says General Lee, "been intended to fight a general battle at such a distance from our base, unless attacked by the enemy; but finding ourselves unexpectedly confronted by the Federal army, it became a matter of difficulty to withdraw through the mountains with our large trains. At the same time the country was unfavourable for collecting supplies while in the presence of the enemy's main body, as he was enabled to restrain our foraging parties by occupying the passes of the mountains with regular and local troops. A battle thus became in a measure unavoidable. Encouraged by the successful issue of the engagement of the first day, and in view of the valuable results which would ensue from the defeat of the army of General Meade, it was thought advisable to renew the attack." At two o'clock in the afternoon of the 2nd, the Federal position was assaulted, and when darkness put an end to the fight, it was found that Longstreet and Ewell had obtained partial successes which seemed to promise a complete Confederate triumph on the following day. On the afternoon of the 3rd, the contest was renewed, and lasted till sunset. "Our troops," says General Lee, "succeeded in entering the advanced works of the enemy, and getting possession of some of his batteries; but our artillery having nearly expended its ammunition, the attacking columns became exposed to the heavy fire of the numerous batteries near the summit of the ridge, and after a most determined and gallant struggle were compelled to relinquish their advantage and fall back to their original positions with severe loss." Owing to the strength of the Federal position, and the scarcity of Confederate ammunition, it was impossible to renew the engagement. During the day succeeding the battle—the 4th—the Confederate army remained at Gettysburg, and at night began to retire, carrying away 4000 prisoners (nearly 2000 had been previously paroled), but leaving behind the enemy's wounded, which had fallen into the hands of the Confederates on the 1st and 2nd. The march was so slow, owing to a severe storm, that the rear of the column did not leave Gettysburg until after daylight on the 5th. No important effort was made to impede the march, and on the morning of the 7th the army reached Hagerstown. General Lee graphically describes his situation at that point. "The Potomac," he says, "was found to be so much swollen by the rains that had fallen almost incessantly since our entrance into Maryland as to be unfordable. Our communications with the south side were thus interrupted, and it was difficult to procure either ammunition or subsistence; the latter difficulty being enhanced by the high waters impeding the working of neighbouring mills. The trains with the wounded and prisoners were compelled to await at Williamsport the subsiding of the river and the construction of boats, as the pontoon bridge left at Falling Waters had been partially destroyed. The enemy had not yet made his appearance, but as he was in a condition to obtain large reinforcements, and our situation, for the reasons above mentioned, was becoming daily more embarrassing, it was deemed advisable to recross the river. Part of the pontoon-bridge was recovered, and new boats built, so that by the 13th a good bridge was thrown over the river at Falling Waters." On the 12th the Federals came up, but instead of attacking the Confederates, commenced fortifying their lines; and leaving them to do this at their leisure, General Lee crossed the Potomac in face of the enemy, "with no loss of material except a few disabled wagons and two pieces of artillery which the horses were unable to move through the deep mud. Before fresh horses could be sent for them the rear of the column had passed." A few stragglers were also taken by the Federals. General Lee gratefully acknowledges the gallantry and devotion of his troops, and concludes his modest report with a few words of kindly remembrance of the "brave officers and patriotic gentlemen who fell in the faithful discharge of their duty, leaving the army to mourn their loss and emulate their noble examples."

President Lincoln, has, to employ a sporting phrase, made a book against Providence. On the 3rd of October, he set apart the 26th of November as a day of national thanksgiving, or in other words, informed his subjects that in fifty-four days after date Federal affairs would be flourishing. This novel edition of Mr. Seward's drafts has not restored confidence in the North, nor did it improve the value of greenbacks. Mr. Lincoln avers that the strength and vigour of the nation have increased, and adds, that the country "is permitted to expect a continuance of years with large increase of freedom." In a country where political and even personal liberty are things of the past, it must be confessed that a large increase of freedom is possible, though not probable. Mr. Lincoln says "the laws have been respected and obeyed, and harmony has prevailed everywhere, except in the theatre of the military conflict." What about the New York riots? What about the state of affairs in the West? How is it the prisons are full of political offenders? If the harmony was so perfect why was the habeas corpus suspended?

On the 30th September, a Republican Mass Meeting was held at the Cooper Institute, New York. The principal speech of the evening was delivered by Vice-President Hamlin, and the pith of it, was that the Union was victorious, the "rebellion" nearly crushed, and that the Democrats were the only hindrance to peace—that is, a peace to be decided by fighting, not by negotiation. Mr. Hamlin did not use the stereotyped phrases about Union feeling in the South, but he admitted with great frankness the existence of much disunion in the North. He essayed a few coarse jokes, of which we may cite as a specimen his reference to Mr. Brookes. He said—"Don't speak that name. It was one of God's providences that the creature was born in Maine. But, gentlemen, we couldn't help it. If we had had the ordering of it, it should have been otherwise, I assure you." Another humorous sally was—"We are to be successful. And who doubts it is a political infidel. And who doubts it may as well believe that God has deserted our Government and country." Mr. Seward did not attend the meeting, but he wrote a letter of apology, in which he observes, "Until the present crisis the Union has been maintained without real solicitude about either soldiers, seamen, or treasure. Now that these are contributed so bountifully and so cheerfully, God forbid that the Union should perish for want of the first and most necessary element of national life, voters." When Mr. Seward wrote the above, he and those whom he addressed knew that the Northern commanders are clamoring for reinforcements, that high bounties have failed to obtain recruits, that the conscription has been tried in vain, and that desertion is the order of the day; that seamen cannot be obtained to put the ships of the navy in commission; and that Mr. Chase is in great difficulty to sustain the credit of the greenbacks. When Mr. Seward wrote that soldiers, seamen, and treasure are contributed "cheerfully and bountifully," he knew that the first can only be obtained in insufficient numbers and have to be driven into Mr. Lincoln's "slaughter-pens" manacled like felons; that the second are so scarce that "contrabands" are enlisted; and that the Federal Government dare not collect the Federal taxes. What he means by the "crisis" and the danger to the Union for the want of voters is, that there may not be votes enough to keep him in office, and that he is afraid that the Administration may be beaten at the ballot-box. The Secretary is unduly nervous. He forgets that Mr. Lincoln is a despotic sovereign at the head of a large army, and that under such circumstances it is even easier to manufacture republican majorities than it is to print greenbacks.

JUDGE DENIO, the Presiding Judge of the Court of Appeals, has pronounced an elaborate opinion upon the question of the Federal Treasury Notes being a legal tender. The wording of the Constitution of the United States is too definite for misconception. The Federal Government is entrusted with specified functions and powers; and the powers not conferred are withheld and reserved by the Sovereign States. For the convenience of trade the States agreed that the Federal Government should alone have the power of coining money to circulate in each and all of the United States; upon the principle and with the object that some of our social reformers advocate the adoption of a common coinage by the nations of Europe. The authorisation "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin," cannot by any quibbling be made to cover the issue of paper as a legal tender. To coin money means the coining of the precious metals, just as the "foreign coin" referred to in the same clause means "metallic money," and not the paper issues of foreign governments. That the Federal Government has the constitutional right to issue treasury notes Judge Denio does not dispute. The Government may give as security to its lenders any form of bill or note it may think proper, but it must not by such contracts seek to bind persons who are not parties to them; or, in other words, it may not, under the Constitution, make the security it gives for borrowed money a legal tender. The State of New York would have an equal right to compel the citizens of Pennsylvania to receive in payment of debts due to them from citizens of New York treasury notes or bonds issued by the government of New York. The constitutional course for the Federal Government would be to meet the public expenditure by taxes, and that resource failing, by the sale of the public property or by borrowing money on the security of the Federal taxation. These limitations were wisely conceived but are ineffectual. If the United States Government had taxed the people the war would long ago have come to an end. It is perhaps a waste of time to show how thoroughly unconstitutional are the proceedings of the Lincoln Government; for even the few who think the North justified in waging war against the South cannot deny that such a policy has of necessity brought about the destruction of the Federal Constitution. The Confederate States, in the extremity of their financial strait have never imitated the unconstitutional acts of the Washington Government and have never declared their issues legal tender.

The Governors of Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Missouri met at Marshall, Texas, in August, on the invitation of the Lieutenant-General commanding the Trans-Mississippi Department, to confer with judges, Confederate Senators, and other distinguished citizens, on the means to be taken for the defence of the common country. In an address issued by the Governors to the peoples of their States, they announce that though the fall of Vicksburg has to some extent interrupted the communication between the two sections of the Confederacy, it will not expose either one to the power of the enemy, since each has been made, so far as military resources are concerned, independent of the other. They observe that "the warning given by the fall of New Orleans has not been unheeded, and the interval since that event has been used to develop the great resources of this Department. We now are self-dependent, and also self-sustaining. With our own manufactories of cannon, arms, powder, and other munitions of war, the mines opened and factories established, with cotton as a basis of financial measures, and with abundance of food, we are able to conduct a vigorous defence, and seize occasion for offensive operations against the enemy." The address announces the formation of a committee of Public Safety, composed of the Executives of the States, and of which committee the Governor of Missouri is the present chairman.

Mr. Blair, the Federal Postmaster-General, delivered an address at a Union meeting held on the 3rd inst. at Rockville, Maryland, in which he condemned the policy of the Abolitionists as being reactionary; declaring that their object was not to restore the Union, but to reduce the South to the condition of Territories, and to enhance their own political importance. He entered into a long argument to prove that the "rebellion" of the citizens of a State could not disfranchise it, that the Federal Government had no right to reduce a State to the condition of a Territory, but was bound by the Federal compact to guarantee to each State a republican form of government. In concluding his address he said, it is not improbable that the Abolitionists, "though aiming at a different result, will be found co-operating in the end with the conspirators of the South and their foreign allies. They may prefer parting with the South to partnership and equality under the Constitution." This speech of Mr. Blair's has caused considerable sensation. It may, perhaps, only be an electioneering dodge to secure Democratic votes for the Administration. On the other hand it may be a manifestation of that dissension in the Lincoln Cabinet which has been so frequently reported. But whatever the motive of the speech, it is remarkable as a bitter denunciation of the party which supports the Government of which Mr. Blair is a member.

The pamphlet "La France, le Mexique, et les Etats Confédérés" ascribed to the pen of M. Chevalier has given rise to an animated discussion in the Federal press. It has been translated for the New York World, and the translation has been copied into other Northern papers. In one respect there is much unanimity in the Federal journals, that is they treat the recognition of the Confederate States by France as a foregone conclusion. The World says:—"It will be difficult, we think, for any intelligent American to read the pamphlet in cool blood without coming to the conclusion that it accurately portrays the almost necessary drift of events around us at the present time. . . . It must bring home for the first time to hundreds and thousands of Americans the overwhelming fact that the intervention, or let us more accurately say, the involution, of European Powers in our great struggle, has become at last a question of time, and only of time."

On Tuesday evening the Rev. H. W. Beecher addressed a crowded meeting at Exeter Hall on the American question. Mr. Beecher did not offer any original suggestions, but gave a summary of the various arguments that have been used by Federal agents for the last three years in justification of their war policy. He compared the vast and sovereign States of the late Union to English counties, but the war has made the geography of America and American history so familiar to Europe that no one will be deceived by such a comparison. He said that the North got rid of slavery at its own cost, ignoring the facts that the North did not get rid of slavery until coloured labour became unprofitable, and that the North, sold its slaves to the South, and got rid of slavery and negroes simultaneously. He praised the North for tolerating slavery in the South during the last eighty years, although he cannot but remember that in the debates in Congress about the suppression of the slave trade at the commencement of the present century the South advocated and the North opposed the abolition of the slave traffic; he cannot forget that slavery was not abolished in the State of New York until 1825; and it was also odd in Mr. Beecher to assert that the North had been opposed to slavery for eighty years, seeing that quite recently he stated that at the outset of his career his abolitionism was vehemently opposed in the North, and certainly he is not eighty years old, and did not preach in his cradle. We have been accustomed to treat the Judiciary of the United States with profound respect, and to honour the memory of many illustrious men who have sat upon the judgment seat. Mr. Beecher says we are wrong, and that "the Court were filled with Southern judges. . . . Servile judges." Mr. Beecher said the Southerners "had robbed our arsenals; they had made bankrupt our treasury; they held the most important offices in the army and navy; they had the advantage of having long anticipated and prepared for the conflict." Mr. Beecher must know that the South was not prepared for the conflict, had no arms or stores of ammunition, had not even her share of arms from the Federal arsenals, had not formed even the nucleus of a navy to protect her sea and river cities. Mr. Beecher cannot be so ignorant of the government of his country as not to know that the appointments to the army were equally distributed throughout the States; and he is of course aware that so far from the Federal treasury being beggared the finances had been so managed that no Government on earth could boast of such freedom from debt as did that of the United States when the South seceded. With singular frankness Mr. Beecher admitted the object of the war on the part of the North. In answer to the question, "Why not let the South go?" he replied, "Oh! if the Southerners only would go! but the fact is they are determined to stay. That is the trouble. We would gladly furnish them with a free passage if they would take their departure; but then we say 'that territory which you inhabit is ours, and we do not choose to have it wrested from us.'" He did not explain by what title the 800,000 square miles inhabited by the Southerners belongs to the Northerners, but that is an unimportant matter; he tells us clearly enough what the north is fighting for. Mr. Lincoln wants to get rid of the negroes by deportation, and Mr. Beecher wants to get rid of the white population, by deportation if possible, or if not then by other means, so that the Northerners may possess the land they did not create, or colonise, or purchase, and which no more belongs to them than does Great Britain. There is nothing new about this frank confession of Mr. Beecher's, but it was curious to make on an English platform. Mr. Beecher's reputation as a speaker has attracted large audiences, but he has not sustained his trans-Atlantic reputation.

In his Thanksgiving Proclamation, Mr. Lincoln says, "The laws have been respected and obeyed, and harmony has prevailed everywhere except in the theatre of war." The Dubuque Herald tells us how this obedience and harmony are enforced. It says, "White men are forced from families entirely dependent on them for support; they are driven in chains and guarded by Federal soldiers at the point of the bayonet to and from the termini of railroads; they are flogged upon the bare back until they beg for mercy and gasp and faint under the still rapidly applied lash; they are placed in the foremost of the battle and treated with every indignity and every cruelty; and yet the scene excites no 'special wonder.' They are white men, not negroes. Were the blacks so inhumanly treated, the pen of a Stowe would be bidden write; the silver-voiced Phillips would hurl barbed anathemas into the ranks of the oppressor, and maudlin poets would distil their grief and coin it into song. But it is the white man who suffers, and whose oppressors find a thousand ready-tongued apologists. It is the white man's family that is separated, the white man who is chained, the white man who is flogged, the white man who is made a living barrier to the bullets of the enemy."

The Yankees asserted that the Hon. J. H. Watts, Governor-Elect of Alabama, was a Reconstructionist. Mr. Watts has taken the trouble to deny this slander, in a letter addressed to his friend Colonel J. R. Foster, of Georgia. He says:—"If those who claim my election as indicating any such feeling in Alabama had read my letter of 21st March to General Lawler, and my short address to the people of Alabama, dated 8th June last, they would never have entertained such false notions. It is due to the gallant people of my State to call attention to the resolution of the recently-called session of the Legislature, passed unanimously, pledging all the men and resources of the State to prosecute the war until the independence of the Confederate States is fully established. For myself I will not forfeit my self-respect by arguing the question of 'reconstruction.'"

The Federal Census Officer has prepared a table which shows that the number of United States citizens in 1860 who were born abroad, was 4,136,000. Of these 1,611,000 were from Ireland, 430,000 from England, from Scotland 105,000, from Wales 45,000, and from British America 259,000; together making 2,450,000. Thus three-fifths of the immigrants were British subjects, and of the remainder 1,300,000 were Germans, and the rest, 386,000, were from various countries, including 109,000 from France and 71,000 from Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. The total number of immigrants from Africa was 300: rather an odd illustration of Yankee love for the negro. Certainly the negro does not find a country and a home in what is facetiously called the free North.

General Schenck is carrying on a successful campaign in Maryland. Day after day this gallant commander continues his war upon the ladies, dragging them from their homes, and either imprisoning them or sending them across the lines. On the 29th ult., Mrs. Kane and her daughter were arrested at their house in Baltimore and sent South, it being proved that Mrs. Kane had been guilty of the crime of corresponding with her son, who is in the Confederate army. Another triumph of General Schenck deserves mention. A Mr. Johnson wrote to the Rev. F. Gibson, of Baltimore, Principal of the Chestnut Hill School, to ask him to receive his son. Mr. Gibson replied that his school was full, and that if it were otherwise he could not comply with the request, as his pupils were Southern in their sentiments (which is a matter of course in a Maryland school), and that he knew Mr. Johnson was a Unionist. A gentleman would have thanked Mr. Gibson for his honourable candour, but Mr. Johnson is a Yankee, and he sent the letter to Mr. Stanton. Mr. Stanton communicated the affair to General Schenck, and Mr. Gibson was arrested. Upon being informed that he was to be imprisoned, Mr. Gibson asked whether, as a citizen, he had any rights. To this Mr. Lincoln's officer replied with a jest that was worthy of his master and ought to win him promotion. He told Mr. Gibson that, "in case of his death he would not be deprived of the rights of sepulture."

The Yankees are not a little elated with the news from Japan, because, as they think, it foreshadows a difficulty for England. The New York Tribune says: "A successful defence of a Japanese prince against the British, who, because of their arrogance, are the most hated of all foreigners, cannot fail to elate the native mind, and to swell the number of the anti-foreign party. It may greatly complicate the relations of England and Japan and prepare the way for a long and more general war." The Tribune concludes with a reminder that "American shipbuilders would be able to equip as many privateers for Japanese service as England has fitted out to prey upon American commerce." The Yankees should be careful, or Earl Russell may be frightened into resistance, as he has been terrified into submission, by Federal bullying.

Judge Robert L. Caruthers has been elected Confederate Governor of Tennessee. He was at one time a member of Congress from Tennessee. He was elected Supreme Judge of that State in 1852, and held the position until 1861.

The Federals have at length met with a long-dreaded and terrible enemy. Yellow fever, of rather a virulent type, has broken out among the crews of the fleet lying at New Orleans.

The Mobile papers of the 23rd ultimo advertise for sale the cargoes of fifteen blockade runners.

ENGLAND.

THE Social Science Congress at Edinburgh brought its sittings to a termination on Wednesday, Oct. 14. On the previous Saturday the Hon. Lord Neaves delivered his inaugural address on Punishment and Reformation. His lordship dwelt particularly on the contrast between the Irish and English systems, and leant strongly in favour of the former, the use of which would institute, in place of existing arrangements, an intermediate prison, with a state of transition from confinement to freedom, which would keep up the superintendence of the police upon those obtaining remissions, and which would provide ultimately some classified means of confinement and employment for the incorrigible. The English system had, in his opinion, hopelessly broken down, and the Irish system had been a great success. In the Public Health Department, a remarkable paper was contributed by Miss Nightingale, on the extraordinary death-rate of native children in the colonial schools. She had returns from 143 schools in Ceylon, Australia, Natal, West Coast of Africa, and British North America, with a total average attendance of 9,938 pupils. She found that the death-rate among the native children was double that among the whites. She also dwelt on the disappearance of the aboriginal races before the colonist. She proposed, by way of remedial measures, some system of settlements on the Moravian or other principles, for the purpose of winning the people gradually to civilisation; the total prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors to the native tribes; and a method of education looking primarily to physical results. Has it never struck Miss Nightingale that in the Southern States alone are the white and black found side by side without these deadly results to the inferior race? On the following day, Mr. J. Anderson, Q.C., read a paper on International Law, in which he adverted to the refusal of the United States to concur with the resolutions of the congress at Paris in 1856. He showed that the Federals have been the first sufferers by that refusal, inasmuch as their commerce was now at the mercy of Confederate privateers—a point in which we submit that he is hopelessly wrong, as the Confederate ships of war are not privateers. Mr. Anderson advocated the immunity of all private property on the seas from capture in war. He also alluded to the Trent affair, an event which resulted, in his opinion, in a great triumph of international law. Mr. Fawcett combated the views of Mr. Anderson on the desirableness of freeing private property from capture, for he believed that war was most humane when the greatest amount of property and the least amount of life was destroyed. He considered the present tendency of international law entirely wrong, and that the protecting private property and abolishing blockades would tend to increase war, because it would make war less disastrous.

The annual dinner of the Association was attended by about 500 ladies and gentlemen, Lord Brougham being in the chair. In responding to the toast of his own health, his lordship, in the course of his speech, said that when he heard of North America issuing a proclamation to emancipate the slaves, he knew very well that it was not for the sake of emancipating the slaves, but for the sake of beating the whites. It was a measure of hostility of the most detestable kind, by raising an insurrection of slaves against their masters, which only the patience of the negro prevented from succeeding. They called out for the extermination of the whites, not in order to liberate the blacks, but to restore the Union. The Union, and not the negro, was the object of the proclamation, and to that proclamation he (Lord Brougham) could not give any kind of support.

The Church Congress was opened at Manchester on Tuesday, the 13th October, with a sermon preached at the Cathedral by the Dean of Chichester, and the first meeting was held on the afternoon of that day in the Free Trade Hall, in the presence of nearly 4,000 persons. The Bishop of Manchester presided. After an introductory address from his Lordship, papers were read by Mr. Birley and Mr. Murray Dale on "Church Extension," and a discussion ensued, in which Archdeacons Bickersteth and Utterson took a prominent part. The general opinion seemed to be that the ancient principle of parochial organization should be scrupulously observed, and that no parish should exceed the number of 5,000 souls. It was further shown that in the present century more than 3,000 new churches have been erected, at a cost of eleven millions sterling. This discussion was followed by a most interesting and elaborate paper "on Church Architecture," by Mr. A. J. B. Beresford Hope, in which a model of a perfect church was portrayed, the principle and plan being based throughout on precedent, and the state of the law as deduced from the Liturgy and the Canons. The internal arrangement was explained with great minuteness, it being assumed that the old English Gothic style was by the common sense of all people recognized as the most appropriate for the place of religious worship. A letter was then read from Mr. E. B. Denison, Q.C., on the same subject, the argument contained in which was an absolute condemnation of the theory that architecture consisted in "ornamentation." The writer was entirely for "proportion," the real beauties of which were entirely lost sight of in the present craving for excessive height in the construction of the modern towers, and the division of small churches into as many parts as a cathedral. It was also shown that a church of fair area for its size could be built for £1 a foot of area, while for 30s. a foot upon the whole area one might have a tower of suitable size at the west end of the nave, and for £2 a spire of good height. On the second day a somewhat stormy discussion arose on the reading of a paper by Canon Stowell "on the Supply and Training of Ministers." It was admitted by every speaker that the Church was not adequately supplied with men of education and intellect such as the more enlightened classes could look to with respect. Opinions differed, however, on the remedies to be adopted for this crying evil. The origin of the mischief was traced by many of the speakers to the small pecuniary remuneration offered by the Church, and this theory seemed to meet the views of the majority of the assembly. Mr. Stowell, however, believed that the declarations necessary on ordination excluded many thoughtful men, and proposed the repeal of that demanded by the Act of Uniformity, a suggestion that called forth a storm of disapprobation from the assembly. On the same day a discussion took place on the Established Church in Ireland with such vigour as to give rise to a passage of arms between the Bishop of Oxford and the Rev. Canon M'Neile. The latter, while pressing upon the heads of the Church in Ireland the immediate reform of its present constitution, and declaring that the Protestant Church in Ireland had not been permitted to convert the Roman Catholics, and was therefore not open to the charge of incompetency on that score was ready nevertheless to stake the preservation of the Protestant Church on the following issue—namely, that if Romanism were saving Christianity, then withdraw the Church of Ireland; but if Romanism were anti-Christian, then sustain it. The Bishop of Oxford interpreted this expression to mean that no individual member of the Church of Rome was in a condition to be saved. This meaning Mr. M'Neile repudiated. He believed that Romanism was not saving Christianity, but was not committed to the statement that no individual Romanist could be saved. For he knew that in the Roman Catholic Church there were many who did not hold the tenets of that church. If by this statement Mr. M'Neile meant to say that the only members of the Church of Rome who could be saved were those who professed to belong to that Church, but did not believe her teaching, then in our opinion Mr. M'Neile stands committed to a statement unworthy of any man with the smallest pretensions to honesty. For he selects as the saved of the Church the men who stand convicted as traitors to her. However, as the concluding portion of the reverend gentleman's speech was lost amid the cheers and shouts of the assembly, it is just possible that he may have been misrepresented. Other interesting papers were also read and discussed—on "Lay co-operation," "Free and open churches," on the "Offertory," on "Clergy discipline," on "Church music," the "Management of large parishes," on "Parochial mission women," and on the "Growth of the Church in Lancashire."

On Friday, the 16th of October, a meeting was held of the members of the Southern Club at Liverpool. A large number of merchants of high repute, and several ladies, were present, the object of the meeting being to hear an address from Mr. Beresford-Hope. Mr. Victor Poutz presided, and, in introducing Mr. Hope, thanked him for the noble efforts which he had made to obtain from the British Government that recognition which the South had a right to expect. Mr. Hope, who was enthusiastically received, made a speech of considerable length and of great eloquence. The more important parts of the speech will be found in another part of our paper. On the evening of the same day, Mr. Hope was entertained at dinner by Mr. Spence, at the rooms of the club. After the dinner the company, in the deepest silence, drank to the memory of the illustrious General Jackson.

Colonel Lamar, of the Confederate States army, was present on Friday, the 16th of October, at the annual dinner of the Chertsey Agricultural Society. Mr. W. S. Lindsay, M.P., Mr. Briscoe, M.P., Mr. G. Cubitt, M.P., and Mr. Caird, M.P., were among the company. Mr. Lindsay, in the course of the evening, proposed the health of Colonel Lamar, and that gentleman addressed the meeting in a powerful and eloquent speech, which was received with a succession of cheers and the most marked cordiality.

Her Majesty the Queen of England has, to the delight of her subjects, appeared once more at a public ceremony. The town of Aberdeen had erected a statue to the late Prince Consort, subscribed for by the noblemen and gentlemen of the county and city. The Queen, having been respectfully informed that on Tuesday, October 15, the inauguration of the statue took place, determined to honour the occasion by her presence, deeming, doubtless, that there could be no better opportunity for breaking through the mournful privacy of nearly two years than that which enabled her to pay a fresh tribute to the memory of the Prince Consort. On that day, then, Her Majesty came from Balmoral, attended by the Crown Prince of Prussia and the Crown Princess, her eldest daughter, by the Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, and by the young Princes and Princesses, and was met at Aberdeen by Prince Alfred. At the Northern Club-House the Lord Provost presented the Queen with a respectful address in the name of the city and county, to which Her Majesty replied, and said "that she could not reconcile it to herself to remain at Balmoral while such a tribute was being paid to the memory of the Prince, without making an exertion to assure the people of Aberdeen personally of the deep and heartfelt sense which she entertained of their kindness and affection, and at the same time to proclaim in public the unbounded reverence and admiration, the devoted love, that filled her heart for him whose loss must throw a lasting gloom over all her future life." A few minutes afterwards the Royal party approached within a few yards of the statue, which was then uncovered. It is the work of Baron Marochetti, and is in bronze. The figure represents the Prince seated, with the robe of the Thistle over a field-marshal's uniform.

A practical joke worthy of an Irishman has been played on the Earl of Carlisle, the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. It appears that some years ago Lord Leitrim was shot at by a person who turned out to be a lunatic and was not hung for the offence. His Lordship, angry with the man for not being hung, and with the Government for not hanging him, had brooded over his wrongs and watched his opportunity for revenge. The Lord-Lieutenant had visited Ballinasloe fair, had made an excursion into the Connemara mountains, and was expected to sleep at Maam on Lough Corrib. The day of retribution had arrived. The solitary hotel at Maam belonged to Lord Leitrim, and the host thereof was his Lordship's devoted adherent. With the rapidity of thought a letter was despatched to the landlord commanding him as he valued his tenancy to fill the house with workmen, with anybody—but to fill it, and to refuse a lodging to the Lord-Lieutenant and his suite. With Lord Leitrim's tenant to hear was to obey; and so when the Earl of Carlisle approached the inhospitable town, and heard the warning of a good-hearted policeman who was unwilling that the discomfiture of the Queen's representative should be displayed to all the neighbours, the only resource was to drive on to the next town. Lord Leitrim is a Liberal peer, and by no means disaffected. Indeed, so far as loyalty goes, disaffected people have shot at him. Therefore he must rather be looked on as a martyr than an apostate. His act must be the result of an eccentric nature, stimulated by the imagination of a grievous wrong. It is rather food for laughter than severe criticism. Yet the fact that the insult was offered in Connaught, the wildest and least loyal of all the counties of Ireland, renders the offence worthy of animadversion. His Lordship's name has been struck out of the commission of the peace by the Lord-Lieutenant.

In the present day, when Acts of Parliament have ruthlessly put an end to party colours, music, and all the paraphernalia which formerly adorned and stimulated the contests for a seat in the House of Commons, it is by no means an easy matter to rouse the contending factions to the most moderate degree of excitement. Intimidation usually recoils on the head of the terrorist, and the threatened ejectionments of one landlord are compensated by the advantageous offers of a benevolent opponent. Beef, beer, and spirits are no longer lawful weapons of offence, and apathy has succeeded to unbridled violence. Great, therefore, was the achievement of the Right Honourable Sir Robert Peel, Bart., M.P. for Tamworth, and Chief Secretary for Ireland in the Government of Viscount Palmerston, when success crowned his attempt to convert the peaceful inhabitants of that borough into an infuriated mob. Greater still, perhaps, was it to accomplish by a series of suicidal acts, the defeat of a candidate supported by the hitherto invincible influence of the Peel family. The borough of Tamworth was vacant through the succession of Lord Raynham to the peerage. The candidates for the seat were Mr. Cowper, a relative by marriage of Lord Palmerston, and Mr. Peel, a distant cousin of Sir Robert. Under these circumstances, as might fairly be expected, the claims of Cowper, the Palmerstonian, prevailed in the eyes of Sir Robert above those of a distant but not well-beloved cousin, and therefore all the might and influence of the Lord of Drayton Manor, and the prestige of the family which has represented Tamworth for seventy years, was thrown into the scale of the supporter of Lord Palmerston. It was noised abroad that tenants had been menaced with ejectionment in case of refractory votes. Sir Robert had canvassed personally, and every art had, to the belief of the worthy burgesses, been employed to annihilate their independence of action, and to make those ardent Liberals the mere tools of Peel and Palmerston. Consequently, on the day of nomination fury had usurped the seat of reason, and the supporters of each party expressed their opinion of the candidates by yells of derision and continuous hooting; while Sir Robert himself came in for volleys of hisses, the effect of which was enhanced by the contrast of a few feeble cheers. But it was on the day of the poll that the Baronet shone with peculiar lustre. He is a man of immense physical power, tall, brave, and, as report says, neither unacquainted with the fistic art nor the professions thereof. So the reception which he experienced on the day of the poll was to him a matter of little account, and through yells and howls and threatened violence he stalked, like Hector of old, unmoved by fear. He with calm serenity commanded luckless voters who polled for Peel, to be "bonneted"; and when a respectable mechanic presumed to jostle the great Baronet, the luckless wight fell prostrate before the powerful arm of the offended hero. The natural result of all this moral and physical suasion wherewith the good people of Tamworth were plied, was the defeat of Cowper by a majority of fifty-seven votes; and it is within the bounds of possibility that at the next election even Sir Robert himself will fall a victim to his own misplaced zeal. Sir Robert is said to have pointed as he passed to the great bronze statue of his mighty father, as though he would recall the men of Tamworth to their allegiance by the memory of that illustrious man. Surely in his calmer moments Sir Robert will think that were his father a witness of such deeds, pity for his son, and not anger at his son's foes, would trouble the soul of the departed statesman.

Last week the second of the series of autumnal meetings at Newmarket took place, and the racing was of a very superior class throughout, the different contests comprising nearly 300 competitors, and resulting in very close and exciting struggles. But the main interest of the week centred in the Cesarewitch, an annual handicapper which was founded some twenty-four years ago by the Grand Duke of Russia giving a prize of £300. This year the stakes reached the total of £1,625, for which twenty-four competitors started. Just before the great race, as the horses were cantering to the starting-post, the weather, which had been rainy during the morning, underwent a sudden change, and the sun shone forth brightly, considerably enhancing the pleasure of the scene, as carriages, horsemen, and foot-people took up their positions in two long lines on each side of the course. At this moment the Royal party, consisting of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, his brother-in-law the King of the Greeks, Prince Christian of Denmark, Prince Frederick, and the Duke of Cambridge, made their welcome appearance on the stand. The visit of the Royal party took everybody by surprise, and was exceedingly gratifying, not only to the curiosity of the public in general, but also to the lovers of horse-racing, as indicating a desire on the part of the Prince of Wales to patronise the national pastime. As regards the race itself, it was won easily by a mare called Lioness, a daughter of Fandango, who carried the weight of 92lbs., Limosina, who was second, carrying 102lbs. The race was satisfactory in its result in one particular, as the first and second horses are the property of Mr. Merry and Lord Stamford, two of the leading patrons of the turf. Mr. Merry wins about £15,000 in bets, and many other gentlemen win large amounts, since Lioness was so heavily backed that the odds against her obtainable just before the start were only 5 to 2. Mr. Merry's star was in the ascendant throughout Tuesday, as he also won the Clearwell Stakes, of the value of £950, for two-year-olds, with Crisis, a filly by Saunterer. Another noticeable event in the week was a match for 500 sovs., between Mr. Naylor's Carnival, aged three years, and Lord Glasgow's Clarissimus, aged four years, each carrying 119lbs. Carnival, who belongs to the same owner as Macaroni, is generally supposed to be a better horse for a mile race than the celebrated winner of the 2,000 Guinea Stakes and Derby. In this race Clarissimus could not make Carnival extend himself, and the latter won easily by four lengths; thus proving himself to be an extraordinary horse, as Clarissimus in the spring was beaten by a head only by Buckstone, who beat the celebrated Tim Whiffer at Ascot. The race, which was for the distance of a mile, was run in 1 min. 47½ sec., a very creditable performance as it was; but had Carnival been made to gallop at his utmost speed, it would have been accomplished certainly in seven seconds less. The other important race on Friday was the Prendergast Stakes, of the value of £1,200, which was won, after an exciting contest, by a colt, son of brother to Bird-on-the-Wing and Phyalis, the property of Lord Glasgow, against whom the odds of 2 to 1 were laid. The last of the autumnal meetings will commence on Monday, the 26th of October.

THE CONTINENT.

THE place of M. Billault has been already filled up. It was generally believed that there would be a complete reorganisation of the Ministry, but nothing of the kind has taken place. M. Rouher, who, at the last ministerial modification, was elevated from the Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce to the presidency of the Council of State, with the charge of assisting the Minister of State in the explanation and vindication of the measures of the Government before the Chambers, is now transferred to the Ministry of State, and his place is taken by M. Rouland, who left the Ministry of War and Public Instruction in July, to make room for M. Uruy, and has since been out of office.

M.M. Rouher and Rouland will therefore have to face the great oratorical power of the Opposition in the next session. Are they strong enough for the places they have taken? M. Rouher is a man of great abilities and of very liberal sentiments. The services he rendered France and Europe in the negotiations relative to the treaties of commerce with England, Belgium, and the Zollverein can hardly be rated too highly, but he has not yet shown the oratorical ability which his present post needs. However, the Emperor is an excellent judge of men, and as he is content to trust M. Rouher with so weighty a post, it is probable enough that M. Rouher will, in his new capacity, develop powers with which the public had not credited him. M.M. Rouher and Rouland are, however, to have some lieutenants. The Emperor has increased the number of vice-presidents of the Council of State, part of whose functions it also is to explain the measures of the Government. The three new vice-presidents are M.M. Forcade de la Roquette, for a short time, Minister of Finance. Chaix d'Estance, one of the celebrities of the Parisian bar, and but lately Procureur Imperial, and Vintry Governor of the Bank. M. Pariet, previously the sole vice-president, retains his post.

The Emperor has shown his high sense of the great services of M. Billault, by giving him a splendid funeral at the public cost, and by a letter of sympathy to the late Minister's daughters.

The Empress Eugenie, after coasting Spain in her yacht, has gone to Madrid. Her Majesty is said to be an excellent sailor, and is described as pacing the deck in the roughest weather in a waterproof, whilst her suite were howling in all the agonies of the mal de mer, to the intense delight, we need not say, of the crew.

A rumour, for which, however, there appears to be little foundation, assigns her Majesty's visit to Madrid, where she goes as Empress of the French, and not under her usual incognito, to political motives.

It is positively asserted that Earl Russell, impatient to be doing something and irritated at the difficulties raised by Austria to his proposal of identical notes pronouncing the Russian forfeiture of Poland, has addressed a separate despatch—one journal goes so far as to give its date, the 10th instant—to St. Petersburg, declaring that Russia, by her non-observance of the treaties of 1815, has forfeited all right to Poland—whether Congress Poland only or the whole of the Polish provinces, is not said. It is added that France will shortly send a note of a similar character. The Austrian Government, on its part, hesitates very much to take a measure the consequences of which may be so serious. Count Rechberg, it is said, has asked Earl Russell whether, in the event of war following such a proceeding, England would take part in it, and to have received for answer that in no eventuality would England feel herself bound to go to war.

We can hardly think it probable, however, that Earl Russell has taken the step attributed to him. Whatever might be the value of a joint declaration of forfeiture, the isolated notice of England, deprived as it is of all force by the announcement that it will be followed by no active measures to give it effect, can do the Poles no good. The noble lord would not have ventured to send such a despatch without consulting the Cabinet, and the Cabinet could hardly have allowed him to do such a foolish thing. Earl Russell seems to have quite forgotten that Russia herself can find her advantage in the solemn overthrow of the treaties of 1815. These treaties, grossly as they have been violated, have yet been a protection, and might still be so, to the Polish nationality. Russia has always treated Poland as something separate from the Empire. In the worst times the majority of the functionaries have been Poles; the Polish language has been used in official acts, and the form, which in these matters is something of autonomy, has been preserved. If the other Powers tell her that she has broken the treaties they withdraw the sanction given in those treaties to her possession of Poland, she will have no reason to preserve the distinction she has kept up, and may as well proceed at once to incorporate Poland in the empire, and efface the last remnants of Polish national existence. If, indeed, full belief could be given to a statement that the province of Augustowo has been incorporated in Russia we must conclude that the Russian Government has already taken note of Earl Russell's declarations at Blairgowrie, and laid aside the treaties as null and void. This province, which contains a population of rather more than 600,000, runs along Eastern Prussia into Lithuania, and if once swallowed up in the Empire the other provinces of the Kingdom must follow soon. Russia would then, indeed, be upon the Vistula. But the story seems to have no other foundation than the temporary assumption by Mouravieff of the government of those northern districts of the province which about upon Lithuania—an assumption which is probably found to be necessary for military reasons. However, the rumour supplies an apt illustration that the question has another side to it. To declare that Russia has forfeited Poland by her breach of the conditions upon which its possession was confirmed to her would be a sensible act enough, if the Powers making it would follow it up by giving the Poles their aid to drive the Russians out of Poland. A minister who pronounces that forfeiture, and refuses to lend a hand to help the Poles, is guilty of the grossest absurdity.

The National Government has addressed a circular to its diplomatic agents excusing the executions, Anglo assassinations, which it has ordered. Russia seems to be resolved to make a desperate effort to suppress the rising in the next few weeks. Troops are pouring into Poland, and the insurgents, if they mean to continue the fight, and they undoubtedly do, will have to divide themselves into small bands and use the forests and marshes as a shelter. The Poles have not abandoned the hope of foreign aid, and sustained by that expectation they will continue the struggle, whatever may be the sacrifices it entails.

The desperate character which the conflict is assuming is shown by the latest news from Warsaw. The Hotel de Ville has been fired, no doubt with the view of embarrassing the Government by the destruction of all the treasure chests, securities and public documents. And the Russian Government on its part has ordered all civilians to give up their arms, and has resolved upon dismissing all Polish functionaries, that is to say, the whole body of functionaries, and replacing them by Russians. It is also asserted, although it is probably an anticipation, that the Russian language is to be employed in future in the acts of administration in Poland. If the great Powers pronounce the treaties at an end, they will have not a word to say against these measures.

A very curious story comes to us, nominally from St. Petersburg, although its true birthplace is no doubt in Belgium, which we may give as an illustration of the absurdities to which grave politicians, pretending to be well informed, lend credit. The Poles, it is said, finding nothing is to be done with Western Europe, have turned to Turkey, and have offered her an offensive and defensive alliance, promising to reconquer for the Sultans all that the Czars have taken from them in the last hundred years or so. Turkey is said to have either actually accepted the proposition or to meditate acceptance, and Russia, having got wind of the scheme, is making immense military and naval preparations in the Black Sea, of course violating the Treaty of Paris, and has further given Turkey notice that any recognition of the Poles as belligerents would be treated as a declaration of war.

Turkish statesmen are not quite so mad as this canard would make them out to be. Very likely, if England, France, and Austria were to go to war with Russia, they would be tempted to join the allies in the hope of obtaining some further securities against Russian aggression. But they are not so fatuous as to suppose that, however well aided by the Poles, they could wrest from Russia the territories she has made her own. They might obtain a momentary success; but the struggle thus generated would be renewed again and again, and the Turks must in the end give way. They are in Europe now only on sufferance. England, France, and Austria have put their shield before them; and these protectors will exercise all the rights of guardians. France and England might willingly see Russia humbled and Poland restored; but they certainly would not allow Turkey to renew her domination over the Christian populations which have escaped from her. In this strange war, in which the Poles, the great champions of Christendom, who boast that they saved Europe from the Turks, would be aiding the Turks to become a danger to Europe again, Turkey has everything to lose and nothing to gain. The story is a fiction, which has no other foundation in fact, than the probably ill-concealed satisfaction of the Turkish Government at the embarrassment of Russia, and the measures that Power is taking to suppress the revolt in the Caucasus, which seems to be assuming menacing proportions.

The King of Prussia seems to be resolved to show his people that he will not rule with the constitution. In an answer to the inhabitants of a Silesian village, who had asked his Majesty to tell them whether their loyalty to him would be violated by sending a representative to the Chamber who would vote against his Ministers, King William wrote: "If the parish wishes to mark through the elections its loyalty to me, it can only do so by the election of men who have the firm determination to support my Ministry in the execution of the tasks with which they are charged by me. A hostile deportment towards my Government is incompatible with loyalty to my person, for my ministers are called to their posts by my confidence, and have to sustain me in the fulfilment of my great and serious duties. The work with the accomplishment of which I before everything have charged them is, the establishment of the army organisation, which I have recognised as necessary for the security of the fatherland and useful and right, for lightening the service of the older soldiers." So far does his Majesty identify himself with his Ministers, that he would not even attend the great festival at Cologne last Thursday, to celebrate the completion of the nave of the great Cathedral, because Herr Von Bismarck was not invited. This, at least, is one of the reasons assigned for his Majesty's change of purpose; but it is just as probable that he was forewarned that, although he would be received with respect, not the slightest sign of enthusiasm, or even goodwill, would be shown him by the people.

The rumours in favour of an alliance between Sweden and Denmark are getting the upperhand over those which threw doubt upon it. If a telegram from Paris—a rather curious place from which to obtain the information announcing that at a fête given by the King of Denmark at Lyksborg, generally known as Glucksburg, to celebrate his fifty-fifth birthday, Prince Oscar of Sweden drank to the king's health, and stated that the treaty Sweden had contracted with Denmark for their common defence rendered the two countries invincible and secured the safety of the Scandinavian States—tells the truth, the matter is settled. As the king was born on the 6th October, the fête probably took place on that day, and, if so, the story has been a long time reaching us, and must be received with some distrust.

The Execution is not very popular in Prussia. Not that the Prussians entertain an atom less of hatred to Denmark or have the slightest scruples about robbing her of Schleswig, but they think that at the present moment the affair is likely to turn out a complete fiasco; and they reason rightly enough that if it should their darling schemes will be entirely knocked on the head.

The Austrian Finance Minister has laid a bill before the Reichsrath for authorising a loan of 96,000,000 of florins, (£9,600,000 sterling). Of this sum 30,000,000 are to be applied for the relief of the distress in Hungary, 12,000,000 for the withdrawal from circulation of the small paper money, 20,000,000 for the redemption of the salt-mine notes, and 33,500,000 to cover the deficit.

The King of the Greeks leaves Paris this day. His presence is sadly needed in Athens, where the representatives of the people continue to act upon the principle that they are in the Assembly for their own profit, and that hay should be made, or at least that a desperate effort should be made to make it, whenever there is the slightest glimpse of sunshine.

The Ionian Islands are rejoicing over the annexation. The Parliament has resolved, by a vote of 33 to 3, that the Protectorate shall cease immediately. They want, too, to have the fortresses left them in their present condition, and they seem by no means disposed to pay the little bill which England presents for her outlays in their behalf.

JAPAN.

A telegram, received by the Foreign-office states that Admiral Kuper, failing to obtain by negotiation satisfaction from Prince Satsuma—the Daimio whose retainers murdered Mr. Richardson—had besieged and levelled the city of Kagoshima, the prince's stronghold, and destroyed three of his steamers. The success would appear to have been signal, but to have been dearly purchased. It is stated that Captains Josling and Willmott were killed in the engagement; and that the total loss of the British was eleven killed and thirty-nine wounded. The fleet returned to Yokohama.

SPEECH OF COLONEL L. Q. C. LAMAR, C.S.A.

At the annual dinner of the Chertsey Agricultural Society, held at the Town-hall, Chertsey, on the 16th inst., at which were present W. S. Lindsay, Esq., M.P., who presided, Mr. Briscoe, M.P., Mr. G. Cubitt, M.P., Mr. Caird, M.P., Major Penrhyn, and a full representation of the gentry and farmers Surrey, the Chairman, Mr. W. S. Lindsay, having proposed the health of the visitors," coupled with it the name of Colonel Lamar, of the Confederate States Army. In introducing this gentleman, he said:—

His house was always open to the representatives of oppressed and downtrodden nations; and he was honoured with a visit from Mr. Mason, whom he was proud to call his friend, and who was not present that evening simply because he desired to avoid at present all public assemblies. Colonel Lamar, who was present, was also a distinguished man in his own country, not only as a statesman in the United States Congress, but as a brave soldier in the Confederate army (cheers); that army which had endured untold hardships, and under the gravest difficulties had hurled back again and again the invaders of their soil. (Cheers.) For himself he would not at the present moment offer any opinion as to the terrific struggle now pending; but he did not hesitate to say that, in any assembly of Englishmen, those brave men would be received with the warmest sympathy. (Cheers.)

The "Health of the Visitors, and of Colonel Lamar," was drunk with acclamation, the whole company, with scarcely an exception, rising to drink the toast.

Colonel Lamar, in reply, thanked the chairman for his remarks, and the company for its cordial reception of his name. Their generous and cordial reception touched his heart and elicited his most sincere gratitude. The enthusiasm which had been manifested was the more gratifying to him that it was manifested at a farmers' dinner. He belonged to a country which was a nation of farmers (cheers), not, as they had been told, a country of indolent, wealthy, and dissolute planters, of poor white trash and degraded slaves. It was not that but a country of independent, intelligent freemen, of the eight millions of whom two-thirds earned their subsistence by the sweat of their brow, nearly one-half of them owning the land they cultivated, and nearly all of them seeing in each up-turned sod of their fallow ground that which was more precious to them than the gold of California,—the spark of independence and of personal liberty. (Cheers.) Many of the quality which that people had exhibited during the last two years, and which had been so kindly alluded to, were in his opinion due to the fact that they were a nation of farmers. He believed, without disparaging other pursuits, that from the culture of the soil, the drawing of sustenance from the bosom of mother earth, they derived a certain moral nutriment, a certain richness of sentiment, of capacity for self-devotion and sacrifice, which kept the heart fresh and pure, and made the nature of men simple and unaffected. (Cheers.) It had been represented to England that the great conflict, the bloody war which had been waged, and was still being waged, against the people of the South by the Government of the North, was a war on behalf of civil liberty and of constitutional government against a band of lawless conspirators, who sought to trample down those liberties and to overthrow the august structure of that Constitution. (Hear, hear.) Fortunately for the South, this appeal to the British people comes before a tribunal fully competent to consider the question. He congratulated Englishmen on their practical knowledge of civil liberty. (Hear, hear.) They had it in substance; they knew it by certain broad, practical facts, and they could not be misled by subtle refinements or fanciful theories. When Englishmen were told of civil liberties they immediately thought of certain great historical guarantees for that liberty—the right of habeas corpus, of trial by jury, the supremacy of the law, the subordination of the military to the civil power. Those things constituted to an Englishman the true indications of civil liberty (hear), and their history taught them that whenever a despot or a tyrant under any disguise sought to destroy the liberties of the people, he commenced by attacking those great guarantees of civil liberty. (Hear, hear.) Let them test the contest in America in that manner, and let them say which party was contending for civil liberty and constitutional government. (Cheers.) Let them look at the Northern States. Did they see any of the great bulwarks of English liberty existing there? (Cheers.) The Chief of the Cabinet—the Secretary of State—is reported to have boasted to the representative of Her Majesty's Government as evidence of his power, that, sitting in his private chamber, he could, by touching a bell on his left hand, order the imprisonment of a citizen in the far distant State of Michigan, and by touching another bell on his right he could imprison a citizen of the distant States of Maine or New Hampshire. Were the citizens of that great country exempt from illegal arrest? Why were not the houses of American citizens like the houses of Englishmen—their castles? and why were they subject to illegal and unwarrantable searches? (Hear.) He would tell them. That Government was not seeking to establish civil liberty. A grim despotism glared over the land. Liberty stood naked and defenceless, cowering before it. (Hear, hear.) Spies, police, officers, provost-marshal were the ministers of the Government. The legislature of a sovereign State was broken up by armed force, judges dragged from the bench and imprisoned men arrested without warrant of law, and undergoing long and indefinite confinement without examination into their cases, conscripts marching through the streets manacled together and shot in the presence of the army—all in the name of constitutional liberty and free government. (Cheers.) But let them look across the Potomac, and what was there to be seen? A people invaded at different times by 1,000,000 armed men, but not such a sight as he had just mentioned. They would see a number of confederated States with a Constitution in peaceful operation, safe in the affections of the people; the majesty of the law unimpaired, and acting with undiminished vigour (hear, hear); the courts of law open everywhere except where hostile armies stood confronted; the judges in many cases deciding against the Government and its officers, all of whom bowed before the majesty of the law. When by a spontaneous vote of the people—for it was too spontaneous to have been the result of preconcert or conspiracy—certain States thought fit to withdraw the powers which they had delegated to a common Government, because those powers were being used to their destruction, there was not a break in their social institutions, nor even a momentary pause in the working of the internal administration of their Government. That was because it was a movement inaugurated in the interest of order for the conservation of liberty and law, and for the supremacy of the Constitution. Even while it was in abeyance before the Congress met at Montgomery to form a new Government the people still obeyed it. Thus stood the issue between the two people, and he was willing that Englishmen should decide which was the representative of American or Anglican liberty and constitutionality. (Cheers.) The Southern people had made sacrifices for their independence, they had sacrificed everything save their civil liberties. The rival armies had often met in conflict, and the results of those meetings it did not become him to describe. Englishmen could form and had formed their own opinions upon that point—(hear)—and the South had the rare good fortune to fight battles which she can afford to let her enemies describe. His friend the chairman had spoken of his sympathy with down-trodden and oppressed nationalities. He thanked his friend for his kindness and hospitality to Southerners. They were a people, but they were not down-trodden nor oppressed, and by the help of God they never would be! Liberty might sometimes be crushed under the armed heel of the despot; but in the Southern country whence he came could be seen old men and young, standing up side by side for their country, their bayonets glistening in the sun, unstained by ought save the blood of their enemies. And it was well to recollect that the South, abused, bleeding, her life blood draining away, was fighting not alone for her own liberties, but also for the liberties of that people who were sending armed millions to subjugate and to crush her. More than that, the South was struggling for freedom everywhere, and was seeking to rid the world of one of the most intolerant, aggressive, overbearing Powers that ever disturbed the repose of Europe, or menaced the peace of civilisation—(hear, hear)—a Power which stood as the embodiment of the sovereignty of brute force, which, if it succeeded in its designs, would be a firebrand among nations, and which even now, in anticipation of its triumph, laughed to scorn the faith of treaties, the obligations of humanity, and the laws of civilised warfare. (Cheers.) It had been said by those whose interest it was to misrepresent the South that, although she might be engaged in defending her own independence, yet her great object was to perpetuate the degradation of another race which she had enslaved. (Hear, hear.) He did not wish to commend any of the social institutions of the South to Englishmen, and he did not stand there to defend any one of those institutions. But although their opinions might be formed and pronounced as to some of those institutions, he believed they were yet too fair not to hear the truth, and the truth had not been told to England upon that subject. (Hear.) With a full and distinct understanding of the diversity of opinion that existed between his hearers and himself as to some of the institutions to which he referred, he asserted in the face of that company, and before the world, that the statements which had been made against the South were calumnious and untrue, and that the white race in the South had been the guardians, the protectors, the benefactors of the black man; that they had elevated him in the scale of rational existence, that they had Christianized him to a state to which he had never before attained. He only desired Englishmen to listen, not to opinions, nor to misrepresentations, but to facts. When the American continent was discovered and occupied by the European race it came into contact with two savage races. One was the noble Indian race, the ancient occupiers of the continent, and the highest type of savage manhood; the other race was one brought there, not by agency of the Southern people, but by agencies which he would not then discuss—it was the African race, which all philosophers and historians pronounced to be the lowest type of natural man. It was a race without a God, without rational ideas—cannibals not attaining even to the civilisation of the fig-leaf. ("Hear," and a laugh.) What had been the history of the two races he had described? The Indian race—the noble race incapable of domestic life, of anything but its wild and nomadic existence, had been driven back to continually narrowing circles, with constantly diminishing means of subsistence, and were in danger of complete extinction before the advancing wave of civilisation. But the other race, the negro, with all its foulness and barbarity, being naturally a servile race, had become domesticated, and in spite of the institution of slavery if they pleased, but still with slavery, had risen higher and higher in the rational scale, until now it furnished heroes and heroines for modern romances, themes for modern songs, had even been invited by some statesmen within the charmed circle of social and political equality. (Hear, hear.) An institution that has done so much for that race must be considered carefully. He might be told, that, having brought the negro up to the point of civilisation, the South owed it to Christendom to emancipate them. (Hear.) In answer, he would refer to the opinions of British statesmen, British travellers, and philosophers, who were united in opinion that the emancipation of that race at this time, and especially in the manner proposed by the rulers of the North, would be a curse to both races. (Hear.) But he could safely say that so many and so great were the boons which the South had already conferred on the negro race, that the world had ample guarantees that if the time should ever come for them to believe that liberty would be a boon and not a curse, then the South would be prepared to confer that boon upon them. (Cheers.) And he might add, if that time should ever come they would be capable of asserting their own claims, and the whites could not if they would withhold the boon. (Hear, hear.) Misrepresentation had been constantly made to the English people upon the subject, and it had been said that in the South the negro was treated only as property, and was deprived of all the rights of a human being. This he pronounced false. The laws of every Southern State, in short, regarded the negro as a man, threw around him the guarantees of personal security and legal protection, and allowed him as much personal liberty as he is capable of enjoying in his present intellectual and moral condition. They awarded the penalty of death for the murder of a slave, and imprisonment in the Penitentiary was the punishment for maiming. (Hear.) The Chairman having explained that the distribution of the prizes had to take place,

Colonel Lamar concluded his speech by again thanking the company for their sympathy with the South, which he said would nerve their arms to inflict heavier blows and to enact more heroic deeds. (Cheers.)

ENGLISH FEELING TOWARD THE SOUTH.

At the annual meeting of the Middlesex Agricultural Association, on the 3rd inst., Mr. Lindsay, M.P., in replying to a toast in honour of the House of Commons, referred to the recent statement of Earl Russell, that the majority of Englishmen sympathised with the cause of the Federal States. He said:—

The noble Earl at the head of the Foreign Office, when speaking the other evening as a member of the Government and a leader of the Executive, said he thought the sympathies of the majority of the people of this country were in favour of a particular section of those who were now engaged in a great civil war in America. He might have been speaking his own sentiments when he gave utterance to such words, but he (Mr. Lindsay) denied that Lord Russell had spoken the sentiments of the country or of the House of Commons on that occasion. It might be perfectly true that the House of Commons felt the propriety of leaving the Government unfettered in its responsibility on this question. The House felt that the responsibility ought to rest upon the Government and on it alone, because it was not, certainly, the duty of the House to dictate to the Government what course it should pursue in respect to the civil war now raging on the other side of the Atlantic. But the noble lord did not express the sentiments of the people of England when he said that the sympathies of the nation were with the Northern section of that great people now unhappily engaged in war. (Hear, hear.) If the people of England believed that that horrible war was being waged in order to put an end to slavery, then he could understand that their sympathies would be with the Federals. We in this country, however, had seen sufficient to persuade us that they were neither honest nor earnest in their professions to put down slavery, but that there were other reasons which induced them to wage war against the Southerners. He had seen enough to know that if they really desired to put down an institution which few people, he was happy to say, in this country admired, they would have obtained the sympathies of a very large majority of the people of this country. (Cheers.) But when they found that the President himself entered office, and made it his platform, that he did not enter office for the purpose of putting down slavery—and did not intend to take any steps to put down slavery, nor did he believe that he could legally do so, the people of England could not believe that he was in earnest; and it was vain for him to attempt to support a mere political cry by endeavouring to persuade the people of this country that his motive for carrying on the war was to put down slavery, and that upon that ground he was entitled to their sympathies. Was it the fact that the Northern people entertained any friendly feeling towards the coloured population? No one who had travelled in America could believe that they did. On the contrary, they had lost no opportunity of showing their disgust when they were brought into contact, in a public railway carriage or a steamboat with the negro. He had often witnessed their conduct on such occasions, and their attempts to exclude even the most educated and well-behaved negroes from participation in the rights and amenities of civilised life. There could be no question whatever that the Northerners were very highly prejudiced indeed against the negroes, but apart from all considerations of that kind, had those who cried out about the emancipation of the slaves ever considered how that great question was to be dealt with—how it was possible to liberate all at once more than 4,000,000 of blacks, who had, unfortunately, been trained to slavery? The thing was impossible. It could not be done. It would take not merely one, but two generations to do it. He said that still more with that object in view, if it were their object—which he did not believe—their conduct had been both vain and wicked. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Lincoln, in his proclamation, had talked of giving freedom to the whole of the slaves, and of their being sent away to some district in the Far West, where the foot of civilised men had never trod; but when offered freedom on these terms the blacks had declined to accept it. Then they had talked of sending them away to some other country. But had they ever considered the possibility of carrying out such a scheme—had they ever considered how utterly impossible it was to convey 4,000,000 of men, or in what ships they could be conveyed? The Lord Chief Baron.—Twenty Great Easterns could not do it. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lindsay.—No, nor a hundred, nor a thousand Great Easterns. Where were they to take them to? To Africa, from whence their forefathers came? Why, if they were sent to Africa they would have to endure far greater miseries than they did at the present moment. He had conversed with Dr. Livingstone on the subject, and Dr. Livingstone had told him that it was not possible to conceive the amount of degradation to which the black people were subjected in Africa. (Hear, hear.) If, therefore, they were sent back to that land from whence their forefathers came, they would be sent to an amount of misery far worse than that to which they were subjected in the South. (Hear, hear.) Any one who gave these questions a calm consideration, and who did not speak upon them merely for the purpose of carrying with them the popular voice, would find, however much he might desire to root out slavery, that any attempt to do so suddenly, by means of a civil war, would create an immense amount of injury, not merely to the proprietors—the white people in the Southern States—but to the blacks themselves. This had been found to be the case. He had just received a letter from New Orleans in which the writer stated that the plan of giving freedom had been tried, and that the result had been that the negroes in general had returned to their owners on the nominal condition of payment for their labour. (Hear, hear.) Emancipation had been found impossible, unless the United States would consent to the establishment of poor-houses and asylums to support the negroes in illness. The emancipation proclamation had hurt no one but its author and his party. It had been stated on reliable authority that the American Government, in answer to communications upon the subject, had said, "If the free negroes refuse to work, whip them." So that after all they would get nothing by the change, and the same system of discipline would be carried out, and probably in a more cruel manner by the Northerners than by the Southerners. (Hear, hear.) He was surprised to find that some gentlemen, and especially clergymen, had stated the proclamation of emancipation from slavery by President Lincoln was a humane act. Humane to whom? It could not be humane to the slaves, who were not yet prepared for freedom; and it certainly would not be humane to the five or six millions of white people in the Southern States, because the real object, aim, and end of that proclamation was nothing more nor less than this:—"You black men, henceforth be free; if any one resist you in your desire to live, resist him, and the arms of the North will support you in that resistance." Practically, that is, "Massacre your masters, massacre your mistresses, and massacre their children, so that you may obtain your freedom." (Hear, hear.) Instead of being a humane proclamation, it was, in fact, a specimen of the most horrible barbarity, and a more terrible proclamation than had ever been issued in any part of the world. There was one question on which he wished to say a word: he meant the building of ships here to be afterwards used by the Confederate Government. He was not going to enter into any discussion of the legal part of the question in the presence of the Lord Chief Baron, but a good deal had been said about maintaining an impartial neutrality. He was in favour of doing so, but were they? It was said that they ought not to allow ships to be built in this country for the Southern States; but ought they to allow cannon and ammunition to go out of this country to supply the Northern States? The cannon now being used to bombard Charleston was obtained from this country, and for aught he knew the horrible Greek fire of which so much had been said was manufactured here too. He could not see why they should prevent the Southern people from being supplied with ships while the Federals continued to be supplied with arms. Of course if a clear infringement of the Foreign Enlistment Act could be proved, the case would be different; but the whole question at present amounted to this: the American coast had been declared to be under blockade, and if they attempted to run the blockade the Queen's proclamation said they must do it at their own risk. Of course, if a vessel which was running the blockade, having been made here and intended for the Southerners, was captured, her owners must bear the loss. For his own part he confessed that he could see no immediate chance of the war terminating, but he could see what the end would be. It would not be re-union, but separation, and he believed that before many years had elapsed that separation would not be merely into two countries, the Northern and Southern, but that it would be separated into four different parts, north and south, and west and California. The Southern men and Southern women would fight to the last drop of their blood before they would be reunited to the States; and if the Northerners persisted in the course they were now taking, terrible as the war had been, he grieved to say it would become far more terrible before it was brought to a conclusion. At present the Southerners felt that they had got sufficient white men to defend themselves and maintain their independence; but if they once called out the slaves, as they would be justified in doing, no more horrible scenes had ever been witnessed than would be witnessed in the American war. In endeavouring to subjugate the South the North had committed a grievous mistake. The employment of slaves would be the last resort of the South, but when that period came the retribution and the vengeance would be terrible. (Hear, hear.) He believed that he only spoke the sentiments of a large majority of the people of the country when he said that it would be impossible to restore the Union, and in those sentiments he believed the House of Commons joined. (Cheers.)

FRANCE, RUSSIA, AND THE UNITED STATES.

(From the New York Daily News.)

New York harbour exhibits the unusual spectacle of twelve magnificent war steamers, flaunting respectively the Cross of St. George, the Tri-colour, and the double-headed Eagle of the Czars. The simultaneous rendezvous at this port of so formidable a fleet, representing the three great Powers of Europe, may be simply a coincidence. It is probable that the Russian armada has visited our metropolitan waters in pursuance of a policy that aims at an alliance with our Government, in the event of any misunderstanding with the French Emperor. The presence of the finest ships of the Czar, and the interchange of courtesies that will ensue, will furnish so many hints to Napoleon that his old enemy and his prospective new one are contemplating an identification of their national interests in regard to the complications that threaten to disturb the relations between empires, kingdoms, and republics. The French and English flotillas are doubtless on an errand of observation, to take notes of the progress of events. In any case, this crowding of our bay with the elements of foreign naval strength, suggests a train of thought in the direction of our foreign relations, and the numerous allusions to the subject that have recently been made by the journals of this city give evidence that its importance is now being realised by the press, and probably by the Administration.

The eagerness of the Radical journals to commend the action of the British Government in the detention of the gunboats designed for the Confederacy displays an anxiety in the wrong direction. England has evidently no intention to participate in the quarrel that seems in process of formation between the Old World and the New. The collision, if any happen, will be with France. That such a collision is very generally apprehended, is indicated by the uneasiness of the Administration organs latterly, that have suddenly adopted the subject of a foreign war as a theme entitled to earnest consideration. It seems now to be understood that the French Emperor is too clever an intriguer to have projected his Mexican scheme without a concurrent design of Southern recognition. Without an alliance with the South, the Mexican Empire would prove a political abortion, and Napoleon is too clear-sighted to have ignored this paramount condition of the success of his American enterprise. He is probably the most comprehensive brain of the age, and although to timid and conservative natures his daring policy may seem to partake of the recklessness of the adventurer, it will be found that he has always accurately balanced the hazards and surveyed the farthest limits of every undertaking. Maximilian of Austria, or whosoever will wear the crown of Mexico, must ascend his throne with the conviction that in so doing he incurs for his dynasty the natural enmity of the United States. He will, therefore, not hesitate to conciliate the South by immediate recognition, and his Imperial protector across the water will see to it that that recognition will bear substantial fruit.

The reverses suffered by the Federal arms in Georgia will undoubtedly prove an impetus to the contemplated action of Napoleon, and it is not at all improbable that the tidings of that Confederate victory will herald a Confederate triumph at the Tuileries, and elevate the Southern envoys to the rank of ambassadors. This Government has to deal in the premises with a potentate who is noted for the startling character of his political performances, and having risen from obscurity to imperial grandeur by the force of an impetuosity that overleaped all routine and ignored every precedent, it is not likely that in the present instance he will parley long with scruples, doubts, or fears. What he intends to do will assuredly be done with his accustomed intensity of purpose and suddenness of execution. He is a gamester, whose boldness, as much as his craftiness, is the secret of his success.

An alliance between this Government and Russia, however much it may incommode Napoleon upon the European Continent, can have but little, if any, effect upon his operations here. The Russian navy is as yet but an experiment. Although it has made vigorous strides towards respectability within the last quarter century, it is yet too limited in extent and experience to be classed as an effective war power in comparison with the splendid armaments of France. All the naval resources of Russia concentrated in our waters, and co-operating with our own, could not prevent a French fleet from communicating with Southern ports, from landing supplies and men, and from turning the now balanced scale of war against us. France was never more powerful than now; was never more thoroughly prepared for an offensive war of gigantic proportions. Undisturbed by domestic strife, the United States could have no better opportunity of measuring its strength than with this great balancer of European nationalities. But having our own brethren, co-heris with us of Anglo-Saxon blood, to cope with, it would be simply puerile boastfulness to assume ourselves equal to the combined efforts of two such foes, where one unaided has tasked our energies to the utmost. Our true policy is to conciliate the South, and thus, by the unexpected re-concentration of republican influence against the intrigues of monarchy, to checkmate the imperial intruder, and re-establish the supremacy of republicanism upon this hemisphere.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER, Oct. 21.

SOUTHERN FEELING AT OLDHAM.

RUDENESS, like mendacity, is thought to go by districts: Cretan liars, "Oldham roughs." Nor is the classic libel more familiarly current in the world of letters than is the commonplace by-word in working-day Lancashire. But possibly, in these rehabilitating latter times, some ingenious hand at moral nisi prius may take a turn at restoring the calumniated islanders of antiquity; in which case I can only wish him as easily through his task as if I were to undertake to put a little smoother nap on the reputation of Mr. Cobbett's constituents.

Whatever may appear to ail the surface, there cannot be much beneath it, when, as is the case with the people of all conditions in Oldham, they would poll to-morrow almost to a man, against J. Morgan Cobbett, unless they knew him staunch in the Confederate cause. Before visiting the town, for the first time, a few days ago, I was almost warned that all the men were "desperately South," and that the women were even worse than the men.

After making all allowances for a stranger's susceptibility of impression at witnessing unusual things in unfamiliar places, I must confess that much of what I saw and heard dwells in my memory as "net" matter of astonishment. Most of us flatter ourselves in times of philosophical self-sufficiency that nil admirari is one of the marks of a masculine mind. But then, you see, it has not happened to most of us to have borne our share in drinking Oldham bohea and consuming Oldham plum-cake, as an expression (intelligible, I presume, to the initiated in such mysteries,) of one's sympathy with the cause of the South. It is just a little remarkable, without being at all surprising, that a particular town in the north of England should be distinguished for its buxom dames; but suddenly to find oneself among some hundreds of these interesting and responsible personages, listening with their ears, eyes, and mouths to a speech about Surat cotton and short time and General Butler and the widows and orphans of the South—to have seen this and not to "admire" are, according to my experience, two propositions rather hard to reconcile. Their husbands are by their sides, straining to catch every word as it falls from the speaker.

Nor would you find repose for your over-wrought powers of wonderment by diverting your attention from the body of the Co-operative Hall to the platform. You would there observe a substantial looking mill-owner, not unstricken in years—a magistrate, I believe, for the county, and one of Mr. Cobbett's most influential constituents—fretting and fuming with indignation at the conduct of her Majesty's Ministers. After citing a long bill of indictments against "Lord John," our elderly friend appeared to be quite brought up standing by a sudden recollection of his lordship's statement at Blairgowrie, that Englishmen were rather for the North than for the South. He was "disgusted" with Lord John. (Cheers and laughter.) But at the same time, to give even Lord John his due—(laughter)—there was just this redeeming hope for his Lordship, that he, like every other true-hearted Englishman, was a good Southerner at bottom—(laughter)—and that in uttering that awful political fib in Scotland, he did so, not because he believed it, but as a diplomatic fetch to bring all England about his ears. He (the speaker) had been taunted with changing the shade of his politics. He was an old politician, and, like Lord Palmerston, would assert the privilege of modifying his opinions upon sufficient occasion. But if he had become more Conservative than some of his Oldham friends liked they had to thank his New York experiences for the change. (Cheers.) During his visit to America he found extreme democracy would not do. Among other of its fruits he discovered that it did not tend to bring about a high tone of mercantile morality. (Laughter.) There was now on his books a transaction of long standing which was in a fair way of being what is called "repudiated"—(loud laughter)—and it was his firm conviction that the Yankee traders meant to "repudiate" it from the beginning. (Renewed laughter.) And then forsooth, people of that sort must be seizing British goods in neutral waters, and Lord John must allow them to refer their robberies to their own Prize Courts, to decide whether the prizes were lawful. No doubt the rascals—(great laughter)—would adjudge the prizes, to be lawful enough—(laughter)—for he knew them of old (Roars of laughter.) He often asked himself if he was living in old England. Time was, when he was a young man, that old England would not allow any foreign Power to shake its fist in her face as the Yankees had been doing for years past. (Cheers.) We were never so ready for war as now. (Cheers.) Who's afraid. (Laughter.) Not he. (Cheers.) But whoever was afraid, it was a disgrace that a British statesman should be deterred by the empty bluster of a parcel of Yankees from doing justice to a brave people by recognising them at once as a friendly and mighty Power. (Great cheering.)

I should not have gone out of my way to give the foregoing abstract of the speech of the Oldham millowner, if it were not for its thoroughly representative character. Pretty much the whole feeling of Oldham, as well as other towns in Lancashire, is summed up in it. Mill-owners and mill-hands, men and women alike, are possessed of the single idea that they owe all their troubles to the Yankees, and that no good can come except through the complete and steady success of what the Brooklyn Times calls the "Marvellous Sword of the Rebellion."

But the chief speaker on the curious occasion under review, and the speaker whose oratory was most fruitful in "surprises," was a Mr. T. B. Kershaw. I have often heard him spoken of as an enthusiastic and able advocate of the Southern cause; but had never heard him make a speech. Himself a manager of a cotton-mill, his were the arguments and his were the appeals I had referred to above, as taking all the mill people captive, while he talked to them with a natural eloquence that went to the heart, about pining for "full time" and weeping over Surat cotton. His speech was well considered, and excellently adapted for a mixed audience. Upon the cotton question he has already achieved more than a Lancashire reputation, and perhaps it would not now be premature for Mr. Bayley to compare notes with him upon that large subject. His arguments were as logical as they were otherwise effective, and his thorough command over the feelings of the operatives was amply testified, when you looked round and saw such a bevy of Oldham women, with their eyes all a-light with unshed tears, dancing their babies up and down to mean yes to what Mr. Kershaw was saying.

The climax was not reached until the platform broke off into poetry. Wrapped (metaphorically) in the folds of the battle-flag of the South—a representation of which was draped overhead—Mr. T. Malan Walker, one of the honorary secretaries of the Southern Independence Association, recited an "Address to the Southern Cross," from the pen, I believe, of an Irish lady, not unknown in the world of magazines and reviews. The lines have certainly more of the vis viva than we mostly see now-a-days, and therefore I append them:

THE SOUTHERN CROSS.*

Fling wide each fold, brave Flag, unrolled
In all thy breadth and length!
Float out unfurled, and show the world
A new-born nation's strength.
Thou dost not wave all bright and brave
In holiday attire;
Mid cannon chimes a thousand times
Baptised in blood and fire!
No silken toy to flaunt in joy,
When careless shouts are heard:
Where thou art borne all scathed and torn,
A nation's heart is stirred.
Where half-clad groups of toil-worn troops
Are marching to the wars,
What grateful tears and heartfelt cheers
Salute thy Cross of Stars!
Thou ne'er hast seen the pomp and sheen,
The pageant of a court;
Or masquerade of war's parade,
When fields are fought in sport:
But thou know'st well the battle yell
From which thy foemen reel,
When down the steeps, resistless, leaps
A sea of Southern steel!
Thou know'st the storm of balls that swarm
In dense and hurtling flight,
When thy crossed bars, a blaze of stars,
Plunge headlong through the fight:
Where thou art furled are thickest hurled
The thunderbolts of war;
And thou art met with loudest threat
Of cannon from afar.
For thee is told the merchant's gold:
The planter's harvests fall:
Thine is the gain of hand and brain,
And the heart's wealth of all!
For thee each heart has borne to part
With what it holds most dear;
Through all the land no woman's hand
Has stayed one volunteer!
Though from thy birth outlawed on earth,
By older nations spurned,
Their full-grown fame may dread the name
Thy infancy has earned.
For thou dost flood the land with blood,
And sweep the seas with fire;
And all the earth applauds the worth
Of deeds thou dost inspire!
Thy stainless field shall empire wield,
Supreme from sea to sea,
And proudly shine the honoured sign
Of peoples yet to be.
When thou shalt grace the hard-won place
The nations grudge thee now,
No land shall show to friend or foe
A nobler flag than thou!

* These are the lines, the publication of which, in a Baltimore paper, was punished by the summary arrest and banishment across the lines, of editors and proprietors.

In a late letter to the Times, referring to the battle of Chancellorsville, Mr. Spence (S.) says: "This is the ninth great battle of the war. In no one of them have the guns of the Southern army counted fewer at night than in the morning. The battles of Fredericksburg and Gettysburg balance each other; in both the advantage of position decided the event in the repulse of the assailant. Sharpsburg was a drawn battle, in which no guns were lost on either side, and each on the following day occupied his first position. The other six, Bull Run, Shiloh, Richmond, Manassas, Chancellorsville, and now Chattanooga, were all Federal defeats. There is no more remarkable page in military history, if, indeed, there be any that will compare with the records of this Southern army. Apart from innumerable minor actions, it may be said, 'We fought, within three years, nine great battles in the open field. In none of them did we lose artillery, or retreat but in unbroken order. In six of them we took guns from the enemy; in one we put him to ignominious flight; in two others his gunboats saved him from utter ruin; in another the river, over which he had escaped by night, preserved him; in two others the lines of Washington and Chattanooga gave him shelter from our swords. We have fought against numbers and artillery usually double our own; against naval forces and river transport with which we had nothing to compete. Uncheered by applause, uninspired by any of the pomps of war; with imperfect arms, inferior artillery, often without shoes, not seldom on half rations, never properly equipped, we have defended our country, and in what manner nine great battles may testify.'"

BLOCKADE STATISTICS.

(From the Nassau Guardian, September 23.)

August 26.—The steamer Banshee, Captain Steele, arrived from Wilmington on Sunday, with news to the 18th instant; and the steamer Fannie, Captain Moore, arrived from Charleston yesterday morning, with dates to the 21st instant. We learn that the steamer Hebe, from Nassau, had been chased ashore near Port Fisher.

September 9.—The steamer Antonica, Captain Adair, arrived on Sunday from Charleston, with dates from that city to the 3rd instant. The papers contain Northern news to the 29th, and European intelligence to the 19th ult. The steamer Hebe was destroyed off New Inlet, North Carolina, on the 18th ult., while attempting to run the blockade. The United States steamer Nippon discovered her and gave chase. The Hebe was run ashore, but was set on fire by the crew of the Nippon, who boarded her, the Confederates on shore firing at their boats all the time. The Federals also succeeded in destroying the goods landed from the Hebe. The Confederate States steamer Oconee, Lieutenant O. F. Johnson, Confederate States Navy, commanding, with a cargo of 323 bales of compressed upland cotton and 90 tons of coal, bound for Nassau, sprung a leak on the 19th ult., and was lost. Two boat-loads of the crew arrived safely at Savannah. The steamer Don arrived to-day from Wilmington, with dates to the 4th instant. Nothing particular had transpired on that day.

September 16.—Three steamers have arrived from Wilmington since Monday—the Margaret and Jessie, General Beauregard, and Virginia.

September 23.—Our correspondent at Alice Town, North Bimini, in a communication dated 27th August, informs us that the Federal gunboat Sagamore had captured, on the 8th of that month, the sloop Clara Louisa and schooner Shot, of Green Turtle Cay, Abaco; and schooners Southern Rights and Ann, of Nassau. At the time our correspondent wrote there were about eight ships lying at anchor on the north side of the Biminis, in consequence of southerly winds and calms. We learn that the Federal gunboat Princess Royal recently cut off the British brig Atlantic in Mexican waters, and having transferred all her hands, except the captain and two boys, to the former, placed the latter in charge of a prize crew of seven men. While the Atlantic was being steered in the direction of New Orleans, her captain and the two boys bound down the prize crew, and succeeded in taking the vessel to Havana.

ANOTHER TERRIBLE ARGUMENT FOR PEACE.

(From the New York Daily News.)

Ever since the fall of Vicksburg the Radical press has assumed a tone of easy confidence in regard to the military situation. The South already in imagination was subdued and humbled, and the question most elaborately discussed was not how to conquer, but how to treat the conquered. The object of this was to mislead the people into reverence for the military power of the Federal Government, which the Administration designed to employ as an engine to control the next elections. It was hoped that the indecisive but exciting incidents of the siege of Charleston would occupy the public mind and soothe the impatience of the masses, while skilful inactivity in the field elsewhere would avoid an important collision and permit the energies of the Administration to be devoted to political triumph in the North. The activity of the Confederates has disturbed a part of this machinery, and to-day the country stands amazed in the presence of unexpected disaster, and humanity again shudders in the contemplation of another shambles red with human slaughter.

If the defeat of Rosecrans had been a victory, it would not have advanced us one step toward reconciliation or reconstruction. It is time that the people should accept the truth that brute force is utterly incompetent to the task assigned it. A mistaken policy, founded upon the ambition and fanaticism of the men in power, has drenched the land in gore and darkened it with private sorrow and public misfortune. It has accomplished a certain degree of destruction of life and property, and threatens as much in the future. But further than this, it has effected nothing; nor will it, though the struggle should be prolonged for decades. Yesterday the Star of the North seemed at its zenith; to-day it sinks behind a cloud; to-morrow it may set in storm and darkness, or rise again glorious with more resplendent rays. But while bathed in blood, whether it soars or falls, it is the sign of woe, the portent of misfortune.

The dead that strew the plain where this last butchery of brothers has been consummated, are so many silent but touching appeals to their countrymen to pause in their unnatural work. The lamentations that again will ascend from the hearts of the bereaved, should be sufficient, in their plaintive eloquence, to convince the most ardent idolater of war that his unsparring deity demands too terrible a sacrifice, and extends a boon too scant and worthless in return. The triumph of one field seems but to balance the disaster of another; and so we pass from exultation to despondency, from hope to doubt, from victory to defeat; or, reversing the routine, pass from disaster to success; and in the end, all that will remain to attest the severity of the ordeal, will be some hundred thousand mounds that tell where brave men fell, some hundred thousand desolated homes, and millions of aching hearts that have lost some treasure upon those fields of carnage, for which all the laurels of the conqueror cannot repay them.

While one battle thus succeeds another, improving or weakening the military situation, but leaving the political situation without the shadow of a change, the opportunities for negotiation come and go, unnoticed, or purposely ignored by those in power. Yet the people must have come to the conclusion, by this time, that negotiation presents the only hope of averting mutual exhaustion and national ruin. There is no doubt that Europe, more clear-sighted as an observer than we participants of these infernal discords, has long since regarded the strife as a disgrace to civilization and Christianity.

A few more battles, whether victories or defeats, will leave us in a poor condition to resent or to repel a foreign interference. Certain oracular signs insist that unless the war close with this campaign, by our own agency, it will end soon afterward by the force of European intervention. When Vicksburg fell we implored the Administration to use the opportunity for negotiation. Instead, the Administration journals fell to inventing plans for the maltreatment of the conquered South. A shadow has now fallen across the Vicksburg prestige. We are, perhaps, upon the downward grade. While yet the military ascendancy can be claimed by the North, let us negotiate. Another Confederate victory will turn the scale against us, if it be not already turned by the result of the last battle, the most important, doubtless, of the war. Now is the time for the Democracy to give prominence to the peace sentiment, which, after all, is the strength of the party, and if used, will be its triumph.

LORD BROUGHAM ON AMERICA.

The following is that part of Lord Brougham's address delivered on the 7th inst. in Edinburgh, at the opening of the Seventh Annual meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science which relates to America:—

But, whatever may have been the proximate cause of the contest, its continuance is the result of a national vanity without example and without bounds. Persons subject to this failing are despised, not hated; and it is an ordinary expression respecting him who is without the weakness, that he is too proud to be vain. But when a people are seized with it they change the name, and call it love of glory. Of the individual we often hear the remark that, despicable as the weakness is, it leads to no bad actions. Nothing can be more false; it leads to many crimes, and to that disregard of truth which is the root of all offences. Certainly, it produces none of the worst crimes; the man who is a prey to vanity thirsts not for the blood of his neighbour. How fearfully otherwise is it when a nation is its slave! Magnifying itself beyond all measure and despising the rest of mankind, blinded and intoxicated with self-satisfaction, persuaded that their very crimes are proofs of greatness, and believing that they are both admired and envied, the Americans have not only been content with the destruction of half a million, but vain of the slaughter. Their object being to retain a great name among nations for their extent of territory, they exulted in the wholesale bloodshed by which it must be accomplished, because others were unable to make such a sacrifice. The struggle of above two years, which loosened all the bands that held society together, and gave to millions the means of showing their capacity, has produced no genius, civil or military; while the submission to every caprice of tyranny has been universal and habitual, and never interrupted by a single act of resistance to the most flagrant infractions of personal freedom. The mischiefs of mob supremacy have been constantly felt, for the calamity of rational and respectable men keeping aloof from the management of affairs has resulted in the tyranny of the multitude. To this tyrant the nominal rulers have never withheld their submission, and the press, catering for the appetites of the populace and pandering to their passions, has persisted in every misrepresentation which might most disguise the truth as to passing events: exaggerating each success, extenuating each defeat, often describing failure as victory; while the multitude, if the truth by chance reached them, were one day sunk in despair, another elated to an ecstasy, almost at the pleasure of their rulers and their guides. Nor were the falsehoods thus propagated confined to the events of the war: they extended to all things—to the measures of the Government and the acts of foreign nations. The public feeling must not be thwarted; the people desired to hear whatever gratified their vanity or raised their spirits, and in this delusion must they live as long as the war lasts and the rule is in the hands of the mob. The truth they will never hear, because they desire to hear what is pleasing, and not what is true. But it would be a great mistake to charge on their false guides the follies and the crimes which they chime in with and do their best to perpetuate. The people are determined in their course. Far from feeling shame at the cruel scenes which modern ages, nay, which Christian times have seen nothing to equal—a spectacle at which the whole world stands aghast, almost to incredulity—they actually glory in it as a proof of their higher nature, believe themselves to be the envy as the flower of mankind, and fancy that their prowess would triumph over the most powerful States of Europe. In such illusions their chiefs may not practically join, but the people are, beyond doubt, a prey to them, and will continue so to the end.

"Hear the just law, the judgment of the skies:

They that hate truth shall be the dupes of lies;

And if they will be cheated to the last,

Delusions strong as hell shall bind them fast."

(COWER—Progress of Error.)

The feeling towards England which prevails among the American people, though arising from the excess of national vanity, and its kindred envy, is certainly in part the remains of the old quarrel that led to the separation. We are hated and despised. Neither feeling is at all reciprocal, but among our kinsfolk it prevails in a degree almost amounting to mental alienation.

THE Southern journals have expressed their satisfaction at the establishment of the proposed monarchy in Mexico. This is as we expected. The opportunity of forming an alliance with France is not one which it would be politic to throw away if it were afforded by the European Power. Whatever may be the opinion of the Southern Government on the expediency of having a monarchy raised under European auspices on their western frontier, no doubt can exist as to the propriety, under existing circumstances, of giving to that monarchy their most strenuous support. Indeed, the interests both of the French and of the Confederate Governments are so identical in this matter, that there can be little doubt that, sooner or later, an alliance will be formed, if not between France and the South, certainly between the latter and Mexico. The chief dangers with which Mexico will be threatened will come from the North; and however or whenever the civil war may terminate, the enmity between the Northern and Southern States will long continue to subsist. France has so steadily pursued the course of strict neutrality that she would doubtless hesitate to form an alliance with one of the belligerents, even though by so doing she advanced her own interests in Mexico. But the question of the recognition of the independence of the Southern Confederacy stands on a different footing. Totally irrespective of individual interests, neutral States may well come to the conclusion that the time has arrived for admitting the infant Confederacy into the family of nations. The year is approaching its close, and if at the commencement of the next one the relative positions of the belligerents should remain unchanged, we think, that the European Powers should acknowledge as an accomplished fact the independence of the Southern States.—Morning Post, Oct. 22.

WHAT is there in our situation to make any man despond? We have gained since this war commenced the most astonishing series of victories ever obtained by a people similarly situated. We have made a name among the people of the earth in three years such as scarcely any other people ever made in three centuries. We have already fought more battles and gained more victories than England has done since the days of Clive, although within the period which produced Clive and the present time the whole of India has been overrun and conquered. We have done all this, and have lost Vicksburg! Even though the enemy had obtained the free navigation of the river by the fall of that place, the blow would not be irreparable. Nor would it be should Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile fall along with it. When they shall have made all these conquests their labour will have begun. To take our towns on the seacoasts and the rivers is but taking the rough covering from the cocoa-nut before essaying to break the shell.—Richmond Dispatch.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Boulevard-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

The INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the paper made:—

At Liverpool, to WM. KNOX, Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings, at Manchester, F. A. HASLEHAM, Esq., Manchester Southern Club Office, Market-street.

At Paris, to Messrs. PFEIFFER and MULLER, 52, Rue du Château d'Eau, Paris.

At Turin, to Sr. FILIPPO MANETTA, 4, Borgo Nuovo.

At St. Thomas (West Indies), C. W. WHITE, Esq.

THE INDEX.

The Situation in Tennessee.

THE invasion of Eastern Tennessee is not unlikely to be the turning-point of the war. The difficulties and dangers of Rosecrans's position are so great that the Federal Government must furnish him with reinforcements at any cost. On the other hand, the advantages gained by Bragg at Chicamauga Creek are so full of promise to the Confederacy, and the weakness of his opponent is so obvious, that we may be sure the Southern generals will devote every man they can spare to the expulsion and destruction of the Federal army of Tennessee. So both sides are hurrying all their troops to the battle-ground, and the most interesting campaign of the war seems only to have opened on the Chicamauga. But the overweening confidence of the North has placed its army at an enormous disadvantage. Even Rosecrans has been completely carried away by the stories invented to please the Northern palate, and to have conducted his advance into the hilly district of Tennessee, as if the only obstacle he had to fear was the impracticability of the roads. We hear of no such thing as a reserve. The various stations, such as Murfreesboro, Shelbyville, and Tullahoma, which protected his line of communication, were held in force, but could only provide for their own defence. When the Federal army reached the line of the Tennessee the official press exultingly proclaimed resistance at an end, so that even if there had been any intention of reinforcing Rosecrans we may be quite sure it was abandoned. Even the commander himself, usually so cautious, believed in his conquest, and decided on pushing on at all hazards upon Rome and Atlanta, and occupying Northern Georgia before the winter. He had evidently no notion that a powerful army awaited him a few miles from Chattanooga, nor is there any reason to believe he made any requisition upon Washington for fresh troops. In all probability, then, the first call for reinforcements was made on the day of the first battle, when Rosecrans became aware of his danger, and left his army to organise a secure line of retreat and construct a strong defence at Chattanooga. But fresh troops could only arrive from two quarters—from the Army of the Potomac or from General Grant. President Lincoln's fears for the capital will not permit him to weaken General Meade to any material extent, whilst Lee's army, perched on the high lands south of the Rapidan and Rappahannock, threatens every day to sweep down upon the Federal army, and drive it once more to Arlington Heights. From Meade, then, no great amount of help is to be looked for. General Grant can better spare troops, as he has no enemy immediately in his front, and it is certain that every available division of his army has been sent on as rapidly as possible into Tennessee. But to move thirty or forty thousand men many hundred miles is a work of time. The call was suddenly made; the soldiers of Grant's army were dispersed; the army itself was in course of re-organisation; and Grant, to whose activity and energy its successes were due, was too ill to direct its movements. Moreover, this army occupied certain points of defence along the Mississippi, which were necessary to the retention of the adjoining country; so that it is difficult to believe more than 25,000 or 30,000 men could be spared at once for the relief of Rosecrans. These troops would have to ascend the Mississippi and descend the Cumberland River, exposed to the enemy's sharpshooters, and then to be sent from Nashville, through a country swarming with guerillas, to the Tennessee River. With Burnside compelled to act on the defensive at Knoxville, with Banks fully occupied in Louisiana, and Meade unable to attack Lee with any hope of success, Rosecrans cannot hope to obtain 50,000 fresh men within the next three or four weeks. Without them his communications must be intercepted, and he will be compelled to make a disastrous retreat through the enemy's country. We pointed out a month ago the great advantage the Confederates had reaped in the contraction of their line of defence, and the extraordinary facility it afforded for a concentration of two armies at any given point. It is this which gained them the battle of Chicamauga, and which promises them still more striking triumphs. There seems to be no reason to doubt that a portion of the army of Virginia under Longstreet fought at the late battle. But long before this, large reinforcements must have reached General Bragg from Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. At Chicamauga we hear nothing of General Johnston's force, nor of the remains of Pemberton's army. These two bodies combined would give an army of 60,000 men, who, in the present distribution of the Federal army, could easily be spared from their own departments, and despatched by circuitous lines of railroad to Tennessee. Even Beauregard might contribute another 5,000 men to the struggle; almost every soldier in North Carolina might be brought into the field. Altogether we suspect that the Confederate reinforcements would fully equal in numbers and efficiency the Federal succours, whilst they would be far more speedily available. Indeed, events seem to have decided this point; for it is difficult to believe that Bragg, unless he had been largely reinforced, would have been in a position to threaten Rosecrans's front, and at the same time detach considerable forces to the enemy's rear by both flanks. Yet he has actually done this. At the latest date the Federal lines of communication of Tennessee had been pierced at various points by the Confederates. McMinnville, a town seventy miles south-west of Nashville, had been captured, with 500 prisoners; Shelbyville, south of Murfreesboro is said to have surrendered, with 15,000 prisoners; here and there desultory cavalry combats had taken place with varying success, but all tending to one result, the gradual isolation of Burnside's army; bridges, telegraph wires, and railroads were the special objects of attack, showing that the Confederates were fully intent upon making Rosecrans pay dearly for his imprudent advance. The Federals boast that their forces are quite able to keep open the communication, but the difficulty of "subsisting" Rosecrans's force, at a distance of 250 miles from its base of operations, by provisions transported through a hostile country in the possession of the Confederate horsemen must be enormous; and we can hardly believe that Rosecrans will dare to await, in his present position, the winter months, when, to the obstruction of an enemy's force, will be added swollen streams and roads impassable by the mud. As it is, he is confronted at Mission Ridge by an equal if not superior force, which he dare not attack. He cannot effect a juncture with Burnside. He has only his pontoon bridges at Chattanooga for traversing the Tennessee. At Shelbyville and at McMinnville the Confederates are on his line of communication in formidable numbers, and every day is adding to their strength. It is probable that Federal reinforcements may come up in such numbers as to enable him to extricate himself from the cul de sac in which he is now placed. But we do not believe he will be able to hold Chattanooga, and a defeat before Bragg's victorious army could hardly fail to be a tremendous disaster. Under any circumstances, the Confederates have completely regained their ascendancy in Eastern Tennessee, and the Federals find all the fruits of their successes in the West slipping rapidly from their grasp.

Nor is the fortune of war more favourable to them in other quarters. At Charleston, after a siege of ninety days—the period assigned by Mr. Seward for the duration of the war—General Gilmore has been compelled to withdraw his troops to Folly Island, and the operations are virtually suspended. The harbour works are impassable to the iron-clads; the army rots away with the fever consequent on long exposure to the obnoxious exhalations of the marshes of Morris Island, the damp, and bad water. The hopes of New York are still buoyed up with the announcement of an early resumption of the attack by the land and sea forces. But the South knows very well that a larger force than Gilmore has at his disposal is required to storm the defences of Charleston, and awaits the attack in confidence. In Louisiana there is news of further Federal reverses. In Virginia the Confederates are said to be concentrating their forces for a great battle on the Rapidan. Lee stoutly holds his own, whilst guerillas swarm in the rear and on the flanks of Meade's army, and beat up his camps with impunity. It is characteristic of Mr. Lincoln and his advisers that under the circumstances he has ordered a national thanksgiving: whether it is for the defeat at Chattanooga, the failure at Charleston, or the inactivity of General Meade, we do not pretend to know; but we venture to say that there is no other nation in the world which would submit to this horrible mockery, or which would permit so despicable a clique of politicians to prostitute a great national solemnity to its own vile purposes, and thus publicly proclaim—a lie.

Colonel Tamay at Chertsey.

AGRICULTURAL Societies perform a very important part in the informal politics of England, in the creation of that motive power which works the machinery of the Constitution. Their gatherings are at once the most pleasant and the most respectable sort of public meetings. They are not "got up" by politicians for political purposes: packed to listen to pre-arranged speeches and come to a pre-determined vote. They are assemblies of Englishmen met together to talk over their own affairs; the affairs of their profession, of their county, and finally of their country. So little partisan or political is their character, that party politics are usually excluded from their after-dinner speeches by a formal rule, which, though often violated and generally evaded, marks their entire freedom from all suspicion of set political intentions or connection with Parliamentary party warfare. They bring together two of the most important classes of English society, and afford them an opportunity of ventilating their views primarily on agriculture, and afterwards de rebus omnibus et quibusdam aliis. The "gentlemen of England," the landowners of immemorial titles and families that have been known and honoured in their neighbourhood for half-a-dozen centuries—the merchant-princes who, after the manner of rich Englishmen, are desirous of becoming the founders of future landed families—the few of the old English yeomanry that remain to us, the men who farm the lands that were farmed by their yeoman ancestors in the days of Cœur-de-Lion—the tenant-farmers, many of whom have held their farms for half-a-score of generations, and some of whom are men of considerable means and of far higher and more respectable character, morally and intellectually, than the tradesmen of English towns—the heart and backbone of the English body politic, the men whose influence has hitherto at least moulded the national character, and who are caricatured in the typical John Bull—meet round the social board, and welcome heartily any speaker who has either a county standing or a political reputation, or any stranger whom curiosity or sympathy may have brought thither, and whom the chairman, knowing him to have something to say, invites to speak. The hearers are frank, hearty, perhaps a little noisy; they cheer with far more power of heart and lungs than an Exeter Hall assembly, and express their disapprobation with less reserve than is usual in the House of Commons. But they afford a sort of miniature representation of England, or of the best and least American side of England; the man who meets them feels that at last he has seen what England is and how she came to be so; the man who speaks to them and wins them feels that he has England on his side.

Such was the audience to which, on Friday last, Col. Lamar was introduced by the chairman, Mr. W. S. Lindsay; and the reception which he met with was the most enthusiastic that such an audience could give. Something, no doubt, was due to the personal qualifications of the speaker; for there are few men more fitted to win the heart of an English audience. An orator of the English stamp, with a perfect command of simple Saxon language, with the bearing of a soldier and a gentleman, perfectly free from all those affectations of the platform which Englishmen abhor, and gifted with that irresistible charm which impassioned earnestness lends to eloquence. The audience to which he spoke at Chertsey was precisely the one best suited to appreciate him; and if it had rested with those who heard him, he might have spoken for hours to their infinite delight and probably to his own complete satisfaction. Never were orator and audience on better terms. Col. Lamar might have imagined that he was speaking to the audience assembled by the presence of the judges in an assize town of his native State; his hearers might have thought that they listened to an English soldier, wearing on his breast the honours earned in India or before Sebastopol. Unfortunately the duration of his speech depended on those who could not hear him. Outside the door were assembled a multitude of labourers, claimants of the Society's prizes, and their friends; and these, standing in the cold, weary of waiting and anxious to receive their honours, grew impatient of the eloquence which they could not hear, and which detained them from that part of the ceremony in which they were chiefly interested. The noise outside became so peremptory that Mr. Lindsay was forced to obey it, and, to the mortification of the whole party, to cut short the speech of his guest at its most interesting point.

We reproduce Colonel Lamar's speech, and we shall not, therefore, detain our readers by any comments on what he did say. We could not possibly put his exposition of the Southern cause in better language than his own. Any remarks of ours would only weaken the effect of the contrast which he drew between the pretensions of the North, which has abolished liberty while professing to be the champion of human freedom, and the South, which, in the midst of a desperate struggle for national existence, with half a million of invaders on her soil, has maintained intact the rights of the States, the liberty of the citizens, the independence of the judges, and the supremacy of the civil law. We can, however, bear witness to the enthusiasm with which the speech was received. We have witnessed many enthusiastic meetings; we have been spectators of some of Mr. Bright's most brilliant and successful displays; but we never saw faces expressive of such cordial sympathy, or heard cheers significant of such complete approval, such entire and earnest conviction, as those of the gentlemen farmers who listened to Colonel Lamar.

What Colonel Lamar began to say and had not the opportunity to finish, is what we have much wished that some Southern orator who could ensure a hearing on the subject would explain to an English audience—viz., what is that institution in the South which, under the name of negro slavery, moves Abolitionists to frenzy, and sensible Englishmen to a good deal of mistaken indignation. We need hardly say that it bears no resemblance to anything described by Miss Martineau or Mrs. Stowe, and in no way merits the curses bestowed on it by Mr. Beecher and Mr. Wendell Phillips. It cannot be necessary to explain that the countrymen of Colonel Lamar are not in the habit of mutilating negroes for mere wantonness or roasting them alive for misdemeanours in their service. We need hardly say that the corps of Stonewall Jackson was not composed of men who were accustomed to force their female servants, by the terror of the lash, to become mothers of mulattoes, to be sold hereafter for their father's profit or worked to death on his plantation. No sane Englishman now believes that the slaves are ill-treated, as a general rule; any more than he believes that English gentlemen are in the habit of maltreating their horses or dogs. But a good many Englishmen believe that the legal position and social status of the slave is much like that of a horse or a dog; and this was the error, we fancy, which Colonel Lamar wished to dispel.

The slave is by law "a chattel." On this subject the Rev. Mr. Beecher, at Manchester, made an extensive display of ignorance; presuming on the resemblance between "chattel" and "cattle," in amusing innocence of even such smattering of law as would have taught him that "chattel" is the Norman-French and "cattle" the English translation of the law-Latin "cattalum." Now the word chattel, or cattalum, does not mean cattle, that is beasts, but "movable property," or rather property that follows in its incidents the law relative to movables. Beasts being of old the chief sort of cattalla, the word was by vulgar usage applied, in an English form, to them. But it includes all property that descends to the executor or administrator and not to the heir; all that we call "personal property." We never applied it to slaves. But we had the thing, though not the name. A villein regardant—a serf attached to the land, was a sort of real property, an appendage of the realty. A villein in gross belonging, not to the land, but to the person of his lord, would hold exactly the condition, as property, of a Southern slave. He would go to the administrator, not to the heir, on his lord's death; and "if he ran away or was purloined" he was recoverable at law in the same method "as beasts and other chattels." What Southern law means by calling the slave a chattel, is that he is a villein in gross and not a villein regardant. And the sense of the phrase of which Mr. Beecher, in his ignorance, talked so much nonsense, is simply this:—that the master's right to the services of his slave is of the nature, and follows the law of personal and not of real property. We say, his right to the services of his slave advisedly; for this is all the right he has. Neither the soul nor the body of his slave belongs to him; he cannot starve him, nor maim him; and his right of correction is simply analogous to that which an Englishman by the common law had over his wife, and still has over his children and apprentices under age.

We do not affirm that the Southern law of the relation between master and servant is altogether satisfactory. Perhaps it would have been mended before now, had the Southern States been left to settle their own affairs in their own way; perhaps it will be amended when they are left to themselves. In the meantime, the rights not secured by the law are to a great extent protected by public opinion. Southern society does not call the slave a chattel; but—as Mr. Beresford Hope the other day remarked—a servant; it condemns the slave-dealer as we do the usurer; it excommunicates the man who ill-uses his slaves as we excommunicate the man who is known to maltreat his wife and children: and the one offence is not more frequent in the South than the other in England. Finally, the churches of the South hold the slave "a man and a brother:" a man incompetent to his own protection, and a brother in perpetual childhood; but still a being for whom his Christian master is in God's sight a trustee, and for whose good guidance and kind treatment he is responsible, "as he will answer it at the awful day of judgment."

Mr. Attorney-General for the Defence.

Much abuse has been bestowed by thoughtless or ignorant moralists—and most professed moralists are exceedingly ignorant or exceedingly thoughtless of practical business—upon the professional etiquette of the bar, which not only allows but almost obliges counsel to accept a brief, and do his best in a cause which he knows or believes to be a bad one. Much eloquent vituperation has been wasted on this wicked impartiality between truth and falsehood; on a system of justice which is said to do its best to put guilt and innocence on an equal footing, and let both have a good start before the hounds of law are slipped upon their traces. But this virtuous nonsense will never be echoed by any one who has learned, from the discipline of controversy, theological, political, or literary, the vast advantage to the interests of truth of having a bad cause as well stated as possible, so that the advocate of the better side may understand clearly what are the weak points of his own case and the strong points of his adversary's; may see what sophisms may be stated, or what doubts may arise, to mislead the minds of honest men or justify the one-sidedness of predetermined partisans; or may at least be assured that everything that can be urged against him has been urged, and that if all that has been stated on the other side amounts to nothing it is because there is literally "no case for the defence." He knows, too, what is the surest indication of the absence of a "case;" and listens to vituperation not only with patience but with pleasure, knowing that counsel never begin to scold so long as they have anything to do. In the great suits, so intimately connected, which are now being pleaded at the bar of public opinion—the suit of the Confederate States against the North, and that in which England is plaintiff, v. John Earl Russell, defendant—we certainly enjoy the advantage of having had the cause of falsehood stated with consummate ability, in Parliament, in the press, and on the platform. We have caught a glimpse, on the brief held by Mr. Foster, Mr. Bright, and Miss ——— in the first case, of the famous traditional instruction, "There is no evidence for the defence; therefore abuse the plaintiff's attorney," and we render full and hearty justice to the admirable manner in which that instruction has been carried out wherever the case has come on; now in the House of Commons, now in Exeter Hall, or that which derives its title from Free Trade; and now in the columns of the Spectator or the Daily News. In that case the verdict has been already given; the sentence seems to have been passed; and the appeal lies now before a higher court, to be decided by the wager of battle. We need waste no words on that subject, but turn with more interest to the admirable special pleading displayed in the second case. We have already paid a due tribute of praise to the sophisticated talents of "Historicus;" we now look to the final argument for the defence delivered by Sir Roundell Palmer at Richmond, Yorkshire. Mr. Attorney-General is, with one or two exceptions, the ablest lawyer now at the bar; indeed, he is the only barrister of the ministerial party whose legal opinion has any sort of weight or whose speeches are ever worth reading. He is not, certainly, the peer of the late Lord Lyndhurst or of the great lawyers of Lord Lyndhurst's youth and prime; Sir Hugh Cairns is perhaps his superior; but he stands as far above the Jameses, the Colliers, the Seymours, who dishonour Lord Palmerston by their support, as General McClellan above General Butler, or Jefferson Davis above Abraham Lincoln. We may be sure that he has done for his clients his best, and the best that can be done; and if his argument will not hold water, if it leaks at every comma and breaks down at every sentence, if it be the feeblest that he ever delivered, we may be sure that in this suit, as in the former, there is "no case for the defence."

The indictment against Earl Russell comprises three specific charges. First, that he has refused to the Confederate States the recognition to which, by international usage, they were entitled, and which it was the obvious interest of England to accord to them. Secondly, that he has allowed the Federal Government to stretch the law of nations to an extent hitherto unknown, and to commit, under a false colour of belligerent rights, gross outrages on British commerce. Thirdly, that he has seized ships supposed to be intended for the service of the Confederate States, without evidence and in violation of law, municipal and international. To these charges Mr. Attorney-General directed his defence; and we will examine, seriatim, his reply to each.

First. He says that the Confederate States were not entitled to recognition as an independent Power, inasmuch as their independence cannot be held established while the war continues and the enemy has a lodgment on their soil. We meet this first by a reductio ad absurdum. Suppose that General Banks is reinforced and obstinately maintains his hold of New Orleans, which he can do so long as the Federal navy is superior to that of the Confederates; suppose that the siege of Charleston is still maintained by the naval forces. Suppose meantime that Rosecranz and Burnside are separately attacked, crushed, and forced to surrender with 100,000 men. Suppose that General Meade is also routed, and the Federal Government forced to abandon Maryland and surrender Washington. Suppose that battles are fought in Ohio and Pennsylvania, resulting in the evacuation of those States by the Federal armies. Mr. Attorney-General's argument implies that even in this case we must not consider the Confederate States to have established their independence; for what he lays down as the reasons for refusing to admit it now would then be still in full force. If, therefore, those reasons are conclusive now, they would be conclusive in the case supposed. As no sane man would withhold recognition then, it is clear that the reasons assigned by Sir R. Palmer do not justify us in withholding it now.

The Attorney-General admits that we did right to recognise the Confederate States as a belligerent Power, because they are States "exercising government for themselves and in themselves for the time being," and are actually carrying on war. We add that they have exercised government and carried on war for nearly three years: equivalent, at the present rate of warfare, to fifteen years of belligerency in the times prior to 1840. They have some 300,000 men in the field, at the lowest estimate. They have gained half-a-dozen pitched battles as great and as obstinately contested as that of Waterloo. They have annihilated two great armies. They have twice invaded the enemy's territory with a regular force, fought him on his own soil with indecisive results, and retired unmolested with cannon, baggage, and plundered stores. When, under such circumstances, was recognition ever refused? And, under such circumstances, is not the refusal a monstrous anomaly?

Mr. Attorney-General says that recognition is not all that is wanted. The friends of the South want intervention too. This is simply a misapprehension of facts. If England do not think necessary for her own honour to interfere, as in Greece, against the more than Turkish barbarity of the invaders, that is purely a matter of English policy. What the South demands as her due, what the North deprecates with passionate cries and frantic menaces, is recognition, pure and simple.

Mr. Attorney-General says that precedents are in his favour. We deny it. The precedents of Greece and Belgium are objected to as proving too much. Let these pass. But what of Texas, recognised flagrante bello? What of the Spanish Colonies, recognised while they had hardly a government, and while Spain had still as strong a hold on them as Abraham Lincoln on the Confederate States? Mr. Attorney-General cites, to condemn it, the precedent set by America in 1849. It is, indeed, only of value as barring the right of the Federal Government to object; had we chosen to recognise South Carolina in January, 1861. But if Hungary had maintained her independence for two years, and beaten two or three Austrian and Russian armies, who doubts that France and England would have recognised her?

Finally, says the Attorney-General, let us do as we would be done by. Not as we should be done by; for if Ireland were in full revolt; if an independent Government had sat for two years in Dublin, giving law to the whole island; if we had but a foothold on Ulster, had captured Belfast, and were bombarding Cork; if Protestant and Catholic, Saxon and Celt, were alike in arms against us; if Ireland had an army of 300,000 men victorious in several pitched battles, who doubts that an American ambassador would be "giving aid and comfort to our rebels," and that an Irish embassy would be receiving all honour and hospitality that Washington and New York could afford them? But, to do as we would be done by, let us ask how we should feel if, at war with a European coalition, our ambassador were dismissed and our independence denied by the Confederate States because a Russian force had been landed, and occupied Sutherland, and a French fleet was besieging Portsmouth? And the case is exactly parallel; for our action towards the Confederacy is in truth a withdrawal of the recognition accorded by express treaty to four, and by implication to every one, of its component sovereignties.

Secondly. We are told that the Federal Government has exercised belligerent rights no more strictly than we did in days gone by. In regard to the blockade this is irrelevant; for its legality depends on the fourth article of the Convention of 1856. In regard to captures it is untrue. When did we ever blockade a neutral harbour, as the Federals have blockaded our colonial ports? When did we ever fire shot and shell upon neutral shores? When did we claim the right to stop a trade between neutral ports because it fed a contraband trade with a blockaded coast? When did we condemn ships for carrying "contraband of war" to a neutral market? When did we seize a ship in a neutral port, on the plea that she had received a part of her cargo from an enemy's coast? All these things the Federal cruisers have done; and all these things, it appears, Lord Russell's advocate defends. Will Mr. Attorney-General have the goodness to cite the precedents or authorities on which he relies to make good so novel a doctrine?

Thirdly. The counsel for the defence has not stated very clearly the view he takes of the justification to be made out for the seizure of British-built ships on the charge that they are intended for the Confederate service. As far as we understand him, he means to affirm:—

a. That there is no evidence of any purpose so to employ some at least of the ships seized.

b. That, nevertheless, there is a moral certainty that the Foreign Enlistment Act has been "evaded," and is to be evaded again.

c. That British merchants are carrying on "an unlawful trade," in dereliction of their patriotic duties and in disloyal contempt of the law.

If there be no evidence against the ships, their acquittal is a matter of certainty. If they are sure to be acquitted, their seizure is, towards the owner, an act of pure vexation and gross illegality; towards the public, a crime of the deepest dye, impairing at once the majesty of law and the security of commerce; in point of policy, a cowardly compliance with the unwarrantable demands of a foreign Power. Mr. Attorney-General knows—none better—that there is no sounder or more absolute rule of law and equity (more often identical than fools and satirists suppose) which insists on material proof, and in default of evidence, refuses to take any account of moral certainties. To hang a man on a moral certainty would be murder; to seize a ship on moral certainty is robbery.

There has been no "evasion" of the Foreign Enlistment Act. On the contrary, there has been a careful endeavour to comply exactly with its provisions, so far as their meaning and intent have been made clear; and this both in the letter and the spirit. It is forbidden by the law to equip, fit out, or arm ships to be employed in hostilities against a Power with which the Queen is at peace; the Chief Baron's ruling establishes the fact that no ship has been "armed, equipped, or fitted out" in a British port for the Confederate service. If that ruling be overthrown, it will be shown that Mr. Laird and his customers, in common with the Chief Baron, have misunderstood the law; not that either they or the Chief Baron have evaded it. The intent of the Foreign Enlistment Act was that British ports should not be made the basis of belligerent operations; the utmost care has been taken to obey this regulation. It may be argued that a ship must have a port of departure in her capacity of belligerent; and that, if armed at sea, her port of departure is that from which she last sailed. If this rule be established, British subjects, and probably the Confederate Government, will be bound not to make such use of our ports, but will still be free to purchase or build ships and send them to a foreign port to be armed: a point clearly established by the American decision in the case of the Bolivar. But the rule is not established, and we think that it cannot be maintained. The object of the distinction drawn at international law between the sale of men-of-war and the equipment of belligerent expeditions by neutrals is to secure the belligerent remedy of capture against the sellers of contraband of war; and this object is sufficiently attained, if the vessel pass completely out of neutral jurisdiction, and reach the high seas, where she is liable to capture, in a defenceless condition. It appears, therefore, that neither the letter, spirit, nor purpose of the Foreign Enlistment Act have been in any way infringed. The law that has been evaded is not that which Parliament enacted and which the Judges interpret, but that which the Foreign Office has thought proper to enforce, and which is to be interpreted at the pleasure or convenience of the Federal Embassy.

The Attorney-General's attack on British merchants, aimed of course at Mr. Laird, is altogether unjust and unwarrantable. The trade in ships carried on by the builders of Birkenhead is exactly as lawful as the trade in arms and ammunition carried on by the merchants and manufacturers of Birmingham. Of course it is at the discretion of the Crown to forbid both or either: but till that prohibition be issued both are equally lawful, and the language used by Mr. Attorney-General involves alike an excess of professional license, and a transgression of ministerial decorum. Loyalty binds men to obey the law of the land or the edict of the Sovereign; it does not bind them to consult the caprice of a Minister or the convenience of a Cabinet.

This is our answer to the elaborate speech of the counsel for Earl Russell. And if our readers deem this answer complete or the Attorney-General's speech inconclusive, they may give their verdict at once, for if Sir Roundell Palmer fail to procure his client's acquittal, there is no other man who can.

SOUTHERN INDEPENDENCE ASSOCIATION.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

Offices Southern Independence Association.
Manchester, Oct. 20, 1863.

SIR,—We regret to find in your last issue that you take exception to a paragraph in our manifesto, and express a belief that it is calculated to "wound the feelings of the Southern people," and awaken a bitter resentment in those whose political cause we have espoused. Nothing could be farther from the intention of our executive, or more contrary to our action through the last eight months. From the beginning of his struggle it has been our desire to gather an accurate knowledge of all the facts of the case, and the convictions we have expressed are drawn from a purely independent and English point of view. We early saw that any restoration of "the Union" was impossible, and that from the legal relations of the States, and the grounds on which Secession was decided, the Southern people were neither "rebels" nor fighting for any "corner-stone of slavery." Still we were content to support the neutrality proclaimed by our Government, in the hope that Northern statesmen would exercise such reasonable control that the strife could not be of long continuance; but when their hiring and unprincipled advocates made our city and county the field of their agitation, outraging the common principles of justice in their determination to show that the North was all right and the South was all wrong, and that our people must continue in their suffering and our staple trade be wasted, while they were settling a political quarrel—some counter-organization appeared to us not only a necessity but an absolute duty. Our Association arose, then, from a view of the political justice involved, and we should have adopted the same course of action, whatever country or people had been concerned. We had no knowledge of the leaders of the Southern Confederacy beyond their public character, nor any connection whatever with either them or their representatives; we never undertook to apologise for their position or institutions, but rather to assert their right of secession, and their just claims to independence and self-government; and to advocate the stoppage of a war which we cannot but regard as a disgrace to the age. We therefore owe no explanation to the people of the South beyond our published documents, and our executive must abide by the views therein enunciated; we only seek that the "proud nationality" we acknowledge to be their due, should be recognised by the governments of Europe as it is by the great body of the people; and we should never advocate the imposition of any political conditions respecting domestic institutions as the price of that recognition, feeling sure that direct commercial intercourse would gradually and peacefully assimilate all social laws and usages of the States to the highest standard, as the subordinate classes might become prepared for any change.

In the columns of THE INDEX we have found the truthful and reasonable views which few portions of the Northern press ever supplied, and we should be sorry if those columns should disseminate any misapprehension of our action in behalf of a cause which has won amongst us so general and so hearty a sympathy.

Trusting you will oblige by insertion of this in your next,
We are, Sir, your most obedient, &c.

JAMES NIELD,
T. MALAN WALKER, } Hon. Secs.

AN INSIDE VIEW OF THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON

FROM AUGUST 14TH TO SEPTEMBER 3RD.

(By our Own Correspondent.)

CHARLESTON, August 14.

Although more than thirty days have elapsed since the siege of Charleston commenced, the interval has been productive of no decisive results. The old city stands prouder and more hopeful than ever, and the enemy continues to pound away at our yet unshaken fortifications. As foretold in my last communication, Fort Wagner, with its solid bed and sides of sand, maintains a sturdy impregnability, and is even stronger to-day than at the beginning of the attack. The defence has become, so to speak, systematised, and the men inured to their work—both as patient infantry and practical artillerists.

Of the nature of our improvements and additional fortifications it would not be prudent to speak at this time. Your Northern files give you all the information of which the enemy are possessed, concerning new batteries on James Island and new guns on Battery Wagner, and it is not for me now either to verify or deny. It is sufficient to state that we are in the highest degree confident of success, and reliant upon our ability to combat all the infernal agencies of destruction yet brought to bear. Of the future no man can speak.

We are not blind to the anticipations of another terrible attack—and soon. We believe that what we have experienced in the past is but child's play to that which is to come, but silently and energetically we are preparing for the worst. Beauregard and Ripley are fully alive to the crisis, and their noblest powers are concentrated to meet its demands. The patient delay of the Federals is ominous, for it tells of giant preparations, of amazing resources, and yet undeveloped schemes, that will make the struggle, when it comes, the most fearful this continent has ever beheld. We know that every day and night is adding to the strength of our antagonist; that guns in every way superior to our own in calibre, range, and number, are being mounted; that works are going up intended to protect their men from our fire; and that when all these things are complete, ship and shore will tremble under the terrible bombardment that will ensue. And yet we fear not. We, too, are labouring, with every muscle braced, to meet the storm, and, thank God and our authorities, not without hope.—Assez.

Since my former letter the firing has been spasmodic, but continued more or less every day. The effect on our side is usually from one to three killed and half a dozen or more wounded in twenty-four hours. Latterly the iron compliments have begun to rain upon us at night, and as an auxiliary the Federals have made use of a strong calcium light, which gives them in its sweep a fair view of the entire harbour. The object they seek to accomplish is undoubtedly to cut off all communication with the island, or, at least, render the trips of our steamers to that point as dangerous and uncomfortable as possible.

Another object is to prevent the repetition of a bold adventure which resulted in the destruction of one of their barges and most of its crew. The steamer Juno, under command of Captain Warley, of the Chicora, ran down to within fifty rods of the enemy's fleet, made a reconnaissance, destroyed the boat alluded to, which was also on a scouting expedition, and safely returned. A fast ram could have sunk two or three of the gunboats, but, unfortunately, the Juno was only a small vessel, employed in running the blockade, and consequently ineffectual for the purpose.

Another assault is not apprehended. Twice the Federals have been taught a bitter lesson; and the probability is that they will now try the power of heavy rifle long-range guns, give Wagner the "go by," and pay exclusive attention to Fort Sumter. Dahlgren, with his iron-clads, thus far has proved cautious, and kept well out of range of the grey old sentinel at our harbour-gate; but when the critical moment arrives, there is no certainty that he will not run up even within the 800 yards which made the fated Keokuk vulnerable to Sumter's well-aimed balls. Meanwhile we wait and pray!

The city shows no evidences of the siege in an interruption of the usual channels of business, and blockade goods appear and disappear as mysteriously as ever. Stocks in the various importing companies, except one—the Bee Company—have been checked in their upward flight; but I believe there has been no falling off in price and no signs of trepidation. Indeed, two vessels arrived in Wilmington, only night before last, whose cargoes will swell the shares of the owners to not ungratifying figures.

Our business men generally, however, have turned their attention to the defence of the city, and are doing their best to further the designs of the Commander-in-chief. Major Willis, for instance—a gentleman formerly connected with the house of Frazer and Co., but now in the service, and reputed to be the ablest quartermaster in the Confederacy—has recently organised a system of wayside homes, collected nearly $40,000, and put them in successful operation. The object of these establishments is to afford food, rest, and shelter to the weary soldiers on their return from duty, and to furnish everything necessary to health or comfort that may be required. These establishments, by the way, now exist in every portion of the Confederacy; and in whatever direction the soldier may be travelling, he will find at every stopping-place, more or less, these "homes," provided by the bounty of a grateful people, and the soft hands of the loveliest ladies of the land to minister to his relief.

I see it officially stated in Northern journals that the loss of General Gilmore in his last assault on Battery Wagner was 635 killed and wounded. Let me state here, on an equally official authority, that upwards of 600 Yankees were buried within our lines on Sunday after the fight, exclusive of those known to be interred by the Federals. Your experience throughout the war has generally told you that Confederate figures do not lie. Believe mine.

I am sorry to confess that our fair country is at present under a cloud, and none but eyes of faith discern the "silver lining." Vicksburg and Port Hudson gone, Lee returned, the enemy in his old position, and no prospects of that speedy and, at the time, almost certain peace, for which we hoped confidently but a little while ago! It is no wonder that our women sigh, our men look solemn, and our newspapers ring out the war note with renewed vehemence; no wonder that Davis and Lee appeal to the bone and sinew of the land to step into the gaps that war has made, and push on afresh to redeem disaster. The sanguine ones among us read no danger in these signs. Once recuperated, the Vicksburg army, which has been exchanged, will return from their homes and rally around their old banner, and with a new leader—Lieut.-Gen. Hardee—be prepared to wipe out the debt of surrender.

General Johnston will then find work for his own army, and the two co-operating in the Mississippi Valley will give us what we have long wanted there—a wall of men, who can operate with or without Bragg, as the emergency demands. The latter having completely checkmated Rosecrans, is lying on his oars near Chattanooga—one of the strongest positions on the Continent—and waiting for his opponent to show his hand. Meanwhile, Grant is tied down by the worst enemy he has yet encountered—a "low-country fever," by physicians regarded more fatal than the yellow fever—and his men are dying by hundreds. While this continues, the bulk of his army can hardly be expected to undertake a great movement—certainly, not to commence a protracted siege of Mobile, which is the next on the programme. Lee, in Virginia, as I said before, is fully capable of holding his own, as we all believe, if not of administering to the Yankees the severest blow they have yet received. Like the Vicksburg army, the Army of the Potomac have a score to wipe out and a victory to gain before they will rest satisfied.

CHARLESTON, August 25.

Our grand old "City by the Sea," still triumphantly rides the storm of battle—still holds at bay her giant adversary and defies his power. Confronted by a fleet of iron monsters declared to be invulnerable, battered by artillery of range and powers such as the demon of war never before conceived, and besieged by an enemy on land, whose skill, resources and antlike perseverance are best illustrated by their tremendous labors, Charleston has for forty-five days, with a fierce and dogged resolution, endured the most stupendous bombardment that ever yet assailed a stronghold; and the siege is not one foot nearer success than it was when the enemy's guns first pounded at our gates. The entrance to the harbour has not been penetrated. Batteries Wagner, Gregg, and Fort Sumter have neither been captured, nor silenced; and, on the contrary, every other Confederate position has been growing in strength while the fight progressed.

My previous letter left the Federals working vigorously under our fire in the erection of additional batteries, while they maintained a bombardment of our works on Morris Island from their gun-boats. Within the last ten days their batteries have been completed and their purpose developed—namely the destruction of Fort Sumter and the bombardment of Charleston with long range rifled guns. Our little sand hills with their half-dozen effective guns having proved themselves impregnable, whether passively receiving in their pliable sides the huge missiles of the enemy, or trembling under the vibration of their own "battlemented thunders," the Federals were forced to resort to the next most feasible plan of reduction, which was to shoot over or to one side of Batteries Wagner and Gregg at the grey, old fort in their rear. The result was not unanticipated.

The old maxim that an ordinary work built of brick and mortar cannot be breached at a greater distance than eight hundred yards, belongs to an age when mechanical ingenuity expended itself in the construction of an eight-inch Columbiad. It was reserved for the present war to develop new engines of destruction, and inaugurate a new era in the struggles between man and man. The North has brought into this contest forces and projectiles to which military science has heretofore been comparatively a stranger. These, operating by day and night on the crumbling walls of Fort Sumter, have succeeded at a distance of 2½ miles, or 4,700 yards, not only in breaching that work, but in reducing its entire south face to a mass of ruins.

Up to the night of Thursday the 20th of August, two thousand five hundred iron bolts, eight inches in diameter, two feet in length, with flat heads of chilled iron, and weighing two hundred pounds each, had struck the Fort, and since that period the enemy have thrown on an average about one thousand per day. Eight times the flag-staff has been shot away and replaced, and there it still floats—a symbol of the heroic determination of Colonel Alfred Rhett, its brave commander, expressed to the writer of these lines months ago: "Sir,—If the enemy ever attack Fort Sumter, it shall be fought low down before it is occupied by a hostile foot." The loss of life in the garrison has been comparatively slight, not more than ten or twelve being killed and thirty or forty wounded. Among the latter are Colonel Rhett and several of his officers, but they have determined to stand by their post to the latest moment. The injuries were inflicted while they were at dinner, a shell bursting in the mess-room and destroying the table at which they were dining.

Although silent at long intervals, because of the necessity of husbanding ammunition, there is life in old Sumter yet; and whenever the iron-clads have approached within range, the same breast of fire has again and again shot out, that in times past so often drove them from the range of its guns.

Meanwhile a steady fire on the Federal land batteries on Morris Island is maintained by our works on James Island—Batteries Simpkins, Hascall, Cheves, and Ryan; so named in honour of some of the officers who have been killed during the siege. The effect of this cannot, of course, be known to us, but it must, to say the least, be both harassing and demoralizing. Batteries Wagner and Gregg also participate.

The Federal fleet now inside of the bar consists of the iron frigate Ironsides, six monitors, ten gun-boats, three wooden frigates, two brigs, four mortar hulks, and several supply vessels. The number of the enemy's breaching guns in position on Morris Island is estimated at fifty, ranging in calibre from 100-pounder to 300-pounder rifles—three times as many as were used in the reduction of Fort Pulaski, below Savannah, Georgia.

Transports from the North arrive daily bringing troops. Seven thousand are known to have been landed within a week. Five thousand negro troops drill on the beach every night.

The navy are reserving their fire for the grand finale. A 15-inch gun is not considered safe from explosion after 500 discharges, and as each has now been fired upwards of 200 times, the remaining 300 are being held in store.

A little drummer-boy, lately sent back to us from Hilton Head by the enemy, without exchange, tells the following brief story of himself. He had been serving for some time as a drummer, when, tired of beating sheepskin instead of the Yankees, he enlisted as a private, and was at Fort Wagner on the memorable 18th July. After the repulse of the storming-party, he, in company with a few others, sallied out to plunder; and, overcome by the good things which he found, he fell asleep in the sand hills. The bold little fellow awoke to find himself in the grasp of a negro three times as big as himself. By this sable soldier he was taken to the southern part of the island, whence, after having had the pleasure of seeing General Gilmore, he was sent for a while on board the Ironsides and then transferred to Hilton Head. He describes the Ironsides as being defended by bulwarks of sand packed tightly, and overlaid with planks to prevent it being washed by the rain. On being asked how he was treated at Hilton Head, he replied, "Oh, bully! Pickled beef, and pickled pork, sometimes fresh beef, coffee, and a gill of whisky four times a day." From the boy's report, we infer that the Yankees have lately inaugurated a new policy with regard to their prisoners, treating them with an insidious kindness and consideration. He declares, also, that during his stay at the island a monitor was brought there from Charleston with her sides badly indented, and the revolving machinery of her turret very severely damaged, though not beyond the possibility of repair.

Our batteries on Sullivan's Island, known as Fort Moultrie and Battery Bee, have as yet had but a single opportunity to play an important part in the great drama, being 2,000 or more yards beyond range. Last week several iron-clads, whose commanders doubtless supposed that Fort Sumter was silenced, approached the entrance to the harbour, and attempted to pass through the narrow channel in front of the above-named works. They were met by a heavy fire, however, and after lingering for a few moments veered around and steamed back to their original position. This being the only avenue to the city from the front, and these forts being built of the same kind of sand, and even stronger than Batteries Gregg and Wagner, and being unapproachable from the rear, you will understand that the safety of Charleston in no manner depends either upon our Morris Island fortifications or upon Fort Sumter.

On Friday last, the 21st August, the Yankees forged another link in the long chain of crime that is destined to bind them to eternal infamy in the estimation of civilised mankind. At the dead hour of night, when thousands of innocent women and children were wrapped in slumber, General Gilmore, without a word of notice, opened his Parrot Battery, and commenced to throw eight-inch shells into the city. The consternation occasioned by the terrific screams of the projectiles beggars description. Families arose from their beds, clothing was hastily gathered, and preparations made for abandoning their homes. Immense trains of cars, loaded down with ladies and children, left soon after daylight, many not knowing whither they were going, but willing to go anywhere to escape the foul vengeance and inhumanity of the foe. The exodus was maintained throughout the day and night, and still continues. The firing ceased in two or three hours, fortunately without having injured any one or destroyed any valuable property. What adds to the diabolism of the crime, if anything can intensify it, is the fact that the Yankees selected for their revenge the very day on which our people, one and all, had fervently engaged in the devotions of a national fast, with its hours of humiliation and prayer. The distance from the battery to the town is within a fraction of six (6) miles.

The affair naturally created intense excitement and aroused the bitterest feelings of scorn and indignation in the city; while the threat of intimidation, for such it was believed to be, served only to nerve our people with a calm determination to make the struggle one of life or death.

Subsequently the following correspondence took place. A communication without signature was received at the headquarters of General Beauregard, at quarter before eleven on Friday night, supposed to come from General Gilmore, and demanding the surrender of Batteries Gregg, Wagner, and Fort Sumter. Beauregard being absent on a reconnaissance, the paper was sent back for signature, pending which fire was opened on the city. At nine o'clock, Saturday morning, the document was returned, duly signed and read as follows:—

"Head-quarters, Department of the South,
Morris Island, S. C., August 21.

"GENERAL: I have the honour to demand of you the immediate evacuation of Morris Island and Fort Sumter, by the Confederate forces. The present condition of Fort Sumter, and the rapid and progressive destruction which it is undergoing from my batteries, seem to render its complete demolition, within a few hours, a matter of certainty. All my heaviest guns have not yet opened.

"Should you refuse compliance with this demand, or should I receive no reply thereto, within four hours after it is delivered into the hands of your subordinate at Fort Wagner for transmission, I shall open fire on the city of Charleston from batteries already established, within easy and effective [range] of the heart of the city.

"I am, General, very respectfully,
Your obedient servant,

"(Signed) Q. A. GILMORE,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

"To General G. T. BEAUREGARD, Commanding Confederate Forces, Charleston, S. C."

To this demand General Beauregard, on Saturday afternoon, forwarded the following stinging reply:—

[This has been already published in THE INDEX, No. 73.]

Fire upon the city was renewed on Sunday night about twelve o'clock. One of the shells passed through a musquito netting a few inches above the heads of two children who were sleeping in their little bed; but the result was providentially as before—no person injured. Thirteen or fourteen eight-inch incendiary shells were thrown in various parts of the city.

On Monday the contest was carried on entirely by land batteries. The Parrott guns of the enemy continued to play on Sumter and Wagner, but with less vigour than usual, only 150 shots having been fired at the former. The fleet quiet. (I omitted to mention in the proper place that Mr. Walker the English, and Senor Moncado the Spanish Consul, communicated with General Gilmore, and received information, only four hours antecedent to the second bombardment of the city, when it would take place. The enemy respect nothing and nobody.)

To-day (Tuesday) the fighting thus far has been confined to the land batteries, Sumter receiving her usual compliment of hard knocks.

The spirit of our soldiers and citizens is just what it ought to be—calm, courageous, prayerful. A glowing purpose "hungers in the eyes" of men, and you may read there a determination to defend every foot of ground, every stone, every ruin—to fight from house to house and from street to street, until the city is level with the earth. The fate of Charleston is not staked on one battery, but on every one; and the long, glorious, and successful defence of our outer works is an earnest of the constancy and valour with which we shall strike our blows when struggling in battle around our homes and hearthstones, where are clustered the tenderest associations of the living and the dead.

But we do not anticipate such an emergency. We are only prepared to meet it and the destiny which awaits us in a manner becoming a people who inaugurated the struggle, and fearlessly abide the result.

CHARLESTON, Sept. 3.

There are a few facts to be added in the present letter to those contained in my last of the 27th ultimo. The state of affairs remains unchanged. The enemy are pounding away without result on our various works within their range, and slowly pushing their parallels in the direction of Fort Wagner. These are now within 400 yards of the battery, and embrace our rifle pits, which were carried on the 28th of August by assault.

I am informed by officers in Wagner that the manner of digging the trenches under our fire is as follows. A huge iron tube, which allows one, or perhaps two men to operate at the aperture, is gradually worked forward as the men dig away the sand in front, and as the latter is scraped out to the rear it is thrown by the individual there concealed to the surface, where it forms an embankment. The working party is thus sheltered from the fire of both musketry and artillery. To protect these saps from danger of capture by our assaulting parties, howitzers are placed in the angles of the trenches. Sharpshooters are also thickly posted in the ditches, which are not more than four feet high, by whom a constant fire is maintained on the men exposed in Battery Wagner. The expertness of these marksmen may be illustrated by an incident. The other day, one of our men in a gun chamber raised his hat on a board, as if some person were slyly peeping over the parapet. Instantly two balls were sent through it, and a dozen shots passed in close proximity. It is, therefore, almost certain death to use artillery during the day, but at night we generally keep up a steady fire. Our other batteries, however, exempt from these disadvantages, are constant in their iron compliments, and annoy the enemy not a little.

You have already been advised of the condition of Fort Sumter. It is still occupied, and though a portion of the walls is in ruins, the battle flag floats as proudly defiant as when, on the 7th of April last, it waved its challenge to combat. Nay, it is no fiction to state that it is even stronger as a mere work than at the beginning of the bombardment; for the very ruins themselves now constitute a barricade which effectually protects the inmates from harm. The casualties are not greater than one or two per day. Our working parties inside, whose labours are plainly evident to the Federals, are thus enabled to repair damages; and as the fort cannot be well carried by assault, man cannot tell how long it will remain a thorn in the Yankee flesh. It is the most stubborn place of defence that has yet been attacked during the war; and from the character of its defenders, as well as those in Battery Wagner, you may judge fairly of the spirit of our whole people. Fifty-seven days have gone; six months or a year may elapse, but you will find us as earnest and obstinate to the end.

On the first instant, Wednesday night, between eleven and twelve o'clock, the enemy's fleet, consisting of seven monitors, and the frigate Ironsides, moved up in front of Fort Sumter, and commenced the most terrific bombardment we have yet experienced. In the city, the excitement became intense. The darkness of the night gave uncertainty to the Federal designs; the calmness of the atmosphere lent unusual force to the cannonade; the very earth shook to the thunder of the heavy guns; windows were shattered or rattled in their sockets; and the impression appeared to be universal that the enemy's gun-boats were already within the harbour engaging our batteries in the final contest for life or death. Men, women and children, leaped from their beds, dressed hastily, and notwithstanding the unknown danger, flocked to the Promenade, in front of the city, and there stood, peering into the darkness until dawn, when the bombardment ceased.

The scene was beautiful beyond all description. A huge black cloud formed the perspective of the midnight picture, and against this were written every second of time the fiery traces of the projectiles. Bursting shells lighted up the heavens like Mammoth fire-flies fitting here and there, while the angry tongues of flame shooting out from a hundred guns lent to the spectacle a weird-like aspect, as if the horrors of Inferno had been transferred to earth.

Subsequently it appeared that the enemy had engaged Fort Moultrie, Battery Bee and our other works, whose names need not now be mentioned, and at the same time had made a desperate effort to batter down the sea-wall of Fort Sumter. The latter, waking from a lethargy, took part in its own defence and hurled its heavy iron with more than usual spite upon its assailants. The concentrated fire was tremendous, and after enduring it for nearly four hours the monitors withdrew from the contest. What harm was done to the enemy is not known. It may have been slight, because of the obscurity of the iron-clads, but they learned that Charleston is not to be captured in that manner. Our own loss was insignificant—two or three men only being killed and wounded. Damage to our works trifling. It is stated that the monitors were struck one hundred times. The impingement of the shots against their mailed sides produced sounds like the deep thud of distant cannon through a heavy atmosphere. Sparks of fire were elicited at every blow they received.

Within the last few days one of the ablest engineer officers in the Confederacy has been added to the already time and battle-tried chiefs in command—Major-General J. F. Gilmer. While the appointment has been a source of gratification to all, since it divides the vast amount of labour heretofore devolved on General Beauregard, much comment and some feeling has been called forth by the overslaughting of General R. S. Ripley, who by virtue of his long services, his thorough identification with the defences of Charleston, and his great ability as an officer, deserved the substantial recognition of his merit which has been conferred on General Gilmer. Patriot-like, however, he has foregone all personal considerations, and remains in the department which he has heretofore commanded, striving with all his might to maintain a successful standard. Ripley is one of the first artists in the country, Beauregard and Gilmer the best engineers; and, together, the three constitute a tower of skill, strength, and energy equal to all the acuteness of our adversaries.

Affairs in other portions of the Confederacy are not more promising than when I last wrote. The enemy are undoubtedly in possession of Knoxville, Tennessee, and Bragg is assuming a new line of defence. Knowing nothing of the situation in that locality, it is useless to speculate. What has been done is doubtless with the suggestion of the President. Blame or praise, his shoulders are broad enough to bear the onus.

The effect of our reverses upon our people has been saddening, but by no means disheartening. Our armies are growing stronger every day; our resources are developing into power; our patriotism is being fostered by misfortune; and individuals as well as organised bodies are beginning to learn the truth that—

"Who would be free, himself must strike the blow."

The following dramatic view of the war, from a Western paper, bespeaks the hopes and fears, the constancy and courage, of our people, everywhere, and with it I conclude.

"The romance of the American war—for such is the most simple, direct, and truthful definition of the entertaining chapter now being given to the world's wonder-book—is reaching that point which, in all sensational masterpieces, most excites the curiosity and hurries on the imagination to the grand climactic, where the heroine, restored once more to life, rushes into her lover's arms; where the hero, safe at last out of perils incredible, receives the triumph of his constancy and courage, the hand of his mistress and the plaudits of the company; where all the villains go out gnashing their teeth and all the waiting people retire grinning; and volume the third closes with the touching but joyful tableau of vice on the one hand punished with the ashes, and virtue on the other rewarded with the apples of hope and happiness; all the just men made perfect, and all the wicked ones meeting their just deserts.

"Our romance, we say, has reached this turning point, this top of the hill, which has cost so much in climbing, and now broadens slowly to the other side, amid all the complications which the choicest artists in the school of effects are able to contrive to delude the sense, to conceal the true issue, and so to startle everybody with a sudden, unexpected, happy conclusion.

"We believe the war is on its last legs. The union of Rosecrans and Burnside on the one hand, and the union of the entire armies of the southwest on the other, which is certain to result sooner or later, and the consequent defeat of the former, will furnish the concluding scene in the last chapter of the book. It will thus be shut with entire satisfaction to all parties, except the villains of the piece, who will go out snarling, of course, to receive the punishment of their misdeeds.

"At present the plot is admirably concealed. Dumas nor Bulwer could better manage the mystery; and there is not a French vaudeville or English novel in any part of which the finale is so well subordinated to the events which are to produce it, or so artfully kept out of sight until the exact critical moment. Nevertheless, the finale is at hand. We know that it is certain to ensue, and we go on breathlessly through the whole pages of casualty, eager to know the fate of favourite characters, but certain that they will not fare very ill. So it is here. We are anxious and excited; we hurry on with our heart in our mouth; we shed tears of pity; but do we not know equally well that there is an end which will make everything right, under the guidance of that Great Master who moulds the destiny of men, nations, and the world, as the romancist moves those of his fictitious puppets?

"They are as sure as that God reigns, these simple truths.

"Happy prologues to the swelling act Of the imperial theme."

PERSONNE.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, October 7.

The military position has not changed materially this week. Rosecrans is entrenched in Chattanooga, and Bragg has not been able, if he has attempted, to dislodge him. The Federals are making immense efforts to reinforce the "Army of the Cumberland." That is notorious here. Large detachments have been sent from the Army of the Potomac, and additional troops in great numbers have been sent from the Western and South-western Departments. They have a long and weary road to travel before reaching Chattanooga, especially if it be true that the Confederates are in force enough on the banks to obstruct the communications, as they are reported to be. We are without means of knowing what the Confederates are doing; but it would be unjust to suppose that their able commanders do not see where the pinch of the war is, and are not exerting themselves to throw sufficient forces forward to secure the fruits of the victory which drove back Rosecrans from Georgia into Tennessee. It is evident that a great struggle is to be made, on that line, for the defence of Atlanta by the Federals or the recovery of Tennessee by the Confederates. The delay about Chattanooga is construed here by the friends of the South to mean, that while Rosecrans is kept there in inaction, some of the approaching columns are to be met and overthrown. It is a period of anxious looking after important results.

There is nothing new from Charleston. The siege drags on without results. We have only the daily repetition of the report that General Gilmore is making extensive preparations for a very decisive onset, which is to be certainly successful when it is made. But it is not made. Rumour gives stories of very serious difficulties between General Gilmore of the land forces and Admiral Dalghren of the iron fleet, who have assumed such a tone of acrimony that one or the other must give way, and the question at Washington is, which must be the sacrifice?

The new Texas expedition is not heard of. That part destined for the Rio Grande frontier, is said to be given up for the present, in consideration perhaps for the French. It is feared that if there were American troops in Western Texas, with the French troops at Matamoras, it might happen that the Administration would be forced by some accident, to revive the Monroe doctrine, of which they are disposed to say nothing at present, if they can help it.

The great event of the week is the decision of the Court of Appeal of this State, in favour of the constitutionality of the law making Treasury Notes of the United States a legal tender. The decision goes to the extent of affirming their constitutionality as legal tender, in payment of all debts, private and public, contracted before as well as after the passage of the law, and for debts which became due, although payment was not exacted, before the passage of the law.

It is not an unexpected judgment, for the universal tendency of late has been to make every consideration of morals and politics subordinate to the one universal rule of military expediency, construed so as to mean that anything is allowable and excusable and justifiable for which it is said by authority that it is useful in helping to crush the rebellion. It was not to be expected that the Judiciary, which holds its office for a term of years, by popular elections, should escape the contamination of these revolutionary passions, and stand erect in the face of a frowning multitude. There is scarcely a fragment left of the old fabric of constitutional liberty of which the American people once boasted, and among the last the independence of the judiciary has now gone. The opinion of the Court, which was read in the pronouncing of the judgment, discloses the influence under which it was given, in a very elaborate exposition of the political distresses of the Government, and the necessity, for the successful prosecution of the war, that the Court should find the power in the Constitution to do what the Administration and the Congress have already done on the plea of a national necessity. Of course they found the power, by a course of reasoning on the origin and extent of the powers of Congress which denies all the facts of history, reverses all the previous judgments of the Courts, and, if confirmed by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, as they probably will be, utterly change the whole character of the Government.

I have said that the decision will probably be confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. That high tribunal is a permanent body, of which the judges are appointed for life; but the accidents of the times have assisted the effects of the national frenzy in giving the Court as now constituted a cast in conformity with that of the ruling party. Before Mr. Lincoln was elected the decisions of that Court had impressed on the theory of the Government a character of Conservatism, such as would have saved and perpetuated the Union, if it could be respected by political factions. But the party of Mr. Lincoln came into power with the denunciation on their lips of the judgments of that court, and the proclaimed determination of Mr. Lincoln himself not to respect the judgment of the Court in any question affecting the rights of the South to their slave property, inconsistent with his theories of what the Constitution ought to be. The South seceded, and is no longer represented in the Supreme Court. Judge Daniels, one of the States Rights judges, died; another, Judge Campbell, withdrew with his State; a third judge, not a Southerner, but not partisan, and sometimes conservative, Judge M'Lean, died. It has, therefore, fallen to the lot of Mr. Lincoln and his party to have the making of three new judges, and they are all political partisans of the same school with the President. Several of the other judges have, in decisions at the Circuits, given ground to the fear that "military necessity" overrules the old maxims and judgments on constitutional questions; and that it is the duty of the Judiciary, not to expound the law as it has been expounded in time of peace, but to look for such expostions as will sustain the acts of the men in authority, on the broad plea which is expressed in the New York decision: That the President and his advisers are the only two exponents of what the "public welfare" requires. By this decision the Federal Government is placed in absolute control of the currency of all the States, with lawful power to set aside the standard of value, and to make its paper issues, only limited in amount by the capacity of machinery to send them out, redeemable at a fixed value nowhere, and only convertible into other classes of paper, and fluctuating every day with the accidents of war and the tricks of speculators, to be the only medium by which property can be estimated or exchanged, or contracts and engagements among men adjusted. Aside from its violation of the Constitution, it is a plain confiscation of the property of all creditors, a shameful robbery of the labourer, and it will be a marvel if it do not end in the bankruptcy of the Government.

Next week is election week in several of the States; among them Ohio and Pennsylvania—the two most powerful central States—next to New York. They choose only State officers: the members of next Congress were elected last year. But the struggle between the parties is fierce, and an immense vote will be polled. It would not be surprising if the number of ballots counted out exceeds, as it did at the late elections in Maine, the vote cast at the Presidential election in 1860, notwithstanding the absence of tens and twenties of thousands at the wars, or in the grave where the war has laid them. It will be just as difficult to account for the excess. It is one of the mysteries which will never be developed, so long at least as "military necessity" presides at the ballot-boxes, and it is thought to be a duty to the country to out-vote the enemies of the Administration, in some way, and by any of the numerous ways known to the American managers of the ballot-box.

Of the results in these elections, I shall offer no prognostic. That the judgment of a great majority of the people, in both States, is against the principles and policy of the Administration, I have no manner of doubt. If it were a free election—free not merely in the privilege to cast the ballot, according to the conscience, but free of the extraneous influence which have been brought in to bias and pervert the understanding of the issue, the anti-Administration majority would be overwhelming. But the American passion for Union is so overwhelming that thousands upon thousands have been led on to sustain the men they distrust and the policy they abhor, in the faith industriously propagated amongst them that there is no means of recovering the Union but by supporting those in power. Victims of this hallucination, that the Union is recoverable, they continue to vote for the worst men and the worst policy, trusting to the chances of the future to be enabled to save themselves from the consequences of their infatuation. But independent of these, there is probably a very decided, nay, a large majority, who would prefer Woodward for Governor of Pennsylvania, and Vallandigham as Governor of Ohio.

Whether this majority will be allowed its lawful control in these States is a matter for doubt. The Administration has seized upon power with such a high hand, and has exposed itself to such dreadful penalties if the control of affairs should pass into the hands of its enemies, that success in the coming elections is a matter of life or death. It will not surrender without a desperate conflict, and that conflict it is waging with all the means which unlimited control of the resources and finances of the country puts into its hands, and all the terrors which spring from the unscrupulous use of the command of a million of armed men, and an innumerable corps of army dependents, obsequious to do its will. The game of intimidation has long been in operation. As the election approaches, the old plan, which carried the New Hampshire and Connecticut elections in the spring, has been revived. The soldiers of the Army of the Potomac, comprised largely of Ohio and Pennsylvania men, longing to get home, are allowed to go on furlough and furnished with transportation, provided they are Administration voters, or will be grateful enough to vote the Administration ticket. Twenty, thirty, forty thousand men can be thus sent in, and they are now going forward in squads of hundreds at a time to vote for the Lincoln candidates. Those who will not give the promise nor stand the test are kept on duty in camp: lucky if they escape persecution. In Ohio, last year, the Legislature passed a law authorising the vote of the Ohio soldiers in camp to be taken as though they were at home. It will be, of course, nearly all for the Administration candidates. The Democratic soldier votes, if at all, under the terror of that proscription vaunted of by General Thomas, adjutant-general in the army, when in a public letter he proclaimed that he had dis-rated a non-commissioned officer and sent him to the ranks, for saying, in reply, when questioned, that he was opposed to the policy of the President. There is no way of computing how much the majority may be which an army thus disciplined can send home, less than the gross number of the soldiers. It is vehemently insisted in Ohio that this vote is unconstitutional, and that for that and other reasons it shall not be received, and they threaten loudly to resist an election effected by such means. There is certainly trouble likely to arise, but I do not think that the Administration has yet exhausted the submissiveness of this people.

This is said to be a republic. It is as complete a military despotism as Prussia would be if Prussia were at war.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS, October 20.

THE death of M. Billault, which was announced just as I was closing my last, has influenced all the events of the week. It was followed by a fall in the public funds, from which they only began to rally yesterday, when the Moniteur, by the nomination of his successor, or rather successors, quieted the fears which a rumour of M. Fould's removal to the Ministry of State had occasioned. As usual, the Emperor has not parted with an old servant without making such demonstration as he could of his regrets, and his wish to honour him. The funeral, which was a splendid affair, was at the public expense, and his bust is to be placed in the hall of the Legislative Assembly. But the greatest compliment of all is that paid in the number of men appointed to fill the functions he discharged alone. By the last regulation of the ministerial relations with the legislative bodies, M. Billault was, in fact, the sole mouthpiece of the Government. M. Rouher takes his place as Minister of State, but three fresh orators have been added as Vice-Presidents of the Council of State, whose functions will be the exposition and defence of the measure, of Government. One of these, M. Chaix d'Estange, was for long a distinguished ornament of the Paris bar, which he left to become Procureur-Général. Another is M. Vuitry, the Governor of the Bank of France. This latter establishment, which is considered here as a sort of dependant of the great house of Rothschild, has been of late the object of multiplied attacks in the press and in the market. Till the annexation of Savoy it was the only bank in the Empire entitled to emit paper, and till within a few years it issued notes of no sum below 1,000 francs. Government was obliged to force its hand to obtain a circulation of 100-franc notes. Add to this that its terms for discount are very severe, and the rate of interest, which it has a more absolute power of fixing than is possessed by the Bank of England, is believed to be constantly influenced by the great house already alluded to. On the annexation of Savoy, another bank, with an issue of fifty-franc notes, and power to issue notes as low as twenty francs, became entitled to extend its operations to the whole territory of the Empire. Its statutes are also much less stringent on the subject of accommodation than those of the Bank of France. An amalgamation of the two establishments was proposed by the Government, and, it is said, personally recommended by the Emperor; but the Bank of France, despising the exiguity of its new rival's present resources, declined to agree to any acceptable arrangement. The capital of this bank is at present only £160,000, but it has the power to increase it to any extent, and a treaty has just been passed with mon petit Emile, as head of the Crédit Mobilier, by which a fusion is effected and the capital is to be increased tenfold. This will of course give the Crédit an enormous power, which threatens the supremacy of the Bank, and strenuous efforts are now being made to prevent the Government ratifying the treaty. M. Vuitry's appointment as Vice-President of the Council of State seems of bad augury to the plans of MM. Péreire and Co.

This has been the week of funerals. One of the last survivors of the retreat from Moscow, and related by blood to the Imperial family, Marshal Ornano, died, after a long illness, on the same day as M. Billault. He was yesterday buried with military pomp at the Invalides, of which he was governor. The reception of the King of the Hellenes, owing to these deaths as well as to the absence of the Empress, has been of a very quiet character. He was entertained at a grand dinner the day after his arrival, and this, with the obligatory review which is fixed for to-morrow, is the amount of official festivities given in his honour.

The Polish question may well be the despair of all correspondents. Twenty-four hours do not pass without some new rumour, which is contradicted in the next twenty-four. If the Mémorial is to be believed, Austria is quite ready to join France and England, even in measures which would infallibly lead to war; but in well-informed circles it is generally believed that no grounds exist for this belief. On the contrary, it is said that Austria is even more indisposed than England to embark in such a venture. The activity I called your attention to in the War Office is not relaxed. The military train is being reorganised with new matériel, on which an immense number of men are employed; and it is said that other steps are being taken which are only usual when war is imminent. There have been for some time rumours that the Poles and their friends, despairing of bringing England to take up their quarrel, have now recourse to a series of intrigues, the object of which is to produce a war between Turkey and Russia. If they succeed in this, they believe that England will at once hasten to the aid of Turkey, and that the war made on the southern limits of the Empire will only be ended by a reconstitution of Poland at the expense of Russia. Two vessels which have for some time been in preparation at Marseilles, intended nominally for a voyage up the Niger, have suddenly left that port under the English flag, but with a French captain in command, and it is believed they have gone to the Black Sea to assist the Circassians. The neutrality of Turkey in the Caucasus is already of so doubtful a character that very small additional cause of offence might, it is thought, force Russia to declare war against Turkey. Some of the French papers have republished in the last few days the history of the persecutions to which the Catholics in Russia have long been subjected, the efforts made by Gregory XVI. to put a stop to the mingled violence and seductions to which they were exposed, and the concessions wrung from the Emperor Nicholas, but which have never been realised. It is not the so-called religious press which prints these documents, and their effect on the reader is to excite the deepest indignation. Russia seems bent on alienating every friend except the Cabinet of Washington.

Judging from the silence of the journals, "all is quiet on the Potomac," and elsewhere throughout North America. The Mémorial has an amusing letter from Vienna, describing the arrival there of Sir Charles Wyke, late English Minister at Mexico, on the same day as the Mexican deputation. It describes the impression he was able to make on old Prince Esterhazy, who was so persuaded by his eloquence of the danger to the Archduke if he accepted the crown, that he invited a party of statesmen to meet the English diplomatist. During dinner he was loud in his praises of Juárez, and pointed out that the sole means of pacifying and civilising Mexico were through him and his system. The company was carried away by his eloquence, when one of the guests quietly remarked that he had listened attentively to all the stranger had said, but that he was not convinced by it, as he bore in mind the still more forcible demonstrations of the tyranny and lawlessness of Juárez's rule which he had read in the despatches of a namesake of Sir Charles's addressed to the English Government. He considered, of course, when he said this, that the two Sir Charleses were different persons, and not the same seen from different sides. It is said that Sir Charles, who sat at Prince Esterhazy's table, was silenced.

MR. SPENCE.

(From the Richmond Sentinel, September 16.)

Some time ago the Enquirer in its "war upon the State Department," attacked Mr. Spence, of England, with great bitterness, and then transferred its censures from him, in accumulated force, to the terrible "State Department;" by whom, it is alleged, Mr. Spence had been appointed to a position as Confederate agent. We pointed out to the Enquirer its mistake in this; and how, in fact, Mr. Spence had been appointed by, and was the agent of, another Department, with which the Enquirer professed friendly terms, and that the State Department had nothing whatever to do with his appointment. The Enquirer acknowledged and excused its mistake, and dropped the subject. Now, however, strange to say, it renews and repeats its original error.

The appointment of Mr. Spence was made by the Secretary of the Treasury; and, we feel well assured, with the knowledge and approbation of the President and the remainder of the Cabinet. That they acted considerably and wisely, we have no doubt. We differ totally from the Enquirer's estimate of Mr. Spence. He was one of the earliest and ablest friends of the Confederate cause in Europe. His work on the American Union contains some expressions repugnant to our own views as to slavery in the abstract, but the book in the main is a masterly defence of the right of secession, of the justice of our quarrel with the North, and of the hypocrisy of the Abolitionists who assail us. Their interference with slavery is pointedly condemned, and any interference with it save by the Southern States themselves, is deprecated. He holds that the South has the humanity and wisdom to deal with the question of slavery, without being dictated to by outside parties. Condemning the wickedness of the war, he invokes England to recognise the South, and to set aside by arms the illegal blockade of our coast. He is for armed intervention in our favour. Now, with these efforts of Mr. Spence, our Government has nothing to do whatever. He speaks his own sentiments independently, and like a gentleman; and though we regret the error he entertains in common with the mass of his countrymen and of Europe, on the abstract question of slavery, we feel bound to honour and to be grateful to him for his generous, disinterested, and effective advocacy of our cause. His labours in our favour preceded his appointment as a financial agent—[not commercial agent—will the Enquirer please remember it?—and, in connection with his well-known abilities, were, probably, the reason of his selection by Mr. Memminger.

The Enquirer says the Sentinel is the only paper in Richmond that sustains the State Department. "We are not aware that our other contemporaries here are any more hostile to the State Department than to the Administration generally. But if they, or some of them, are to be evidence, perhaps they will prove more than the Enquirer wishes. We can retort, however, that of all the papers in the Confederacy, the Enquirer is the only one that we have seen that speaks harshly of Mr. Spence or condemns his appointment! How will the Enquirer explain this?"

From the Richmond Sentinel, September 26th.

The discussion between the Enquirer and this paper relative to Mr. Spence, was upon a bygone case. As that discussion is concluded, we may now properly make the following announcement.

Since the establishment of General C. J. McRae's agency in Europe for carrying out the Cotton Loan, the same gentleman has also been appointed Depositary of the Treasury at Paris. It has been deemed best to concentrate all the financial arrangements of the Government in his hands, and in those of the well-known house of Fraser, Trenholm and Co., which has acted since the commencement of the war as Depositary of the Treasury at Liverpool. The agency of Mr. Spence has, therefore, been discontinued.

In taking this action, which we understand was determined on before the late controversy in regard to Mr. Spence, we are able to state that the Treasury Department was governed by financial considerations alone; and that, fully appreciating the great services which Mr. Spence has rendered to the Confederacy, its course was not inspired by any of the objections which have been made by some of our contemporaries against his appointment.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, October 21.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

The symptoms of ease in the money market which have been evident the last two days will, it is feared, be speedily dissipated. Large amounts of capital are floating about, and the public knows of its existence, but still the rates have been supported, especially in discounting accounts. At the Stock Exchange, on the other hand, such has been the abundance of money for employment at short periods, that the rate has not been higher than 2 per cent. But according to the intelligence to-day from Paris, the state of things will still continue if the French Government seek to raise a loan of £12,000,000 or £15,000,000, and gold is still flowing from the vaults of the Bank of France. The rumour is that a fresh advance may take place in the rate of discount on the other side of the Channel, as it did a fortnight ago, and if that shall prove the case, the directors of the Bank of England will have to follow the example, and likewise enhance their terms. It seems to be generally believed that a large export of specie is taking place via Marseilles to India to pay for cotton, and that money is also absorbed for purchases of the staple in Egypt. At the same time a good deal of coin is in circulation through the provinces in the agricultural interest, which has yet to return to the coffers of the London bankers; when this takes place it will exercise an appreciable influence on the money markets, if even in the meanwhile the rates shall have been advanced. It is quite certain that the encouragement given to new loans, banking and discount establishments, and other miscellaneous projects, must sooner or later produce a serious reaction; and when it comes it will be necessary to be prepared for it, seeing the wide sweep it will take before its course is exhausted.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The amount of gold sent into the Bank this week, including £48,000 this afternoon, is £374,000. At the same time £48,000 has been withdrawn for transmission to the continent. The arrivals of specie this week have reached £278,848, of which £203,160 is from Australia, and the remainder from America. The Silver Market has been rather more active; bar silver having realised 5s. 1½d., being an advance of about ¼d. on previous sales. Mexican dollars are not much in demand, but are still quoted 5s. 3d. per ounce. The India and China Mail which sailed yesterday took out £202,034 in specie, of which £20,400 was in gold for Alexandria, £40,000 in gold for the Mauritius, £132,434 in silver for China and the Strait, and the residue of £7,299 in gold, and £1,901 in silver for India. The only gold ships at present known to be on their way from Australia are the Yorkshire with £227,000 and the True Briton with £138,000.

BIDDINGS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 30,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were,—to Calcutta 16,00,000 rupees, to Bombay 12,00,000 rupees, and to Madras 2,00,000 rupees. The minimum prices declared were, as before, 1s. 11½d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1s. 11¼d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 317 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta at 1s. 11½d. will receive about 3 per cent., on Bombay at 2s. about 6 per cent., on Madras at 1s. 11¼d., will receive about 30 per cent., on Bombay at 2s. about 6 per cent., on Madras at 1s. 11½d. about 92 per cent., and all above these prices in full.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English Stock Market has again assumed a very quiet appearance this week, but on the whole a fair amount of business has been transacted, though prices have scarcely varied a fraction. Consols closed this evening the same as they left off last week, at 93 to 94 for money and 93½ to 94 for the account. Exchequer Bills are rather weaker, being 1 dis. to 2 prem. There has been less animation exhibited in the Foreign Stock Market during the past few days, now that the excitement occasioned by the late panic has subsided. Still there has been some degree of speculation going on in some of the foreign descriptions, particularly in Greek stock, in which prices have fluctuated between 29½ and 32. Mexicans have also shown variations, the prices ranging between 41½ and 43½. Spanish Passives have varied from 34½ to 36½, and the Certificates between 13½ and 14½. The closing quotations this evening were,—Greek, 30½ to 31½; Mexico, 42½ to 43½; Spanish Passives, 35½ to 36½; do. Certificates, 13½ to 13¾; Turkish Six per Cents. (1854), 92 to 93 ex. div.; do. do. (1862), 71½ to 71¾.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

There has been much less doing this week than usual in American Government and Railway Securities, but although there is very little alteration in prices, the tendency is towards weakness. The transactions comprise Virginia State Six per Cents. at 37, 38, and 37½; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvania Section, 75, 74½, 74½, and 75; Erie Shares, $100, all paid, 68½, 68½, 68½, 67½, 66, 67, and 68; Ditto ditto, Seven per Cent. Preference, 66; Illinois Central Seven per Cents. 73 and 75; Ditto ditto, $100 shares, $90 paid, 17, 18½, 19, and 18½ discount; Ditto ditto, all paid, 74, 75, 74, 73, 74, and 74½; New York Central, $100 shares, 86 and 85½.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

A moderate amount of business has been transacted in the English Railway Share Market, but the dealings have not shown much animation. With one or two exceptions prices are well sustained, at, in some instances, an advance. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, Metropolitan, and North London, have each improved 1 per cent.; Caledonian, Great Western, and Chatham and Dover, ½ per cent.; and Lancashire and Yorkshire, London and North-Western, and South-Eastern, ¼ per cent. On the other hand there has been a decline of 1 per cent. in Great Eastern, and of ½ per cent. in Brighton. In Foreign Railway Shares there has been less doing, and no material alteration in prices. There has, however, been rather more doing in British Possession Shares, at full rates.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the first general meeting of the shareholders in the Metropolitan Cab and Carriage Company, a report was read which stated that assuming the twenty cabs had started at one time, as was originally intended, they would in the forty-six working days show a profit of £44 19s. 7d., or 12 per cent. per annum. The Chairman (Captain Claxton) stated that increased capital was required, and a committee of four shareholders was appointed to confer with the three directors as to what course should be pursued. The feeling of the meeting appeared to be in favour of raising the necessary additional capital.

BANK MEETINGS.

At a meeting of the shareholders of the Commercial Banking Company of Sydney on the 28th July, a dividend was declared at the rate of 15 per cent. per annum, and £4,000 added to the reserve fund, making it now £72,000. The sum of £3,362 was carried forward to the current account.—At a special general meeting of the proprietors of the Bank of Bombay on the 21st September, it was resolved that the capital of the Bank be increased by the issue of 5,225 new shares of rupees 1,000 each. The new shares to be offered to the proprietors at par, each proprietor to be entitled to take up one new share for every old share he holds.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE DEBENTURES.

The tenders for the Cape of Good Hope Six per Cent. Debentures, representing £150,000 and falling due in 1891, have opened on the 15th inst., at the office of the Crown Agents for the colonies. The total amount tendered for was £353,000, at prices varying from par to 114. The minimum was stated to be £108 3s., and £168,700 was subscribed at and above that quotation. Those who tendered at £108 3s. will participate pro rata, but those who tendered above that figure will get the full amount.—Cape of Good Hope Government Kowie Harbour Six per Cent. Debentures, for £24,000, have also been disposed of by public competition by the Crown Agents for the colonies. Twenty tenders were received, varying in price from 8s. to £10 per cent. premium, and amounting in the aggregate to £60,600. All those above £107 11s. were accepted in full, those at £107 11s. will participate pro rata. The average price realised was £108, and the minimum fixed before the opening was £106 10s.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security has been steady all the week. The quotation 65 to 67, with only very moderate transactions. The political news is of a nature to strengthen the value of this loan very materially; and but for a very dull market to-day in all departments of the Stock Exchange, an advance might have been looked for. We close very firm; and the value nominally 66 to 67, and possibly better.

NEW PORTUGUESE LOAN.

A new Loan for Portugal has just been introduced on this market. The amount is £2,500,000 in a Three per Cent. Stock, of which £1,000,000 has been taken privately, £250,000 is reserved for Portugal, leaving £1,250,000, or one-half, for England, which is offered at the price of £48 for each £100, but as the interest dates from the 1st of July last, and allowance made for discount on payments, the price is reduced to 46½ to persons who pay up at once. The proceeds of the loan are required for the construction of the different railways and public works authorised, and which are to be completed by the end of June next.

THE OTTOMAN RAILWAY.

Proposals are invited for £588,000 debentures of the Ottoman Railway from Smyrna to Aidin, bearing 6 per cent. interest, redeemable at par in 42 years by annual drawings. They are offered at £72 for each £100. The Company have received a further guarantee from the Sultan for £40,000.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

A variety of new companies have just been brought forward, but none of any magnitude, and the capitals required are comparatively small. There is first the British India Tea Company, with a capital of £250,000 in 12,500 shares of £20 each. The object of the Company is the promotion of tea cultivation in India, and the properties in possession of the Company are said to be very valuable, while at the same time the land can be made available as the Company may desire. The estates are situate in the tea-producing districts of Assam, Cachar, Sylhet, and Darjeeling. Already the profits are sufficient to pay 8 per cent. on the paid-up capital, and as large areas come into working the profits must rapidly increase.—The prospectus has been issued of the Crosier Valley and Portmadoc Freehold Slate Company, with a capital of £60,000 in 6,000 shares of £10 each, but the first issue will be 4,000 shares only. The object of the undertaking is to work a slate property in Wales, between Beddgelert and Tan-y-bwlch, about six miles from the shipping port of Port Madoc, to which a railway is in course of construction. The arrangements for the purchase of the property are favourable, the vendor having agreed to take two-thirds of the purchase money in paid-up shares. The Clowancewood Copper Mining Company is another small affair, for which a capital of £25,000 is sought to be raised. The shares are £1 each, with a deposit of 2s. 6d. on application, and 2s. 6d. on allotment. The property appears to be in the neighbourhood of some paying undertakings in the county of Cornwall. The Central Darjeeling Tea Company, is the title of another new company just brought forward; in this instance the capital is only £75,000, in 7,500 shares of £10 each. The arrangements for the purchase of the proposed estates appear to be satisfactory, the price being put down at £28,000, of which one-third is to be taken up in paid shares, the remainder being liquidated by instalments. Various portions of the property are available for the growth of the cinchona plant, the cultivation of which is being encouraged in India. Business is to be commenced as soon as sufficient capital has been subscribed.—The London Permanent Exhibition and International Agency Company (Limited) is another of the new undertakings. The general object of the company is the establishment of a mart for the display of samples, models, patterns, and works of art; many foreign and other manufacturers being desirous to appoint the company their agents for the sale of goods, provided advances be made on such goods as are consigned to the company, so that a considerable capital can be profitably and safely employed in making such advances. The capital of the company is fixed at £100,000, in 20,000 shares of £5 each.

The South Blackpool Hotel Company (Limited) is the last of the undertakings just brought forward. The objects contemplated are the erection, furnishing, and management of a first-class hotel at the fashionable sea-bathing town of Blackpool, in Lancashire. A very eligible spot of ground has been secured facing the sea, upon which it is proposed to erect the hotel. The capital to be raised is £50,000, in 10,000 shares of £5 each.

BANK AMALGAMATION.

It has been officially intimated that the London and Midland Bank are making arrangements for an amalgamation with an old-established bank. It was stated that the National Bank was the institution alluded to, but this is now positively contradicted. The cause for the proceeding is the conduct of two of the cashiers, who, in collusion with parties possessing accounts at the bank, have committed great irregularities, and abstracted a considerable amount of money.

STATE OF THE MARKETS AT RICHMOND IN THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

Advices from Richmond, in the Confederate States, down to the 25th of September, give the following as the state of the markets at that date: Wheat, $5 to $6.25 per bushel. Flour—Country, $35 to $40 per barrel for superfine and extra—stock very limited. Tobacco, inferior bags at $14 to $18; good, $20 to $25; fine shipping, $60 to $70; and fine manufacturing, $85 to $120. Corn, heavy at $8 to $8.10 per bushel. Rye, $7 per bushel. Hay, $8 to $8.50 per 100 lbs. Coffee, $7 to $8.25. Cotton yarns, $1.50 to $1.60 per lb. Whisky, $31 to $35 per gallon. Brandy, $28 to $35. Gold is inactive, but is still quoted $10.50 premium buying rate, and $11.50 selling rate. Silver, buying rate $8 premium, selling rate $9. Confederate Bonds—Bonds of 100 million loan, eight per cent., 105 to 111½, and interest according to date. Eight per cent. Convertibles, 110 and interest. Seven per cent. bonds 101, and interest. Bonds of 15 millions loan, 180 to 185. Cotton Loan, 150. Railway Bonds:—Richmond and Danville Railroad, 210 and interest. Richmond and York River Railroad, 100 and interest. Virginia Central Railroad, 1st mortgage, 234 and interest. Share List:—Bank of Commonwealth Stock, 150. Traders Bank, 147½. Bank of Richmond, 115. Virginia and Tennessee Railroad, 140. Richmond Importing and Exporting Company, 920 (par 500).

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The markets for American produce have not presented any new feature in their general aspect since this day week. The upward tendency noticed in some departments, and the flatness in others, are still, in almost every instance, perceptible. The Cotton Market has shown considerable animation at intervals, and great firmness throughout; quotations have advanced 3d. to 1d. per lb. The value of cotton manufactures still readily follows the advance in the raw material. In American provisions transactions are of about the recent average, without essential change in prices. For the better qualities of cheese former quotations have been slightly exceeded; fine butters at 98s. to 100s. have also favoured sellers in price. The grain trade continues extremely dull, but the short supplies of English wheat and flour enable holders of foreign to keep prices pretty well up to their previous level. Petroleum has suffered further depression, owing principally to forced sales by speculators. The last price quoted for refined was 2s. to 2s. 1d. per gallon, and crude £19 per tun for Pennsylvania. Turpentine has fluctuated about 2s. per cwt., closing at 75s. for French refined, after having been up to 77s. American lard continues in fair demand at the recent currency. In consequence of the advance in Russian, New York tallow is increasingly firm in price, but not to alter our previous quotations. Deliveries in this trade are extending, but still fall below the average of past seasons. Tobacco is in fair demand, and were it not for substitutes a further advance in the price of American might be witnessed. Jute has advanced 10s. to 15s. per ton on the spot, and considerable purchases have been made for arrival at 5s. to 7s. 6d. per ton over the rates current a week ago. Good roving Manila hemp has touched £30 per ton, but there is no change in Russian. After uninterrupted quiet and steadiness for a long time past there has at last sprung up a very strong, or rather, perhaps, excited speculative movement in sugar. Within the past fortnight the sales on the spot have been very extensive, and prices have gone up 3s. and 4s. per cwt., the advance being the most marked during the last two or three days. Stocks are in excess of last year, and even then they were heavy, whilst prices are now above those of 1862 at this period. The present operations are based mainly upon the failure of the Louisiana crop, the deterioration of the beet crop in France, and the moderate range at which prices have recently stood. Last year, about this time, a speculation was started upon somewhat similar grounds, but on that occasion it signally failed. Camphor is extremely dull of sale, owing to a large consignment being close at hand. Our indigo sales have progressed with increased animation, and prices are now 2d. to 4d. above the rates of last sales for Bengal, and 3d. to 6d. for Kurpah. Scotch pig iron has again fluctuated rather heavily. It dropped at one period to 59s., but is now 61s., with a firm market.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, October 21.
Our cotton market still continues in a very excited state, but although in the early part of the week there was for the moment a slight reduction in prices, the loss was very soon regained, and further advances had to be submitted to. The sales of the week have amounted to 80,000 bales, of which 40,000 bales were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year to the present period have been 2,108,170 bales, and to the corresponding period last year 2,314,280 bales. The total imports this year have been 1,233,812 bales, and to the same period in 1862, 959,790 bales. There have been exported this year, 366,457 bales, and to the same time last year, 352,662 bales. At present the computed stocks are 162,440 bales, at the corresponding period in 1862 they were 278,420 bales. For consumption there have been taken this year 1,094,300 bales, for the same period last year 967,700 bales. Taken on speculation this year, 543,290 bales, the same in 1862, 931,470 bales. The demand for American and Egyptian descriptions has been very active, and prices must be quoted from 1d. to 1½d. per lb. higher. Brazil has also been dealt in to a fair extent at about a similar rise, and the same remarks will apply to Surats. Middling Orleans must be quoted 28½d. to 29½d. Mobile 28½d. to 29d. Up-lands, 28½d. to 28¾d., Estimated fair Egyptians, 28½d. to 28¾d., and Surats, 13d. to 27d.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, October 20.

We have to report a very brisk demand both for yarn and cloth, as having taken place in this market during the past week. The speculative excitement in Liverpool, the better advices from India, and a steadily improving home trade, all tend to produce the lively state of things which we have witnessed here during that period.

Home trade yarns are readily bought up at an advance of from 1d. to 1½d. per lb. on the prices of the week previous. Export yarns are also in good demand but not to the same extent as those for home trade use.

India shirtings have improved their quotations to the extent of 6d. to 9d. per piece on the value of last Tuesday, and other cloths have advanced proportionately.

Much larger orders would be given for cloth, were manufacturers in a position to deliver early, and in some instances the handsome offers made by buyers for early execution of orders, are a great temptation to some few to deliver a portion of what is coming forward in fulfilment of previous contracts.
